The state convention was organized at Iowa City in the month of June, 1842. It would be very interesting to the writer and doubtless interesting to all our Iowa Baptists to tell the story of the development of the state convention, and write ever, and it seems to be the conviction of most Iowa Baptists, that we are about to enter a new era. It will be a fitting tribute if these eighty-seven years shall suddenly burst into bloom and soon mature into a great spiritual harvest. Under the New World Movement, a new vision has come, news stars of hope are rising, organization is being perfected, and all the forces are gathering into what looks like a great harmonious, co-ordinated movement for the kingdom of Christ.

Our educational affairs have at last taken a happy turn and the Baptists are solidly behind a united program.

The leaders who have borne the heat and stress of the years and who feel they have earned the right to pass the standards on to others and a roll of the "heroes of faith" who have been its leaders, or those upon whom the mantle of the present has fallen, but space forbids this enchanting challenge. The sacrifices and triumphs of these men and women are written in the records on high, and a long line of worthies have passed to their reward.

The Iowa State Convention in its early years was practically an agency of the Home Mission Society. Later it undertook separate work, giving special attention to the sparsely settled rural regions. Finally, it has become a strong organization by which all denominational organizations and agencies are co-ordinated into a single program.

Iowa Baptists now number about 45,000. The writer has not had time to make an exhaustive research and therefore does not venture any final deductions nor venture very far into prophecy. It appears to him, how-drop back into the ranks, have done so with a spirit of sweetness and helpfulness that makes us all "marvel at the mighty power of God." The new leaders are assuming their duties with a spirit of kindly consideration and appreciation of their predecessors which indicate that Christ is greater than all impulses of jealousy and vanity.

Iowa ought to be a strong Baptist state, not because of "much water there" but because it is a great rural field and Baptists have always been strong in reaching people who are free from the artificiality that perforce characterizes many of the city dwellers. It is a state which is not dominated by a single great city. It is made up of small cities, splendid towns, and a countryside unsurpassed. Her people are intelligent, thrifty and prosperous. We trust that the gathering of the Baptist hosts from the east, the west, the north, the south, may inspire this great state with a true estimate of her possibilities, set before her a vision which will challenge her people to dedicate their lives and resources to world wide service and thus make Christ king over all the earth.

We cannot enter upon a lengthy description of the many interesting things in Des Moines. The convention comes at a time in the world's history so pregnant with infinite meaning, that delegates will have little time for sight-seeing. May we briefly say, however, that Des Moines like all western cities, is passing through the changes incident to growing into that more permanent form of cosmopolitan life.

Des Moines covers an area of 54 square miles. It has about 130,000 inhabitants. It is a city of beautiful homes. It has 850 acres in its system of parks and play grounds. We mention here, only the larger parks such as Waveland, Greenwood, Union and Frase. The Des Moines river winds through the city; the Coon river also runs through the city intersecting the Des Moines river inside the city limits. There are four excellent golf courses, athletic grounds, and bathing beaches. There are 209 miles of paved streets and boulevards.

The Des Moines Civic Center on the river front will be interesting to the visitor; it shows what city planning can accomplish. Here are located in an attractive landscape various public and municipal buildings. These buildings consisting of the Municipal group, Coliseum, Public Library, and Post Office, are set on opposite sides of the river, which is spanned by five magnificent concrete bridges constructed at a cost of more than $2,000,000.

Municipal Efficiency

The Des Moines Chamber of Commerce is one of the most splendidly organized and aggressive chambers in the United States. The Bureau of Conventions arranged and entertained 145 state, national and world conventions last year. The department of Public Welfare has co-ordinated practically all the charitable and welfare organizations of the city. The budget it raised this spring in four days was $210,000 to be devoted specifically to charitable and welfare work. It is the business of this bureau to eliminate waste and duplications, and create efficiency.

Des Moines is an educational center. Here is located Des Moines University, the leading Baptist educational institution of the middle west. The Drake University fostered by the Disciples, which has made a name for itself all over the country, is also located here.

The hospitals of the city are extensive and complete in their equipment. The shopping, manufacturing and jobbing districts are extensive and attractive.

In a religious way, Des Moines has not seemed to keep pace with her commercial and welfare development. Nevertheless, the Protestant churches are beginning to sense this situation and plans are being laid for a better co-operation among the evangelical churches of the city. There are 110 churches of all denominations; there are 10 Baptist churches and chapels. The citizenship of Des Moines is educated and progressive, her people are most hospitable, and there is a growing appreciation of those cultural aspects of civilizations that mark an intellectual people.

The entire citizenship of Des Moines and especially the Baptists of the churches and Des Moines University, extend the "glad hand" and will give the visiting hosts of Baptists a royal welcome.

Des Moines University

BY L. D. OSBORN

GIRLS' DORMITORY

IN Highland Park, a fine residence suburb of Des Moines, three miles north of the business center, is located the new campus of Des Moines University on one of the two highest points in the city, the State House occupying the other. It is appropriate that the seat of government and the center of Christian education should thus occupy the two vantage points of the capital city of the state.

The University Heritage

Des Moines University, a fulfillment of the Iowa educational agreement of five years ago, is a new institution but with a rich and interesting educational inheritance. In its channel have united the streams of Burlington Collegiate Institute, organized in 1852, the Baptist interests of Central University of Iowa, established at Pella in 1853, Des Moines College, founded in 1865, Sac City Institute, organized in 1894, and Highland Park College, incorporated in 1889.

When the new educational policy was adopted by the Baptists of Iowa in 1916, Des Moines College was requested to continue the higher educational work of the denomination until $500,000 should have been raised, when the new college would be established. This condition having been fulfilled, Des Moines College transferred its educational work to the new institution in December of last year.

Meanwhile, Des Moines having been chosen as the location for the college, the board of trustees, in pursuance of the stipulated terms of consolidation, had secured a new campus by the purchase of Highland Park College which, founded in 1889, had been conducted largely as a school of technical and vocational training under a private board of trustees. In the spring of 1918 Des Moines College—faculty, students, office force, employees and equipment—were transferred from the old campus on Ninth St. in North Des Moines to the new campus in Highland Park, which has become the permanent location of the school.

For a time, during the transition period, the new institution was known as Union College of Iowa; but on Dec. 14, 1920, the board of trustees, with the unanimous approval of the Iowa Baptist State Convention, adopted the name, "Des Moines University." The university has been made the official Baptist college for the state of Iowa. It has also been approved by the Northern Baptist Convention, which has pledged to the institution $1,785,000 out of the hundred million dollar campaign now being carried on by the Baptists of the North.

The University Objective

Des Moines University, as appears from the foregoing sketch, is a union of colleges of liberal arts, housed in the educational plant of a school of pronounced technical and vocational interests. The aim of the new institution will be to amalgamate these two types of education, giving due emphasis to the practical needs of young people preparing for their life work, while still preserving the genuine cultural interests of liberal arts education. Higher education will not be supplanted by mere vocational training, but the educational values in modern life will be emphasized in such a way as to make young people familiar with the world in which they are to live, and to help them fulfil their obligations in it. In other words, circumstances have forced Des Moines University suddenly into a reorganization of curriculum which all colleges of liberal arts are facing and most of them trying to work out in a more deliberate way.

In undertaking this work, and in continuation of the religious aims that have characterized Baptist education in Iowa from the early days of the pioneers, the university has adopted the very definite objective of training Christian citizens and leaders. The problems of our modern life demand the intelligent understanding and vigorous leadership of men and women dominated by the Christian spirit. This Christian emphasis is, indeed, the chief justification of church-supported schools. Des Moines University aims to combine the two great factors of a well-rounded education for young people, namely—cultural, scientific, and technical training on the one hand, and on the other hand, the vital forces of Christianity.

Internal Organization

Des Moines University has adopted the title, "University," not in the sense of a graduate and research institution, but rather in that of a corporate collection of colleges and schools. Each of these schools is presided over by a dean or director. The president of the university is charged with the general administration, the public constituency, and the financial support of the school. The internal and educational administration has been committed to a newly appointed official, the chancellor. The business manager has general charge of the business affairs of the university, including the supervision of buildings and grounds.

The following colleges and schools are now in operation: College of Liberal Arts, College of Education, College of Engineering, College of Pharmacy, School of Fine Arts, Academy or Institute, the Extension Division, and two affiliated schools. The Danish Baptist Theological Seminary and the United Business Institutes. The question of curriculum is being carefully studied, and every effort will be made to establish such permanent departments and courses as will best meet the higher educational needs of young people today.

Personnel

Pres. John A. Earl having resigned, John W. Million, for the past twenty-five years connected with Hardin College, Mexico, Mo., has been elected as the new president, and assumed his duties June 1.

For the new office of chancellor, the board of trustees has chosen Loran D. Osborn, who for the past eight years has been professor of sociology and director of the extension division of the University of Colorado.

For the past three years, Mr. J. R. Vaughan has been the efficient business manager of the university, and will continue to serve in this capacity.

Carrying out its constructive aims for Christian education, the university has recently elected Rev. Howland Hanson, for fifteen years pastor of the First Church of Des Moines and more recently pastor of the Morgan Park (Ill.) Church, as professor of biblical literature and director of religious life.

The board of trustees is composed of denominational leaders and business and professional men who are devoting much time and energy to the interests of the school. In building up its faculty, the university is emphasizing not merely adequate educational preparation but strong Christian convictions and effective personality.

The Road Ahead

It is never wise to forecast the future, but nevertheless faith is the substance of things hoped for, and it is right that the possibilities of the future should be the inspiration of the present. It looks as if in Des Moines University the prayers and sacrifices and hopes of the Baptists of Iowa for a worthy part in the educational life of the state are at last to be fulfilled. The denomination is united and is facing toward the future. The university has a campus and educational plant capable of expansion to meet its growing needs. The city of Des Moines is friendly and co-operative. The student body is loyal and optimistic. Located as the university is in the heart of the great middle-western prairies, the influx of new students is certain to tax the resources of the institution to the utmost.

The great need of the university is more endowment and equipment. With the additional million dollars for endowment and $785,000 for buildings and equipment from the Baptist New World Movement, a good start will be made toward the building up in Des Moines of a great educational institution which for generations to come will discover and train leaders for denominational activities, for Christian citizenship, and for efficient service in industrial, business and professional life. What better field could anyone ask for the useful and safe investment of funds and annuity bonds?

Welcome, Baptists, to Des Moines

Des Moines University joins with the other Baptists of the city and of Iowa in extending a hearty welcome to the Northern Baptist Convention. It sincerely hopes that those who come will find time to visit the campus and buildings and to make the acquaintance of faculty and students. The summer school will be in full operation. The Highland Park street car or bus out Sixth Ave., to the end of the line will bring you to the doors of the university.

Information for Delegates Attending the Northern Baptist Convention

BY H. R. BEST,

Chairman Committee on Arrangements

DEPOTS—There are three depots: The Northwestern, the Rock Island, and the Union. The latter two are only a few steps apart. The Northwestern is on the east side, but good street car service to the place of registration.

PLACE OF REGISTRATION—At the Polk County Court House which is only a few steps from the Rock Island and Union Depots. Delegates should register the first thing after arrival.

RECEPTION COMMITTEE—It will be the aim to meet all trains and direct all delegates and help them with their baggage, and render such other courtesies as are necessary. Make yourself known to the man with the badge.

THE COLISEUM—Located at First and Locust Streets. This is the meeting place of all the sessions of the Convention.

HEADQUARTERS HOTEL—The Ft. Des Moines is the official headquarters. It is located at 10th and Walnut Sts. Various board and committee meetings will be held here, except the Publication Society headquarters which will be in Randolph Hotel, 4th and Court Sts.

HOTELS AND EATING PLACES—A long list of these will be posted at the place of "Information" at the Coliseum. Des Moines has fine hotel facilities; probably no commercial city of its size surpasses it. You can also find many good eating places at a reasonable rate. You will note that the hotel rate is not excessive where two stay in a room. The rates are the same as have been charged all other recent conventions. It is a uniform rate and you will find the proprietors courteous and fair. We strongly advise all delegates to select some one with whom to room and make their reservations in advance. This is necessary to properly handle the crowd. The matter of hotel rates was investigated by the special committee from the Executive Committee of the N. B. C. and declared "satisfactory." Also, delegates may secure bed and breakfast in private homes at reasonable rates by writing at once to Mr. F. E. Goodell, 3620 Adams St., Des Moines, Iowa. However, it should be kept in mind that an eight-cent street car fare and a goodly distance from the center are features to be considered. The Committee will do what it can to find homes for those, who insist on "Running true to form," and neglect reserving lodging before arriving, but cannot guarantee anything. So please "play safe" and reserve at once.

LOCATION OF CHURCHES—A list of all city churches will be posted at "Information." Only the down-town group are mentioned here: The Central Presbyterian, St. Marks Episcopal, Plymouth Congregational, First M. E., Central Christian, St. Johns Lutheran, First Baptist, and others are all in a group at and near the intersection of High and 8th Streets.

PLACES OF INTEREST—We are not offering any Niagara Falls nor Board Walks. This is a Convention where every Baptist should give earnest heed to the saving of the world, and should not spend either his own nor the churches money to "take a trip" and incidentally attend the N. B. C. A mighty host should gather. Such places as are necessary to the delegates, will be indicated at "Information." The Post Office and Public Library are only a few steps from the Coliseum. The Chamber of Commerce is located at the Hotel Savery, 4th and Locust Sts. This body has rendered a great service in preparing for the Convention. The various bureaus there are always ready to co-operate with the

Speak Quickly if You Want One.

A supply of books published in Burma, entitled, "American Baptist Missions in Burma 1920" has just been received at the office of the Foreign Mission Society. These books contain superbly illustrated, well written and fascinating accounts of the work of Baptist missions in the great field where Adoniram Judson began his missionary career more than 100 years ago. Rev. and Mrs. E. N. Harris are the editors. In an unusual way they have combined literary excellence with comprehensiveness in treatment in their review of missionary effort in Burma during the past year. A unique feature of the book is that it was printed by our own Baptist mission press in Rangoon, of which Mr. F. D. Phinney has for nearly forty years been the efficient superintendent. The Foreign Mission Society will be pleased to mail a complimentary copy to every pastor or other Baptist leader who applies for it, so long as the limited supply is available. Applications should be addressed to Secretary William B. Lippard, 276 Fifth Ave., New York City.

Some Results of New World Money Among the Mexicans in the Southwest.

Quarterly reports from 19 mission stations maintained by the Home Mission Society in cooperation with the State Conventions of Kansas, Colorado, Arizona, and California, among the Mexicans show the following very encouraging data:

Sermons preached in Spanish	482
Religious visits to Mexican homes	2,567
Spanish Bibles distributed	217
Pages of Spanish tracts distributed	27,559
Baptisms	140
Total number of members	595
Number in Sunday School	751
Amount contributed, all purposes	$996.94
Pastors	19
Lady missionaries (Women's Board)	10

But even at that, the reports cannot tabulate for us the spiritual results from changed lives, enlightened homes, and

The Evangelism of Hope

Miss Jessie Burrall was a member of the editorial staff of the Geographic Magazine when she accepted a position on the faculty of Stevens College, Missouri. The accompanying picture shows members of the Burrall Class, Washington, D. C., leaving the Orpheum at the close of a Sunday morning Bible study period. Miss elevated ideals and standards, nor the amelioration of national antipathies through entrance into true Christian Brotherhood, nor the gain for democratization through the spread of genuine Baptist principles.—E. R. Brown, General Missionary.

Burrall will give an address entitled "The Evangelism of Life," Monday afternoon of Convention week at Des Moines at the Conference on Evangelism under the auspices of the American Baptist Home Mission Society and the Evangelistic Committee of the Northern Baptist Convention. Subject and speaker compel attention.

Sunrise for the Mono.

After the moving picture "Sunrise for the Mono" had been shown at one of the conventions one pastor said:

"I am not emotional, and do not give way to my feelings, but I sat with the tears rolling down my cheeks all the time those pictures were being shown."

A woman said:

"I will give my missionary money more gladly and freely hereafter."

Another man was so deeply impressed by the missionary spirit of the pictures that the next day he began to make arrangements to open an every-night mission for the miners of that place in an empty store building.

Here Comes the Bride!

IT is June. And here comes the bride; but not at all as you might expect to see her looking; for spotless white and orange blossoms are in fearfully poor taste in other parts of the globe—"parts" so vast and sweeping in extent that it behooves some of us to know how the rest of us, with whom white is saved for times of mourning and such dirgeful occasions, get married.

They say (whoever this ubiquitous "They" may be) that all the world loves a lover, but one wonders what half the world knows about lovers, anyhow, since one-fourth of the human race (400,000,000 persons, that is!) live in China, where a go-between arranges weddings for the two "sight unseen" parties; and another 315,000,000 persons live in India where parents cook up marriages when the bride may still be cooing in her cradle and the groom nearly tottering into his grave; not to mention a rough half-billion more of couples in Persia, Arabia, Egypt, Turkey, Africa who have small chance to woo in person.

But even if some of the world's young people are not permitted to do their own courting, at least they must do their own marrying; and one follows the red-gowned Chinese bride, for instance, with sympathetic eyes through the various stages of "getting a mother-in-law," the Chinese equivalent for saying marriage: beginning, as it does, with the solemn manoeuvres of the go-between, glorifying to each set of parents the perfections of the other party in the marriage. Possibly the first inkling of a wedding which the bride herself receives is a laquer tray of presents from the groom—jade earrings, bracelets, silver hairpins, a carved box of sweetmeats. Huge red boxes are soon packed with her trousseau: trousers and jackets and fans, her slippers and bead headbands and jewelry. Then the red sedan chair is ordered, that flowery crimson palanquin in which only a bride ever rides; and she, gowned in gorgeous red garments, covered with a red gauze veil—red being the symbol of good luck.

The bridal procession starts from her father's house, with the bride struggling and sobbing—a Chinese custom, this protesting—though well they must feel like struggling, with a strange groom waiting at the journey's end, and the inevitable ogre of a mother-in-law! But her cheeks, well-painted for the nuptials, must not get cracked, so she does her sobbing skillfully beneath the gay red veil. Behind her chair march servants in great pomp, bearing the red trousseau boxes, and ahead of her her father rides to deliver his goods in true ceremonial style.

Bells clang; ten thousand fire crackers seem to be spluttering their sharp pop-pings in the air. Incense puffs in through the curtains of her litter; tom-toms clash; the chair carriers march more slowly and more proudly: she knows she is reaching "his" outer gate—and her heart beats wild and sick.

The chair is set down. Silence. Then quick steps approach. A man's hands part the chair curtains and she is lifted up into his arms and carried across the threshold,—a trifling walk no bride has ever taken, since stumbling there would be a fatal omen. The bridegroom also lifts her over the marriage-fire burning on the doorstep, to drive away any evil spirits clinging to her wedding garments.

Then, red veil still shielding her, she kneels beside him, and three times they touch their foreheads to the ground, once to worship the spirits of his ancestors and once to worship his living parents. Then the veil is lifted, and the wedding guests make free comment on her beauty—or her lack of it; after which endless feasting is in order, three days of it, during which she sits in a room apart, visited occasionally by women relatives of his, while the groom feasts with the men. And thus is married another "Walk-Behind"—that meek respectful Chinese name for one who during all her years of matrimony will hobble softly in the rear of his Augustness, but never side by side.

As for the Japanese bride, she, it is true, is dressed in a white kimono, but not for beauty's sake, but to signify that she has died to her family and will never leave her husband's house except as a corpse. The marriage broker having suitably arranged the match, the bride in white is borne away at nightfall to her new home, escorted by the middleman and his wife. The parental house is swept out on her departure, and in former days a bonfire was even lighted at the gate: ceremonies indicative of the purification required after the removal of a dead body—not gay sweeping for the little bride!

The wedding, which takes place as soon as she reaches the house of her husband's parents, is really a dinner party, the distinguishing feature of which is "san-san ku-do," literally "three-three, nine times,"—because both the bridegroom and the bride drink three times out of each of three wine cups of different sizes, making nine times in all. It is a mere sipping, however. Another essential part of the ceremony is the changing of garments, for the bride puts on a kimono given her by her husband as soon as she reaches his house, discarding the white mourning; but immediately after the ceremonial drinking she retires and puts on a colored kimono brought from her own home; the bridegroom meanwhile has also changed, after which the feast goes on until the middleman leads the couple into the bridal chamber, where they pledge each other in nine more cups of wine. It is significant that the husband as lord and master now drinks first; for earlier, in her quality of guest, the bride drank first.

One can hardly blame a father in India for dreading daughters, since his religion teaches him that to save his immortal soul his girls must be married young—but oh, the money it costs! Poor man. He must begin looking about for a husband before the girl becomes eleven, and when once he is "settled on" her mother puts a veil over the girl's head and dyes the ends of her fingers pink making her "purdah masheen," "one who sits behind the curtain," one who may never again in all her life walk beyond the zenana, the four confining walls of the women's quarters.

Her father makes a great feast for five days, to which everybody may come, friends or strangers. (Expensive? Yes.) There are processions by night, with torches and fireworks, and music and noise. Besides this her father must scatter money among the people in the streets and let them scramble for it, as a generous marriage display "fixes" a Hindu father so securely in the next world. It is well he has that satisfaction, since it often ruins him in this world!

The bridegroom meanwhile has a formula all his own to go through, consisting of making offerings, having his head shaved, then setting off in pretended search for a wife. Unable to find one, he turns toward some river in despair, supposedly to take his life, but a friend comes to his rescue and offers to find him a bride. Whereupon they set out in a gorgeous procession to her home, all the people staring. Side by side the bride and groom sit down while the priests repeat texts. Then the feet of the bridegroom are washed in water and milk, after which a yoke is held over the head of the little Hindu bride, while the bridegroom repeats texts to her, and pours water on her head. Then he ties around her neck the marriage badge, a thin round piece of gold—always worn—attached to a yellow cord. Oil is put on their heads, offerings are made, more texts repeated. Later they walk together around a fire and touch a certain stone with their feet.

All this takes place on the first day; then for four more days come endless offerings to the gods, more texts, more money scattered about, more feasting for all the world that may choose to come! He must be rich indeed who marries off more than one daughter, you see. After five days of feasting in her home, there are three days of feasting in his house,—then bickerings between all the female relatives cooped hopelessly within zenana walls for endless years to come.

In Africa, the Zulus have a proverb: "One plow is worth six wives," which tells its own brief history of that bit of chattel—a mere woman-thing. It was Henry Stanley who wrote home to England: "It requires twelve goats and three hoes in Ukerewe to purchase a wife from her parents"; while another explorer writes: "A Masai woman has a market value equal to five large glass beads, while a cow is worth ten times as much."

So when it comes to the wedding, behold! it is mostly a matter of bargaining in the palaver house. The would-be bridegroom lays down his brass rods and kettles, or his glass beads, or his hoes, or his goat, and for money received the father lets him take off the bit of flesh he's bought to do his drudgery: to build his hut of stout bark, to thatch his roof with palm leaves, to mould his pottery, to cultivate his garden patch, to cook his meals. Moreover if he dies, his brother inherits all his property, including wives: so widowhood is brief indeed. A scant hour or two, it may be; a day; a week—if by chance husband number two is off in the jungle hunting and has not heard his luck. Small wonder she is strung round with "charms," strange fetishes to protect her against everything under the sun—charms for loving, hating, buying, selling, gardening, walking, eating, hunting, and ah yes! a charm for marrying, too. She needs it.

Women's rights? It almost seems as if the choicest right we have is to say with calm precision: "I'll be an old maid, thank you, sir!" There are none in the heathen lands, you know.

The Things That Grew on Ruddy

By PEGGY

YOU will remember how Uncletim saved the day when Bill and the baseball team called on Ruddy, who had broken his ankle: how they were all tongue-tied until Uncletim happened along and suggested "Hobnobbing with Kings." Well, there is a sequel to that story, for the next week Bill came home from school with an invitation very neatly written which read as follows:

"Dear Sir:

"The squad is going to make another call on Ruddy, and it will likely be an awfully stupid one unless you can come along, too. We will let you set your own date. Just tell Bill, and we'll be there.

"Respectfully yours,

"The Squad."

Uncletim said he had rarely had such a flattering invitation, which he was delighted to accept for Thursday afternoon after school. So Bill dashed off to school, delighted, and mother said to Uncletim: "Timothy, are you made of stunts to amuse small boys? What will you ever do this time?"

"I'm sure I don't know," laughed Uncletim, who was actually going to be the speaker at the Chamber of Commerce dinner that noon!

Thursday came, and the squad filed into Ruddy's bed-room boisterously.

"Hello there, Ruddy," they sang out. But in exactly five minutes the same queer flat silence fell on them all, and nobody knew exactly what to say next! So it was an immense relief when Uncletim marched in, straight from addressing a bankers' meeting, if you please. In fact, he had to leave that meeting early to meet another "appointment"—the boys never forgot his kindness in doing that, you may be sure.

Uncletim said you could almost cut the silence in that room! But he sat down and said to Ruddy: "Well sir, I see you've got a carpenter's tool-box in bed with you!"

"Wh-at?" gasped Ruddy, looking all over the bed, "Why no, sir, there's no tool-box!"

"Surely I'm not mistaken," said Uncletim slowly, "doesn't anyone else see a carpenter's tool-box on Ruddy?"

"Ah-ha!" quoth Bill laughing, "it is a game,—I know you!" And he looked at Ruddy long and hard to find that tool-box, but not a thing could he see. Nor could the other boys.

"How curious!" sighed Uncletim, "am I seeing things that don't exist, or isn't there a chest on him?"

"Ha! Ha!" roared the team, in high appreciation, while Ruddy rubbed his chest and grinned delightedly. So Uncletim pulled out a pad of paper from his pocket, and gave each boy a sheet of it on which to write their guesses about the other things that grew on Ruddy. Suppose you list your own guesses, and next week we will print a correct list here.

"First of all, I see two lids on Ruddy," said Uncletim.

"Easy!" sighed the team and wrote down eyelids. But the others in the set were not so simple.

"Second, I notice he has two noisy musical instruments; can you guess them? And third, he has twenty small articles used by every carpenter. Fourth, I see two lofty trees that grow in warm climates, know them? While fifth, I find two good fishes on his feet!"

"Dear me!" laughed Ruddy, "no wonder I slipped and broke my ankle." But just the same, those fishes were hard to guess.

"Sixth," said Uncletim, "I find he is simply covered with a number of shell fishes. Seventh, he has a fine stag inside him, and eighth a number of small shy animals on his head, the kind with oot-tontails."

"You're a star hunter, Ruddy," laughed Sam, while the others busily thought and thought what these things could possibly be.

"Ninth, he has two playful farm animals on his legs, and tenth a number of weather-cocks all over him; eleventh two implements of war to brandish in the air; twelfth, whips without handles; thirteenth, the steps of a hotel; fourteenth, the two sides of a vote; and some fine spring flowers are fifteenth."

"I'm quite a boy!" Ruddy admitted, "a little of everything, it seems to me!"

"Sixteenth, you've got some fruit in your neck! Seventeenth, you have two scholars in your eyes; and eighteenth, you have ten Spanish noblemen to wait on various parts of your body! Nineteenth, I observe that on your face you have a nervy way out of difficulties; and twentieth, a very poor bed inside your throat! For number twenty-one, you've got a desert place, midway; and for twenty-two, two black lines over your eyes seem to say to me what Nebuchadnezzar must have said when he was eating grass!"

Ruddy grinned: "I'll have to get used to myself," he said, "I guess my mother would be pretty surprised if she knew about the trees and animals and fishes and beds and desert places and noblemen I have growing on me!"

"Uncletim, you're a brick! How did you ever think all this up, anyhow?"

Uncletim was correcting their papers, but he answered, smiling: "Oh, it's not original. Once upon a time there was a man named Bishop Wilberforce who made these riddles, so I'm simply passing them on to you. Sam, you have the most right; Jim, you're second; Bill, you're third. As for Ruddy, he seems to have spent most of his time laughing at himself."

"But it was fun, sir, I had no idea I was so many things at once."

Bill laughed: "I've the same things growing on me, haven't I, Uncletim?"

"We all have!" said Uncletim, and Ruddy was glad to find he had so many queer companions. As a matter-of-fact, you have every one of these things on you, so guess hard, and look for the correct answers next week.

"How Do You Do?"

ON THE other page there are stories about weddings in other countries, so different from ours, yet so right in their eyes. Did you know that there are also a great many different ways of saying, "How do you do?"

The French people say, "How do you carry yourself?" while the Italians ask, "How do you find yourself?" The Dutch say, "How do you fare?" and the Germans, "How goes it?" while in Sweden the greeting is, "How can you?"

The Egyptian question is due to the hot climate, of course—"How do you perspire?" they ask their friends! The Chinese say two short sentences—"How is your stomach? Have you eaten your rice?" While in Africa the Mpongwe greeting is, "What is the news?" and the conventional answer—"Good news, but for the hunger."

The Polish ask, "How do you have yourself?" and the Russian says, "How do you live on?" When a Persian greets a friend he politely remarks, "May thy shadow never be less," meaning may your

CHOOSING A LIFE-WORK
(WHAT ARE THE GUIDING PRINCIPLES?)

II Tim. 2:1-26.

"Do your utmost to let God see that you at least are a sound workman, with no need to be ashamed of the way you handle the word of Truth."

The summer assemblies, conferences, and conventions will soon be on. Hundreds of our young people will be brought face to face with the question of choosing a life work. We are presenting this week two papers by our denominational leaders. They were prepared especially for young people and we feel quite sure will be of real value in furnishing guiding principles.

WHAT CONSTITUTES A CALL TO THE MINISTRY?

By E. Y. MULLINS

President Southern Baptist Theological Seminary

I AM requested to state briefly what constitutes a call to the ministry. In what I am saying I am seeking to reproduce in my own language the teaching of Scripture. To me it is evident that the Scripture recognizes the principle of a divine call to the ministry.

The elements which enter into a divine call may be stated as follows:

1. An abiding conviction of duty or desire to enter the ministry and serve God in this way. I say it should be a conviction or a desire. By conviction I mean a sense of duty. Some men are impelled into the ministry, not because they desire it so much as because they are inwardly convinced that God's spirit is calling them to the work. They cannot escape.

I have used the qualifying word abiding, because the sense of duty should be permanent. One's feelings may fluctuate, of course. The sense of duty may be feebler sometimes than at others, but if it keeps coming back and refuses to "down," as it were, it may be called permanent or abiding. If a man can shake off the sense of duty permanently, and rest in mind and heart in other pursuits, the conviction is not such as I have in mind.

In some cases it is not so much a sense of duty as a desire. This also is permanent. A man feels that he will be unhappy in any other pursuit. Whether, therefore, a call takes the form of a sense of duty or a desire, if it is abiding, it is most probably from God.

2. Of course personal fitness in body and mind and spirit is necessary. A man must be a regenerate man, he must have a reasonable degree of health, and he must have some aptness to teach or capacity for acquiring aptness to teach, or else he will not be a success in the ministry. Usually God shows a man these latter qualities by using him in Christian work, in the Sunday school or young people's organizations, or otherwise. Then, too, the opinions of the brethren usually coincide and agree in the opinion that God is calling the young man into the ministry.

Thus there is an inward call and an outward one. The two harmonize. The above elements which enter into it contain only the essentials. There are many variations in the experiences of men who are called into the ministry. God has manifold ways of making his will clear. No two men have exactly the same experience. Where there is perplexity or doubt, earnest prayer, consultation with friends and reading the Scriptures will usually in time develop into clearness the divine call, or show that it is not a call to the ministry.

WHAT CONSTITUTES A CALL TO MISSIONARY WORK AT HOME OR ABROAD?

By ELIZABETH S. SARGENT

Associate Foreign Secretary of the Woman's American Baptist Foreign Mission Society

"A NEED plus a need you know, plus a need you can fill is a call." This definition was given by a veteran missionary of China to a group of a thousand or more students. It is such a simple statement, yet as with all truth, holds within itself a mass of wisdom.

A Need—This is not a wish or desire but a need often unknown by the individual himself of the eternal salvation through Jesus Christ.

A Known Need—Anyone who dares to call himself the high name Christian, should make it his first business as a servant of the King to inform himself concerning the King's affairs. This involves the knowledge of the eternal well-being of the least human being in the remote corners of the earth as well as that of his neighbor. The clerk who knows only the routine work each day and makes no search for added knowledge concerning the broader interests of the business is still a clerk. But he who knows the larger job above him, is in line for speedy promotion. It is as surely true of the so-called Christian, who does not acquaint himself with the wider interests of the kingdom, that he will remain a so-called Christian. Ignorance of the law does not release the follower of Jesus Christ from spiritual obligations, for now if ever the vast amount of live, readable literature can be had for the asking from the denominational boards and Student Volunteer Movement, and books, plays, pageants and innumerable missionary periodicals can be purchased. Therefore, "I did not know" is only an excuse and fails to be a reason for not having heard the call.

A Need You Can Fill—In considering the third part, many factors need enter as personal, family, health, equipment, obligations etc. The question is not "Why should I an avowed Christian be a missionary?" but rather, "Why should I not be a missionary?" A young woman now in China is there simply because she failed to find an answer to this second question. Because of family obligations, or poor health, many a person has found the answer that has kept them at home. Lack of equipment may sometimes be overcome, unless the realization of this challenge comes too late in life. Adaptability, sense of humor, ability to do team work and many other things enter into the personal equation factor. The first part of the definition "the need" exists, the second part, "the knowledge" of the need can be acquired, therefore, upon this third part depends the answer to the "call." No special, unusual sign from heaven but a calm honest facing of facts, with your will in line with the will of God, your Heavenly Father, your Master, is the "Call."

Washington, D. C., Letter

Just received a mighty nice little book called "Our B. Y. P. U." and a note from Mr. Clinger advising me that you had requested him to send it. Thanks Jim, and I will do a little advertising for you.

I have not had a chance to read it yet—except the outline but it "looks good to me" and will go over it as rapidly as possible, and if have any "caustic comments" will forward same???

Wish you would send me thirty R. R. certificates for reduced fares. That is a few more than I will require, I think, because most of our delegates are not returning here, but going on to homes in the west for vacations.

I can SEE seventeen delegates out of Washington now and am hoping for twenty-five.

We have a whale of a meeting tomorrow night. Baltimore B. Y. P. U. is returning our recent "call." They have been working for 350 and will have a special train. We expect to put over 500 Washington people into the meeting.

Alexandria, Virginia, is coming in on a special electric train with 100 people.

Oh things are "coming our way" down here, as sure as you live. In the fall I hope it will be possible to have you come this way, and we will stage a "humdinger."

I have been trying to interest Brooklyn and Philadelphia to send their delegates "via Washington"—Brooklyn has responded and will do so. Haven't had a line from Philadelphia about it since December when Mr. Hill promised to present it to his board. Guess he "fell in."

Jawn.

A Review of Contemporary Denominational Biography

BY WILLIAM B. LIPPHARD

F. WAYLAND AYER

FABULOUS sums are spent in advertising, as high as $10,000 being charged for the back cover page in a single issue of a leading magazine. In this business, the firm of N. W. Ayer & Son of Philadelphia have not only been pioneers but have also been marvelously successful. The firm was established by F. Wayland Ayer with his father the late N. W. Ayer in 1860, and has been continued under the capable direction of the son.

The fiftieth anniversary of the firm in 1919 was the occasion of a remarkable celebration and demonstration by the business interests of America. Captains of industry, leaders in journalism and men whose names are mentioned with reverence in the realms of business, paid tribute to the merited prestige and the distinguished success of this advertising organization. Some of the greatest corporations in the world are clients of N. W. Ayer & Son, and few advertising firms have been able to maintain their advertising on so high a moral plane.

While Mr. Ayer is thus admired and respected in business, he will always be held in honor and esteem by the denomination because of his great service as a layman. Back in 1915 when the missionary societies were burdened with debts he led the campaign which liquidated their deficits. In 1918 he was chairman of the National Committee of Northern Baptist Laymen, which organized and conducted the million dollar campaign. In view of its success he was unanimously requested to continue and in 1919 the laymen under his leadership carried through the Victory Campaign. He was a member of the Committee of Five, whose study and recommendation resulted in the organization of the General Board of Promotion. In New Jersey Mr. Ayer has for years been actively identified with the work of the State Convention, and in 1918-1919 he was president of the Northern Baptist Convention. Numerous denominational committees have profited by his wise and helpful counsel. The denomination owes him a debt of gratitude which can only inadequately be expressed.

TEN years ago two colleges in Iowa were engaged in a relentless competition and a struggle for existence. Today Des Moines University, a union of the two, has an enrollment of 1056 students and assets of more than $2,000,000. This splendid achievement is largely due to the untiring and devoted efforts of Dr. John A. Earl, since 1911 president of Des Moines College and recently of the new university. On June 1 he begins his service as pastor of the First Church of St. Paul, Minn.

Dr. Earl was born in Scotland and came to America as a youth of seventeen years of age. He has been trained in the school of hard work, having engaged in mining both in Scotland and America. He is also an unusual product of denominational education, having been graduated from Des Moines Academy, Des Moines College and Rochester Theological Seminary. He has had three successful pastorates, including three years at Greece, N. Y., twelve years at the First Church, Waterloo, Iowa, and five years at the Belden Avenue Church, of Chicago.

As a preacher Dr. Earl has consistently and successfully emphasized evangelism. For several seasons he assisted the late Dr. J. Wilbur Chapman and he has frequently had charge of the evangelistic meetings at the Northern Baptist Convention. Fourteen years, with only slight intervals of rest, he has conducted the Sunday-school lesson page in "The Standard" and more recently in THE BAPTIST. Under his direction millions of dollars have been raised in the dedication of churches and in support of education. As a capable college administrator, his record and achievements at Des Moines speak louder than any words of praise.

Naturally Dr. Earl has also made a large contribution in general denominational service. At the present time he is a member of the Iowa State Convention, a member of the executive committee of the convention and of the General Board of Promotion. The challenging program for the convention at Des Moines is largely the result of his painstaking work as chairman of the program committee.

ERNEST L. TUSTIN

ELEVEN men have served the denomination as presidents of the Northern Baptist Convention. They include four lawyers, four educators and three business men. The fourth lawyer to have been awarded this distinguished honor is Senator Ernest L. Tustin of the law firm of Tustin and Wesley of Philadelphia. The state of Pennsylvania holds his birthplace and has furnished his education at Bucknell University and at the University of Pennsylvania. His entire legal and political career has been spent in this state. For two terms he was senator from the fourth district of Pennsylvania and for four years he has served as recorder of the city of Philadelphia.

Senator Tustin is evidently a man of wide and varied interests. It is an imposing array of organizations—political, religious, historical, educational, denominational, social, eleemosynary—with which he is connected. Limitations of space permit mentioning only a few, which include the Crozer Theological Seminary, Bucknell University, the American Baptist Publication Society, the Hahnemann Hospital, the American Colonial Society, the Council of National Defense, the Committee on Public Safety, the executive committee of the Northern Baptist Convention and the General Board of Promotion. Notwithstanding the pressure of time required for his extensive legal practice, he has been able to render exceptional service to these many organizations in which he has taken so deep an interest.

The Northern Baptist Convention acted wisely when it elected him as president and the guidance of the sessions at Des Moines will be in capable hands.

REVIEW: "THE SOCIAL TASK OF THE CHURCH"

Golden Text: Rev. 21:3

By JOHN A. EARL

The lessons of the last quarter have covered the field of social service. Beginning with the ideal Christian in relation to his God, to his neighbor and to himself, the lessons considered health and work and wealth and education and recreation and cooperation. Then passing to the institutions of society, the home, the neighborhood, the nation, the world and the entire social order were studied with a view of making them Christian. We now come in the review to the social task of the church. The social task of the church in general is to make the world Christian by christianizing its individuals and institutions. But in order to make the world Christian it is necessary to create a social consciousness, develop a social conscience and promote a social Christianity. These three things constitute the immediate and intensive social task of the church.

Social Consciousness

By social consciousness is meant the sustained feeling on the part of the Christian church that society is an organism in the large as the human body is an organism in the small. Every normal man is conscious of himself as an organism. It needs no argument to convince him that a headache will affect his whole body, or that a wound in his little finger will be felt throughout his entire nervous system. He is in prime physical condition only when the integrity of his body is perfect. If this consciousness could be increased in such a measure as to take in society, then the normal man would be as conscious of the unity of society as he is of the unity of his own body. There never was a time when a man was so conscious of others as he is today. They jostle him on the street, they crowd against him in elevators, they endanger his life by driving automobiles when he attempts to cross the street, they suffocate him in congested street cars. It is almost impossible to be alone. Someone has facetiously said that in our cities we have everything in common even to our whispers. And yet with all this consciousness of the presence of others, we are still far from being conscious that society is a body. Even in the church this consciousness is largely lacking. The work of the church is still carried on in a large measure on the basis of ministering to individuals. The preparations of ministers of the gospel in colleges and theological schools often lacks articulation with the social task of the church. The young theologian may know the Nicene Creed but he does not know the history and principles of modern economics. He may know how Paul solved the problem of circumcision, but he does not know how to solve the problem of poverty and wealth or the problem of the negro in America. Therefore the immediate social task of the church is to create among its own members a consciousness of the vital unity of society as an organism which needs to be treated with the same intelligent care that marks the care of the human body by intelligent and responsible people.

Social Conscience

It is quite possible to create a social consciousness without developing a social conscience. There are many academic people in the world who know that society is an organism and can tell impressively how it came to be an organism and what its functions are; but their interest in society ends with knowledge. They do not regard themselves as in any way responsible for the organism. They know physiology but they care nothing about hygiene. Health and wealth, work and play, education and cooperation are so many themes for investigation and discussion and not vital functions of the organism of society which call for red-blooded service and sacrifice on the part of the members of society. The home, the state, and the nations of the world are interesting institutions which have come up to their present form through a long evolution, according to these academic philosophers, but they have no conscience about the disintegration of the home through divorce and the things that lead to divorce. Like the Pharisees whom Jesus condemned they say and do not.

What is needed today is a social conscience. The sense of obligation for social conditions needs to be developed in and out of the church. It took a long time to arouse the church in America to the menace of the drink traffic, and the rest of the world is still far behind America in this respect; but if conscience can be aroused on one thing it can be aroused on others. The economic question as it affects industry, and the industry as it affects the home, and the home as it affects the neighborhood, and the neighborhood as it affects the nation, and the nation as it affects international relations need a conscience that will respond to justice. The social task of the church is preeminently the development of conscience or the sense of obligation to christianize society. The evangelistic task of the church is now a social task as well as a personal task. The evolution of the Salvation Army with its hotels, homes, employment agencies and many other social institutions is proof that evangelism must broaden. "Soup, soap and salvation" is the motto of a famous city mission. A salvation that is yoked up with a social service that involves soup and soap is necessarily a social salvation. The sense of obligation which the church cherishes to save souls must not be weakened; but with it must come the added sense of obligation for the salvation of society.

Social Christianity

Christianity is inherently social. Whoever was responsible for making Christianity an individualistic affair committed a crime against the church. The New Testament is the revelation of a social spirit. The church of Pentecost was the type of a social Christianity. "They were of one heart and one soul." It is the social task of the church to promote social Christianity among its members by destroying all class distinctions, by constantly emphasizing in teaching and practice the democracy of the Lord's Supper when all eat of the same bread and all drink of the common cup, and by keeping before the church without break the truth that the church is a body living in the world and yet not of the world in order that society as it expresses itself in all of its organized activities may take on the spirit and form of the church which is the body of Christ.

Daily Vacation Bible Schools Chicago Plan

Daily Vacation Bible Schools are thriving in the Chicago area as in no other region of the United States. The prospect now is, that there will be 200 schools this coming summer enrolling more than 25,000 boys and girls, and the call is now going out from the churches for upwards of 2,000 teachers to man them. To mobilize 2,000 teachers and corral 25,000 boys and girls in 200 church centers, requires the strenuous effort of many men and women who are enthusiastic for the cause.

Last year there were 164 schools and 200 co-operating churches with an average enrollment of 134 per school totaling 21,400. The recorded number of teachers totaled 1716. The schools were non-sectarian, as will be seen by the fact that 60 per cent were Protestant, 26 per cent Catholic, and 14 per cent other preference or no preference. Sectarianism does not thrive in a Daily Vacation Bible School atmosphere. It may be said also, that racial prejudices tend to melt away, for thirty-five different nationalities daily pledge allegiance to one flag.

The Chicago area is not only unique in that it fosters more schools and enrolls more children than in any other similar region in the United States, or in the world for that matter, but it is unique in that it is coming to be known as the "Chicago Plan" of promotion, organization, and teacher training. The "Chicago Plan" is simple, but effective, and, most of all, it is democratic.

Commencement at Acadia

By A. C. CHUTE

Acadia's eighty-third anniversary was held during the week beginning Sunday morning the twenty-third of May. Favored with good weather and abundance of apple-bloom, the many visitors at turning homeward have been speaking enthusiastically of this year's closing exercises.

The baccalaureate sermon was preached by Dr. A. N. Marshall, Pastor of the First Baptist Church of Ottawa, Canada. The subject was "Gymnastics and Godliness." In a virile and persuading manner the speaker showed his great audience life's highest purpose, and some of the means tributary thereto. In the evening Rev. Austin Kempton, of the Broadway Baptist Church, Cambridge, Mass., delivered one of his drama sermons. Within sight of the cupola of the old college, Mr. Kempton was born and reared, the son of a beloved minister gone to his reward, so that this, together with the wide interest the drama sermons have awakened, brought together another great audience. And the people went away again with a blessing.

An outstanding event of the commencement season was the dedication of a fine stone gymnasium erected at a cost of $120,000. It has been reared as a memorial of the sixty-three noble fellows from Acadia who fell in the late war. The address in connection with the formal opening of the building, the finest Canadian building of the sort east of Toronto, was delivered by a returned man, Milton F. Gregg, a former student among us, the only man from the Maritime Provinces who received in the war the high honor of the Victoria Cross. This was awarded him at Cambrai in September, 1918. The address was most appropriate and worthy of the occasion. A dedicatory prayer was offered by Dr. T. H. Mac Donald, pastor of the Wolfville Baptist Church, who was himself long in the war-zone serving as chaplain.

On Tuesday afternoon a new feature was introduced, and one likely to be perpetuated. To the cemetery, where rest departed presidents and professors, the friends repaired in a body. Pausing at each grave, a few appropriate words were spoken by one previously chosen to do so. Warm tributes of affection were thus uttered in succession for those who rest from their labors, and evergreens were dropped on the graves by those who passed reverently by. In this way were recalled the faithful services of Prof. Isaac Chipman, of Presidents Cramp, Crawley and Sawyer, of Professors Higgins, Caldwell, Jones, Tufts, and Haycock, and of one of the prominent benefactors of a generation ago, Mr. John W. Barrs. "Their works do follow them."

The attendance at the college during the year has been large, and the graduating class has been the largest in the history of the institution. Since December 2, work has been carried on with a handicap, owing to the fire which then robbed us of our main building. But the best has been made of the situation, and conditions better than we have ever had cannot be far off in the future. A campaign for the raising of a million dollars has been started. Not only the college but also the boys' academy and the ladies' seminary are to share in advantages from the outlay of what is contributed and to realize some long-cherished expectations. The New York and New England Alumni have assumed the responsibility of raising $100,000; and it is hoped an equal amount may come from Montreal and Ottawa. Mr. John D. Rockefeller, who has generously befriended Acadia in the past, has offered to give one dollar for every three raised from other sources, that is, to supplement $750,000 by his gift of $250,000. And in addition to this he has kindly donated outright the sum of $12,500 to aid in the current expenses until the entire million is secured. The undertaking is indeed a heavy one for us, especially in these times of depression, but true to our past, marked by faith and courage, nothing short of full success can satisfy us. Resolutions expressing large appreciation of what President Cutten has done hitherto, and fullest confidence in his continued leadership, as well as determination to aid him in every possible way in the bearing of the burden which comes upon his shoulders, were enthusiastically passed at the meeting of the Alumni Association during commencement week.

Five Honorary Degrees were given. The degree of Doctor of Divinity came to Rev. Austin T. Kempton, of Cambridge, one of the many men Acadia has contributed to the Baptist ministry of the United States. He is chairman of the New England branch of the Million Dollar Campaign. Another man received the same degree, Rev. Maynard W. Brown, of Port George, Nova Scotia, in recognition of his forty-five years of excellent service, largely on home mission fields, in the less-noticed labor of foundation laying. The M. A. degree was conferred upon Milton F. Gregg, above mentioned; upon F. A. Good, of the staff of the normal school at Fredericton, N. B.; and upon a literary woman who resided among us, Mrs. Irene Elder Morton, sister of the late Professor William Elder, once on Acadia's teaching staff and afterwards on the staff at Colby University in Maine.

RHODE ISLAND

The State Convention

The Rhode Island Baptist State Convention met with the Calvary Church, Providence, Tuesday and Wednesday, May 17-18. Pres. J. Willard Baker, called the convention to order.

Officers of the previous year were re-elected. The 1927 class of the board of managers is composed of Rev. H. H. Hayes, Rev. James Struthers, Mrs. E. J. Doe, Daniel L. Mathewson, Rev. W. W. Barker, Miss Emma A. Tiffany, Mrs. Clarence Martin, Harry C. Adams, and William E. White.

One of the interesting exercises on the first morning of the convention was the welcome given by the president to the pastors who have settled in the State during the year. They are: Rev. F. L. Cleveland, Rev. Horace H. Hayes, Rev. Maurice Dunbar, Rev. Frederick Barnes, Rev. James Struthers, Rev. George C. S. MacKay, Rev. W. W. Barker, Rev. George W. Gellatly, Rev. C. B. Osborne, and Rev. L. O. Gates.

The last address of the day was made by the Rev. James McGee, Pastor of the Calvary church, New Haven, Conn. It was a fitting message with a spiritual appeal.

On Wednesday various reports were presented by Rev. M. E. Bratcher, Rev. C. E. McColley, H. M. Fillebrown, Rev. Frank Rector, Charles Littlefield, Rev. W. B. Green, Rev. C. M. Gallup, Roscoe Phillips, Rev. G. E. Lamphere, Allan P. Peacock, Mrs. F. G. McKeever, and Herbert Lottsfeldt.

The Education Society held its 129th annual meeting, with Rev. Frank Rector, president, in the chair. Rev. H. H. Hayes, conducted the devotional service.

Prof. English delivered the annual address and Sec. Bratcher and Treas. Jillson presented their reports. Officers for the ensuing year are: Pres., Rev. Frank Rector; vice-pres., Rev. Edward Holyoke; Sec., Rev. M. E. Bratcher; treas., O. A. Jillson. The board of managers is composed of Rev. B. T. Livingston, Rev. James M. Lent, Rev. W. T. Green, Rev. C. M. Gallup, Rev. C. P. Christopher, and Prof. R. G. D. Richardson; auditors, William Armour and George E. Nicholas; auxiliary, Mrs. C. E. Burr, Mrs. G. E. Nicholas, Mrs. E. J. Doe, Mrs. Leslie A. Swain, Mrs. D. W. Bellows, Mrs. Sidney Hobart, and Miss Emma A. Tiffany.

The pastor's conference with Rev. C. E. Cate, president, in the chair, and Rev. D. B. Lothrop, conducting devotional service, heard an address on the Pension Plan by Arthur M. Harris, vice-president and treasurer of the Ministers' and Missionaries' Benefit Board. It elected the following officers: Pres., Rev. H. W. Watjen; vice-pres., Rev. J. A. Mitchell; sec-treas., Rev. H. K. Vye; additional, ex. com.—Rev. John Stewart and Rev. E. A. Love; membership committee—Rev. S. D. Ringrose, Rev. M. E. Bratcher, and Rev. Lewis A. Walker; program committee—president, Rev. H. J. White, and Rev. W. L. Wood.

Rev. F. A. Agar, from the General Board of Promotion addressed the convention and was followed by a state demonstration under the direction of Sec. Livingston. Rev. A. Devos spoke for the French people of the state; two groups of young people from the Federal Hill Italian church and the First Italian church presented the work of these churches by recitation and song; Rev. Di Tiberio spoke for the Italian people; Joseph Puhovsky told of the need of the Russian people and the crying need of the workers in Siberia; Rev. Antonio J. de Souza gave an account of his conversion and baptism, and also of the opportunity among the Portuguese people.

Rev. George H. Watt, state colporter, spoke concerning the rural needs of the state. The supper hour was in charge of the young people, and Herbert C. Lottsfeldt presided. Addresses were given by Rev. H. K. Vye, Rev. E. A. Love, and S. D. Ringrose.

A roll call of the young people's societies gave to Second, Newport, the banner for excellence in the standard of efficiency test. The young people of the Federal Hill Italian church received the banner for the largest percentage of members present at the convention.

For nearly two hours Clinton N. Howard held the closest attention of the large audience as he contrasted vividly "The Red Yesterday, with the White Today, and will it be Blue Tomorrow?"

THE SUMMER ASSEMBLY will be held at Hightstown July 2-9. A strong program has been arranged and an equally strong corps of lecturers secured.

ALBERT GORDON WILLIAMS was ordained at West Church, Vineland, May 24.

EASTERN PENNSYLVANIA

CONSHOHOCKEN, Abner James Davies, pastor, celebrated its fiftieth anniversary, May 15-22.

President Milton G. Evans has spent thirty years with the Crozer Theological Seminary, the last twelve of them as president. On May 23 about seventy-five of his ministerial brethren gathered at a luncheon in Philadelphia to extend their felicitations. Congratulatory addresses were made by Dr. W. W. Keen, the celebrated surgeon, Rev. W. H. Main, and Rev. Joseph Bennett. The place of Dr. Evans is secure in the hearts of his brethren. He is recognized where he is best known as a great leader. The prophet has honor in his own country. His clear thinking, his deep spiritual perceptions, his charity, his sympathy make him a teacher and brother beloved.

SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA

RIVERSIDE, Richard Ellsworth Day, pastor, entertained the Southern California Convention May 17-21. The church recently gave Mr. and Mrs. Day a rest of three days at the cottage of Mr. A. N. Younglove at East Newport.

LONG BEACH, Geo. D. Knights, pastor reports the best year in its history—additions, 255; membership, 1203; Sunday-school enrollment, 1198; average attendance, 629; benevolent offerings, $23,141; current expenses, $10,985. The church is ready to start a three-story building at an expense of something over $22,000.

SANTA PAULA, Walter M. Coril, Pastor.—Since the beginning of the year 1921, fifty-three have united with the church. Twenty-six of these were by baptism and of the entire number only four were under fifteen years of age. Recently, an every-member canvass for current expenses resulted in doubling the subscriptions for local work.

THE RESIGNATION OF DR. CORTLAND MYERS from the pastorate of the Tremont Temple Church is not a complete surprise. Intimations of that possibility have come from time to time. It is a great church, and too heavy a load for a man to take the risk of carrying overlong. Twelve of the best of a man's years are enough to give to a church anyhow. Dr. Myers has lifted mightily, and the conditions at the Temple are better than within any one's recollection.

ACADIA COLLEGE is never lavish in her honorary degrees. Hardly more than one a year of her sons gets the Alma Mater's approving kiss. This year Rev. A. T. Kempton of Cambridge is in his new doctor's robe. Dr. Kempton is a good minister, and always a loyal and helpful son of Acadia.

Another happy anniversary has been the twenty-fifth milestone in religious service of Rev. Angelo DiDomenica, pastor of the First Italian Baptist Church. The work he has been able to render among these new Americans has been significant and is culminating now in the new and beautiful church plant that the Baptist Union has purchased and put in his hands. Many friends gathered there to congratulate him. Charles H. Dodd, Joseph Bennett, George E. Nichols, and Charles Brooks of New York spoke.

The Philadelphia B. Y. P. U. held its annual meeting in the First Baptist Church on May 9. A large gathering of young people listened to an address by Dr. W. E. Chalmers.

The West Philadelphia Social Union met with the Belmont Avenue Baptist Church on May 19 for an afternoon conference, a supper and evening program. The conference on the prayer meeting was led by Rev. Ross Stover of the Messiah Lutheran Church. Dr. Samuel G. Neil gave the evening address on Porto Rico.

The Baptist Union which is the city mission society for our city work had its annual meeting on Thursday, May 26. The reports indicate a very prosperous year. Last year it received $56,419. Its Trust Fund reports $5,860 and for advance work there was $15,694. Work is now being carried on in six other nationalities, the Slovak, Russian, Roumanian, Italian, Hungarian, and Polish. Seventeen churches, foreign, American, and the Baptist Settlement are either under the direction of the Union or related to it financially. —Arthur C. Baldwin.

PASTORAL CHANGES—Rev. Warren L. Steeves closed his work at Carbondale June 1 to become pastor at Lima, Ohio; Rev. George R. Stanley is on the field at Barnesboro, coming from Pine City, N. Y.; Rev. Alfred Jeffery has removed from Middlebury to Dimock.

CHARLES R. DRUM, a member of the Calvary Baptist church at Syracuse, New York, died suddenly at his home, May 23, 1921. Mr. Drum was earlier a teacher and principal of one of the Syracuse schools. He was an active church worker and developed a talent as a speaker to men. About a dozen years ago he gave up his profession to devote his entire time to religious work. A part of his time has been devoted to general evangelistic work, and a part to work under the international committee of the Young Men's Christian Association. He was one of the experts on evangelism during the Men and Religion Forward Movement and did special work in the camps during the war. He had a unique gift in talking with men personally about religion, was an expert in dealing with boys especially of the "teen" age, and was a really great speaker to men, his address "An Honest Man" having been delivered in most of the large cities of the country. He was highly regarded in his church, in the city of Syracuse where he had lived, and in many places where he has held campaigns. The only three pastors that Calvary church has had, George W. Middleton, the present pastor, George K. Warren, now pastor of the First Church, Batavia, New York, and Mahlon H. Day, now Home Secretary of the Canton Christian College, were present.

BALSTON SPA—Pastor D. E. Sprague has baptized nineteen during the past year, making seventy-six baptized by him since Dec. 6, 1916. Membership increased from 275 to 339; benevolence $809 to $3843. Pastor's salary has also been increased three times.

MR. JAMES DALTON, a graduate of the Rochester Theological Seminary, Class of 1921, and pastor-elect of the North Church, Camden, N. J., was ordained at the East Avenue Church, Rochester, N. Y., on May 26, 1921, by a council representing seventeen Churches.

THE FIRST CHURCH OF SHENANDOAH, celebrates its Golden Anniversary June 16-20. Beginning with a roll-call service on the 16th, the big day is Sunday the 19th with services all day and a basket dinner in the park. Among the addresses planned are those of former pastors, Dr. G. P. Mitchell, State Sec'y of Missions, Dr. E. F. Jordan, of Bismark, N. Dak. Rev. D. W. Griffith of Hamburg, Ia., and possibly Dr. Walter Sparks of Winnipeg, Canada. Dr. John Y. Aitchison, former pastor, will be unable to come because of the Convention work, but sends as his representative Dr. F. A. Agar. A special laymen's session is planned in that connection to which the men of surrounding churches have been invited. The closing feature will come on Monday evening, the 20th in the form of an historical pageant given by a cast of 125 characters, on the church lawn in the twilight. There have been 104 additions to the church during the last eighteen months, seventy-six by baptism. Rev. C. A. Carman is the present pastor.

STATE-WIDE EVANGELISTIC CAMPAIGN, started last October, is still in progress. Colporter C. J. Hill is holding a series of tent meetings at Ryder, where we do not yet have a church organization. Rev. C. W. Finwall, Pastor-at-Large, is beginning a series of meetings at Glenburn, where the outlook is most hopeful. Evangelist J. S. Umberger of Denver, Colorado, has just closed a very successful series of meetings at Bottineau, where Rev. James N. Start is pastor. He is now in a series of meetings with Rev. L. McKinnon, at Crystal. The church at Minot, under the leadership of Rev. C. J. Tingley, has cooperated with other churches of that city in a revival campaign under the leadership of Evangelist P. E. Wells. The final results have not yet been learned, except that a goodly number of persons will be received into the Baptist church following the campaign.

THE STATE CONVENTION will be held at Minot, July 13-17, and will be followed by a two-days' young people's assembly. A strong and interesting program is being arranged for the convention. A new feature is being introduced in the program this year. Saturday afternoon during the convention will occur the North Dakota Baptist Picnic in one of Minot's beautiful parks. The Municipal Band will furnish music for the picnic. Dr. Carl D. Case of Chicago, and Rev. J. T. Latta of India, will be the principal speakers.

DR. F. H. DIVINE visited Elkhorn May 22, and assisted the church in caring for the balance still to be raised to take care of the indebtedness due to the erection of their community house. About $5000 was needed, and more than enough was pledged to take care of it. The church now goes forward with its community program, unhampered now that the indebtedness is provided for. This is one of the demonstration fields in community work which the Home Mission Society is trying out in connection with the state conventions.

DR. A. LEGRAND began his work as superintendent of the Wisconsin Convention on June 1. Dr. D. W. Hulburt, for twenty-five years and more the superintendent, will take a place on the convention staff as pastor-at-large.

FIRST, MILWAUKEE, has called Dr. A. A. Hobson, of Waltham, Mass., to be its pastor, succeeding Dr. Robert A. Ashworth, now of Yonkers, N. Y. He will begin his work June 26. During the time the church has been pastorless Dr. H. O. Rowlands, has acted as pastor.

SOLOMON MOSES KUYZERS was ordained May 26 by a council convened for the purpose by the Tabernacle Church, of Milwaukee. Brother Kuyzers is now pastor of a Presbyterian church at Alto, this state, where he serves them acceptably in the Holland language. He has had a wonderful and a unique experience, and is a conscientious and a sincere Baptist.

OHIO

Buckeye Baptists in Convention

For a long time "Lima" has signified oil to thousands of people for it is an important place in the petroleum industry. But it now signifies "the oil of joy" to hundreds of people, for with it their spirits were anointed the third week in May during the meeting of the Ohio Baptist Convention. Every session was marked by a deep spirit of devotion, and while the discussions of various problems were sufficiently Baptist to suit the most zealous guardian of individual liberty they were always sufficiently Christian to be thoroughly harmonious. No human factor contributed so much to the spirituality and efficiency that made this one of the greatest of our conventions as the wise, tactful, courteous and spiritually minded lawyer who presided, and who was of course elected for a sixth term. It is no reflection on Gideon to say that his experience was duplicated on this occasion, for surely "the Spirit of Jehovah clothed himself with" E. H. Rhoades, Jr. of Toledo.

Most conventions have high spots that stand out in contrast with frequent monotonous plains and occasional "sloughs of despond," but this one maintained a high level throughout. Ohio has little need to import speakers, for women like Mrs. C. H. Prescott of Cleveland, Mrs. Graves of Columbus and Miss Barnhouse of Upper Sandusky, laymen like Parmenter of Lima, Chamberlin of Dayton and Chamberlain of Granville, and such preachers as Stilwell of Cleveland, Vincent of Toledo, Herget of Cincinnati and Smith of Springfield are worth crossing the state to hear.

But Buckeye Baptists are always willing to learn from others, and we also listened with great profit to Miss Allen of Japan, Miss Northcott of China, and prophets Gage of Chicago, Villers of Detroit and Heath of New York. The last came as a welcome substitute for our overworked General Director Aitchison, and in a masterful address and two tactfully conducted conferences so presented our New World Movement, removing doubts and relieving tensions, that a resolution of unqualified endorsement was unanimously passed.

In common with most of our educational institutions, Denison University has been the target of much petty criticism, but here too the light of facts dispelled the mists of fancy and the president's address on "Denison's Contribution to Baptist Work" easily won a unanimous vote of approval. A school in which the religious spirit is so strong that conversions occur among both natives and foreign students (this year totaling 933), gospel teams of students visit city and country churches, and many lives are consecrated to world-wide service (over sixty student volunteers now) is an invaluable asset to the whole denomination. Little wonder that its class rooms are over-taxed, its dormitories overflowing, and denominational leaders and missionaries are entrusting their sons and daughters to its care.

"But time would fail me to tell of" all the good things of this exceptionally good meeting, whose well-balanced program owed much to the careful preparation of Secretary Chambers. Of course he was re-elected, along with W. A. Holmes who begins his twenty-first year as director of religious education, W. H. Thompson as director of rural work and the writer as director of promotion.

The Fidelity Church of Cleveland (formerly Free Baptist) will be our hosts next May, when delegates from Ohio and visitors from everywhere will be welcome.

F. G. Cressey.

Central District Golden Jubilee
By Mrs J. W. Hoyt

The year 1871 was a notable year in the history of women's work of the Baptist denomination, notable because it was the beginning of what is now the Woman's American Baptist Foreign Mission Society. In celebration of the service of fifty years which the Society has rendered, a series of District meetings has been held during April and May of this year, beginning at the Atlantic, and going westward to the Pacific, and concluding with a great national meeting at Des Moines in conjunction with the Northern Baptist Convention.

This tidal wave of enthusiasm, otherwise known as the Golden Jubilee, reached Chicago May 18, 19 and 20, and will go down in history as one of the greatest gatherings ever held by the Society. Immanuel Baptist Church was the place chosen in which to "jubilate." Michigan, Missouri and Illinois, the states which comprise Central District, had large representations at every service.

First, there were those who represented the Jubilee year, the months, weeks and special days' director, who related briefly how 53,000 golden dollars had been pledged and paid by Central District toward the 365,000 golden dollars which was the goal set by the national society. It was cause for great rejoicing that the district had over-subscribed its apportionment by several thousand dollars.

Then there was the wonderful pageant, which was witnessed by a more than capacity audience. People came early and occupied every available seat, and when there were no more seats, they were content to stand during the entire evening. The pageant, "The Call and the Answer," was written by Mrs. Helen Barrett Montgomery, president of the national society. It outlines the accomplishments of the past fifty years, and presents the agencies contributing to the Society's work. All who participated in the pageant did their part so well that the scene was not only beautiful, but impressive—so much so, that many who hitherto were uninterested and unintelligent concerning women's work for women were convinced of its magnitude and tremendous possibilities.

Too much cannot be said of the inspiration brought to the Jubilee by the presence of our foreign representatives. Dr. Ma Saw Sa, the first Burmese girl to get a college education, is now a surgeon, and superintendent of a hospital in Burma. Khanto Bala Roy is a young girl in charge of a school in Bengal-Orissa. Y. Nandamah is connected with a hospital in South India. Kan En Vong, whose father was an opium fiend and who sold her to a missionary, is now head of a kindergarten in Hangchow, China. Nakaji San, a consecrated personal worker, is an evangelist and Bible teacher at Osaka, Japan, and Mrs. Francis Kolator, of Czecho-Slovakia, who is the daughter of the oldest Bohemian Baptist missionary, is a leading member of the Baptist Church in Prague. These all, in the costumes of their native land, and in the English tongue, told of their people's needs, and plead for support of the missionary enterprise.

Mention should be made of the two banquets which were held, one on Thursday evening at Hotel Metropole, which was addressed by Dr. Woelfkin, of New York, and the W. W. G. Banquet on Friday evening, when the young women had the opportunity of hearing the foreign representatives, also Miss Naomi Fletcher and Miss Alma Noble.

The important item, of business which was transacted was the decision to unite the home and foreign work of the district under one board of twenty-one active members, an associate membership, and an advisory board. The election of officers resulted as follows: Pres. Mrs. Frank J. Miller, Chicago; Assoc. to Pres. Mrs. R. P. Fales, Chicago; Administrative Vice-Pres., Mrs. R. A. Hilton, Chicago; Associate, Mrs. R. S. Knapp, Chicago; Foreign Vice-Pres., Mrs. Milton Shirk, Chicago; Associate, Mrs. Charles H. Parkes, Chicago; Home Mission Vice-Pres., Mrs. L. C. Walker, Chicago; Associate, Mrs. J. F. O'Brian, Evanston; Recording Sec., Mrs. W. P. Tutt, Kansas City, Mo.; Treas., Mrs. E. L. Robinson, Chicago; Missionary Education, Mrs. C. W. Peterson, Chicago; State Sec.-Director, Mich., Mrs. N. H. Bowen; State Sec.-Director, Ill., Mrs. L. A. Vinnedge, Chicago; District Sec., W. W. G., Mrs. E. C. Copelin, Aurora, Ill.; Dist. Sec., C. W. C., Mrs. E. S. Osgood, Chicago; Sec., C. W. C., Mich., Miss Janet Howell.

Members of Board (to serve three years) Mesdames R. E. Olds, A. L. Reeves, G. W. Taft, E. D. Johnson, A. G. Lester, C. P. Anthony and T. T. Leete; (to serve two years) Miss Florence Kennedy, Mesdames Lathan Crandall, Fred A. Grow, H. E. Whitaker, W. H. Dorrance, J. E. Replinger, and Miss Elizabeth Gemmell; (to serve one year) Mesdames Gair Tourtellot, G. J. Vinton, M. E. Harris, Ira M. Price, W. P. Topping, one appointed by Mich., and one by Illinois State Boards of Promotion.

Associate Members: Mesdames Howard White, B. D. Barber, A. W. Charles, Earl L. Manville, J. W. Hoyt, and Ernest Ridgeway.

Advisory Members: Mesdames Andrew MacLeish, C. D. Eulette, H. E. Goodman, John Nuveen, S. C. Jennings, John H. Chapman, R. R. Donnelley, Smith T. Ford, Washington Laycock, W. H. Jones, H. F. ### Auxiliary and Pre-Meetings

The Conference on Evangelism will be held Sunday and Monday at the First Baptist Church, 8th and High Sts.

The Pastors' Conference will be held on Monday evening at the Auditorium, 4th Street, between Grand and Chestnut Sts.

The Conference on Fundamentals will be held on Tuesday at the Auditorium.

The Women's Jubilee beginning on Monday evening, will be held at the First M. E. Church, 10th and Pleasant Sts.

The Promotion Board and Boards of the Home and Foreign Societies for both men and women, will be held at Hotel Ft. Des Moines, June 17th and 18th.

All College Meetings will be held on Thursday evening and all Seminary Meetings on Friday evening.

The Laymen's Banquet will be held at the Auditorium on Saturday evening, June 26th. A chicken pie dinner will be served at $1.00 per plate. There should be at least 1,000 men present on this occasion. It will be best for those attending to secure their tickets soon after their arriving in the city.

The Women's Banquet will be served on Saturday evening at the First M. E. Church—chicken dinner at $1.00 per plate.

A general reception will be given at the Des Moines University on Saturday afternoon. This will be a period of field sports and various features of amusement interesting to all. The various leaders and deputations from all the world fields will be presented. Refreshments will be served by the faculty and student body of Des Moines University. This will make a delightful breathing period in the midst of the Convention program.

General Hospitality

The Committee on Arrangements wishes to extend every courtesy possible to our visiting friends. It must be borne in mind, however, that there are a thousand shades of opinion and conflicting judgments that manifest themselves in dealing with a million and a half of people. The Chairman received from a gentleman who acted in like capacity at a previous convention, a very tender message of sympathy and condolence. We learned that he was accused of almost every crime in the decalogue, but especially that of fattening his wallet by means of graft through being in league with the greedy hotel proprietors, badge makers, eating places, newspapers, etc. He wound up by saying, "I survived it all and am very much alive." Then he added with apparent emphasis, "Never again."

It is too early to determine whether or not your Chairman will have similar charges preferred against him and possibly lodged in jail. For the most part, up to date, the brethren have been considerate.

It is not distinctly the duty of the Committee on Arrangements to make provision for the one hundred and one conveniences requested by organizations outside of the Convention proper. Nevertheless, we shall be very glad to serve in any good cause as far as it is possible to do so consistent with our time and strength. It will be a great favor, however, if those who desire such courtesies will write us as early as possible with specific request outlining pretty much in detail what is wanted.

It is necessary to say a word regarding free entertainment for Missionaries. With the high cost of living and the retarding of building, almost every home is overrun with occupants, but Des Moines is preparing to do just what other cities have done: provide lodging and breakfast for all returned missionaries and deputations from the foreign fields. Also, those of a kindred class serving in the distant fields of the Home Mission Society and such other special workers as are approved by the secretaries of the societies. It will not be possible to extend this courtesy to a great number of missionary pastors and out our home fields. We assure you it worthy workmen of the kingdom through would be a delight to do so if it were possible. We urge, therefore, that churches and associations and conventions, will see to it that such men and women have means put at their disposal to enable them to attend the Convention this year.

We may have overlooked some very important matters in this statement of information to delegates for the coming N. B. C. but it has not been intentional. We are hoping that in addition to the delegates, that a large number of visitors will attend. These visitors can be of great help by giving themselves to continuous and sympathetic attendance at the sessions. All such visitors should register, and thus with the small fee will not only aid the Convention but will secure thereby a copy of the Annual, which is always packed with interesting information.

Arrangements at the Coliseum

The Des Moines Committee on Arrangements for the Northern Baptist Convention has been at work for the past three months, and our plans are practically completed. The Convention will be held in the Coliseum, which is being especially fitted up for our use. The seating arrangements and also the acoustic properties will be far superior to what they were nine years ago, when the Convention met in Des Moines. Every effort is being made to give the meeting place a transformed appearance, and the decorations will be most attractive.

EXHIBITS will be placed in the rear of the Coliseum, where there will be ample room for their display. This will be a great convenience to the delegates who will thus have opportunity to inspect such of these as are of interest to them before and after meetings, and during a recess that may occur in the Convention.

There are also numerous rooms available for committees and for headquarters, adjacent to the main audience room, and these are being arranged in the most convenient manner.

THE AUDITORIUM, which is about four blocks from the Coliseum, will also be available for special meetings of various organizations. This building has a large seating capacity, and the accommodations will be ample for all bodies desiring to use it.

THE REGISTRATION of delegates will be in charge of Mr. I. J. Ketman, and this will take place at the Court House, which is directly across from the Union Depot and only one block from the Rock Island Depot. The great majority of delegates coming by train will come to one of these depots. Those who come to the Northwestern Depot will find it possible to take a car which will carry them within one block of the Court House.

All delegates are required to register and present credentials from their churches. It is desirable that visitors also register, although this is not absolutely necessary.

Mr. F. L. Miner is Chairman of the Reception Committee, and he is arranging to have the members of his committee meet all trains coming into the city, so that there will be no difficulty about delegates arriving here and not knowing where to go.

THE INFORMATION COMMITTEE under the chairmanship of Mr. A. C. Hanger, will work in conjunction with the Reception and Registration Committees, and will also have headquarters at the Coliseum to give any necessary information to delegates.

A MINIATURE HOSPITAL will be available at all times to any delegates that may be in need of medical attention in case of emergency. This is being worked out by Dr. J. A. Hallett, who has completed all the necessary arrangements.

THE COMMITTEE ON PRINTING, under the chairmanship of Mr. J. H. Cochrane, has made all the necessary arrangements for the printing of reports and other matter pertaining to the work of the Convention. Des Moines is well equipped with the best class of printing establishments, and there will be no difficulties on this score.

Dr. H. R. Best is Chairman of the General Committee on Arrangements, and

"A Man Diligent in Business"

DR. HARRY R. GREAVES

Baptists who desire to see "a man diligent in business" have only to turn their eyes toward Dr. Harry R. Greaves, business manager of the General Board of Promotion of the Northern Baptist Convention. In the entire denomination it would be hard to find a man more diligent in the business of Northern Baptists, which is also the business of the Lord.

Dr. Harry R. Greaves was born in St. Louis, Mo., and brought up in the old Second Church of that city, where he got his first idea of religious and business principles. He was graduated from Shurtleff College in 1894, receiving his degree of D.D. from his alma mater ten years later, and from Rochester Theological Seminary in 1897. That same year he was ordained in the old historic First Dutch Church of Schenectady, N. Y.

Following his ordination, Dr. Greaves held pastorates in the Tabernacle Church of Albany, N. Y., the First Church of Muscatine, Iowa, and the Temple Church of Seattle, Wash. In 1908 he was made secretary of the South California Baptist Convention, in which capacity he served the denomination until 1911.

Business has always made a strong appeal to Dr. Greaves, and in the year of 1911 he decided to enter definitely upon a business career. He became connected, therefore, with the Home Savings Bank of Los Angeles, Cal., a large banking corporation with eight banks in the city of Los Angeles. In this organization, Dr. Greaves started in at the bottom of the round, and worked up with a rapidity amazing to those who know the usual slow routine of advancement in banks to be assistant secretary, with entire charge of the large real estate department. While connected with the Home Savings Bank, Dr. Greaves studied law under the auspices of the University of California, a two-year course especially outlined for business men.

Unhesitatingly giving up his opportunity for further advancement here, Dr. Greaves went to France with the army in 1918 as a Y. M. C. A. secretary. His business capabilities were soon discovered, and welcomed warmly there. He was at once put into the financial end of the work, and given charge of the exact accounting for every penny of large sums of money.

Upon his return to California, Dr. Greaves was at once offered the vice-presidency of the First National Bank of Hollywood. This position he accepted. For a second time, however, he gave up his own work to take over something that he considered even more essential, when he considered even more essential.

In his present capacity, Dr. Greaves set up the business system for the $100,000,000 campaign that was suggested by the auditors, and worked up the plan of a uniform accounting by the various states. Up-to-date, not one cent of Northern Baptist money has been paid in to his treasury that he cannot account for—and this although he has had the handling of over $10,000,000. Surely this is an acid test, even for "a man diligent in business."

OUR MUSIC CORNER

CONDUCTED BY

A SUGGESTED HYMN-SERVICE

From Rev. George D. Rogers, of Winterset, Ia., comes an interesting scheme for one or more special services. In brief the plan is as follows: A fitting subject is chosen, some theme of general interest and spiritual value, adaptable to musical treatment; then the thought and message are developed in word and song so that the combination results in a unified exposition of the idea. An effective example of the possibilities potential to this suggestion is a service called "Peace Songs" written, both as to text and music, by Mr. Rogers, (privately printed by the author.) The booklet bears the dedication—"Dedicated to my Mother, whose rich and rare alto voice echoes through the years in blessed memory."

The first section of the work consists of a study of "Peace of the Heart," based upon a text from John 14:27—"Peace I leave with you"—and a couplet of poetry by Leland:

"Of all the Arts, great music is the art
To raise the soul above all earthly storms."

The eloquent treatment of this material is followed by a musical number titled "The Hymn of the Heart," equally effective for solo voice or unison chorus. The hallowed strains of "Home Sweet Home" are then sung by special soloists or by the congregation. This is preliminary to the second section, "Peace for the Home," to be read by the minister. This is followed by a two-voiced song, "Peace Hymn for the Home," adapted for duet or small chorus. The third section is devoted to consideration of "Peace for the Sea." Herein we find poetry and prose allied to this subject, followed by the fitting "Peace Hymn for the Sea," written for quartet or chorus. Finally comes "Peace for the Nation and the World," based upon two texts: "On earth, peace" (Luke 2:14), and some lines from Tennyson:

"Oh, when shall all men's good
Be each man's rule, and Universal Peace
Lie like a shaft of light across the land,
And like a lane of beams athwart the sea,
Through all the circle of the golden year."

The ringing truths presented under this head are climaxed by a fine setting of the "Peace Hymn for the Nation," to be sung by the massed voices, and ending with the inspiring plea,

"God of Truth, hear our cry,
Save the nations ere they die."

Many subjects adaptable to similar treatment will readily come to the minds of those interested—the idea certainly has fine possibilities for interest and profitable results. Some such weaving together of the musical and verbal parts of the service will aid greatly in developing the taste for a homogeneous session of divine worship. Surely, any method that serves to tie together the musical and the speaking parts of our services will be of value. One of the favorite humorous subjects with organists when we clan together is the frequency with which the musical selections clash with the subjects chosen by the minister—all of us have a plentiful supply of Mrs. Malapropian examples.

And the reverence and fervor of divine worship cannot but suffer when the context of the sermon-subject and the choir-selection nearby causes audible snickers to disturb the congregation—as sometimes happens. The type of thing I mean is that unconscious spasm that comes after the pastor has developed a passionate forty minutes on "The Evils of a Great City," and is followed by the anthem "O, Taste and See."

Of course, these contretemps are not of weekly occurrence—for which we should be grateful! And they can be entirely avoided if the choir-master or organist will consult with the minister before the service list is finally made up for the printer. Any church which allows as much freedom from set ritual as our communion does is prone to the danger of incoherence which is the other extreme from "high-church" habits.

We can with high profit take a leaf from the books of the Christian Scientists—with the services of that denomination great care is taken that all things work together for a unified thought in each service. The soloist must choose a solo that is fitting both textually and musically, and the hymns also are keyed to the subject of the lesson. Hence, the congregation is given a unified thought, with a resultant gain in mental and spiritual efficiency. There can be no question that some such co-operation between the minister and the person responsible for the music would be a great benefit to the coherence of many of our own services. And we must admit that many churches do get the benefit of some such action as this.

In my own church—the First Baptist Church of Evanston, I am blessed with an unusual amount of assistance from the minister there. His custom of quoting the central thought of the anthem or solo immediately preceding the pastoral prayer, and weaving it as a sort of motive into the prayer itself, certainly makes the musical selection of far more service-value than would otherwise be the case. To quote a point from the "movie" field: a tremendous amount of care and trouble is taken in the big theaters such as the Capitol in New York, and the Tivoli in Chicago, to synchronize the music and the picture—in fact experts in that field have assured us time and time again in their technical journals that the finest picture can be spoiled by an inadequate or badly fitted musical score.

How much more then should we attend to the musical fitness of the tonal portion of divine service. Most assuredly it is worthy of the same amount of care as is lavished upon any ordinary picture exhibit! And how seldom is even this care given to the Sunday hours! Such plans as the one outlined above by Brother Rogers are immensely valuable to all of us. We may model his scheme to fit our local needs, we may evolve more elaborate programs—but a great deal has been accomplished when we get the two elements most involved—the minister and the musician—to thinking and working together for one thing: the betterment of the music used, and the increased pungency of union of speech and song.

A Call for Preachers

As chairman of the pulpit supply for the Northern Baptist Convention to be held in Des Moines, Iowa, June 22nd to 29th, I am anxious that Sunday, the 26th of June be a great day in the Protestant churches of our city and that every pulpit be supplied with one of our visiting Baptist pastors. I therefore ask that our brethren come prepared to help make this a great day. It would help greatly if the ministers would drop me a line signifying their willingness to help out on that day.
Address me at 609 E. 9th St., Des Moines.
Signed, H. O. Meyer, Pulpit Supply.

Report of Women's Committee

The Women's Committee for the Northern Baptist Convention is well organized.
Chairmen of sub-committees for the various lines of work have been assigned and meetings are being held regularly.

The reception for women will be held at Des Moines University, Saturday afternoon, June 25th, under supervision of the Faculty women.

A Rest Room at the Coliseum, well equipped, will be looked after by Mrs.
Hanger and her assistants. The Woman's Banquet will be at the First Methodist Church, Saturday, June 25th at 6:30.
Other smaller banquets have been arranged for at various places.

Jubilee Day is June 21st and the meetings will be held in the First Methodist Church, Tenth and Pleasant Streets. Here also on Monday afternoon, June 20th, will be held the Annual Meeting of the West Central District.

The Auto Corps, with Mrs. A. M. Piper and Mrs. Frank True as chairmen, will direct an efficient taxi service, which we hope will meet all wants.

Many plans are being made for the convenience and comfort of guests at the Convention, and the Baptist women of Des Moines bid you welcome. We are sure your coming will be of benefit to us, to our city, to our State.

Mrs. F. L. Miner,
Chairman.

The Campus of Des Moines University

The buildings of Des Moines University, located on a beautiful campus of twenty-five acres, constitute the nucleus of a good educational plant. There is a central administration building, containing the general offices and a large number of the class rooms for the College of Liberal Arts; a large Science Hall; a Men's Hall; a Women's Hall; the engineering shops and power house; and three large rooming houses. The appraised valuation of the campus and buildings is approximately $500,000.00. It is expected that new buildings will be added from time to time, and it is hoped that one of these may be started in the near future.

The net attendance in all departments of the University for the four quarters of the present year is 1,067, including students of the sub-college grade.

The distribution of these students is striking, and shows the cosmopolitan character of the institution. They come from seventy-three of the ninety-nine counties of Iowa, and from fourteen other states, including Canada.

The students are vigorous, earnest and enthusiastic. They have come with a serious purpose and the majority of them are earning their way through college by finding employment in the business and industrial enterprises of Des Moines. The location of the University is of great help to them in this regard, as is also the fact that the University year covers forty-eight weeks in four quarters of approximately twelve weeks each.

The total number who received degrees, diplomas, and certificates in the graduating class of this year, at the commencement exercises just held, was ninety-eight.

This Is "News" Not Publicity

Dr. E. R. Brown of Los Angeles sends us the following which illustrates the difference between "News" and publicity: Finnicus: "How's Jones getting along at the old First Church?" Cinnicus: "Not very well, not very well." Finnicus: "How is that? Didn't I read in the last number of THE BAPTIST that this church gave him a fine present on his first anniversary?" Cinnicus: "Yes, they did, but it was not stated that the gift was a traveling bag."

A New Test for Church Membership

"I belonged to the Baptist Church for forty-eight years and never believed in women voting. No one ever interfered with me until a little more than a year ago when the church sent a committee to see why I did not vote. The church knew all the time that I did not believe in women voting. They kept arguing with me until last March they excluded me." This is an excerpt of a letter which we recently received from one of our subscribers. She has long had a denominational weekly and Missions in her home. She wants to know if in Baptist churches generally such a test is made a condition of church membership. We remember of reading of a time when membership in the church was required in order to vote in the commonwealth. This is the first case which has come to our attention where to vote in the commonwealth was required for membership in the church. THE BAPTIST believes in woman suffrage. It does not believe that the exercise of the right of franchise should be made a condition of church membership. Solomon, thou art wrong! There are some things new under the sun.

They Want To Sing Also

The chapel car Emmanuel is at Ft. Lupton, Colo. Rev. A. C. Blinzinger in charge of the car writes: "Wish you would make an appeal in THE BAPTIST for some song books for this mission church which we organized in March. We have thirty-nine members and are starting to build an up-to-date building. We hope to get into the basement soon." Who will send fifty or sixty good song books to this new church? Write Mr. Blinzinger at Ft. Lupton.

W. P. B.

In a publisher's office there is considerable furniture of various sorts. The W. P. B. is probably in more constant use than any other one article, unless it be the B. P. Many a child of fancy reported missing has fallen into the cavernous depths of the editors W. P. B. This means that their doom is sealed.

Can It Beat This?

"That Peeve Editor stunt is the most delicious bit of satire I've read in many a day. Keep it up. It will penetrate after a while. It hurts my feelings to see THE BAPTIST scintillate without any help from me. I can scarcely believe it, but as I believe in speaking the truth and sometimes telling it, I am constrained to say these few feeble remarks." Thus writes Mrs. T. E. Adams of Cleveland. Now our feelings are hurt too. For weeks we have been in a most serious frame of mind, speaking of the most serious facts, moved by a most serious purpose and all our efforts have been interpreted as "satire." It is a strange world!

A Time for Jubilation!

By A. E. PETERSON

WHEN Northern Baptists learn of the marvelous achievements of the year just closed, as a result of the New World Movement, they will want to sing the doxology at Des Moines! The success of the past year is far in excess of all past successes.

It is but four years since this body of Baptists first dared to attempt a drive for a million dollars, and now, so soon thereafter, they have laid upon God's altar for missionary and educational purposes, the magnificent sum of $11,300,000 with Mr. Rockefeller's large gifts over and above. This is more than twice the amount contributed during the banner year of the Victory Campaign, and nearly three times the sum given last year, which was $4,728,750. The per capita giving was lifted from $3.90 for the fiscal year ending May 1, 1920, to $9.33 for the year ending the same date in 1921, which gain represents an increase of $5.43 for every Northern Baptist.

There is but one explanation for such a record, and here it is: "This is from the Lord and it is marvelous in our eyes."

In order that the significance of these figures and this achievement may be more fully grasped, a few comparisons are appropriate:

The Methodist Centenary was the first great forward movement to stir the heart and imagination of the world's Christian forces. They set the example for all others and gave others heart to attempt what was thought impossible. They placed for themselves an objective which challenged their powers as no other task in their history had ever done, and then went over the top with a subscription of $115,000,000. Back of this Centenary movement there is a Methodist membership of 3,872,625, whereas back of the New World Movement with its Hundred Million Dollar goal is a membership of only 1,210,834 Northern Baptists.

While Northern Baptists reached in subscriptions only approximately one-half of their goal, they have subscribed $40 per capita while the Methodist subscription is but $30 per member.

Nearly 4,000,000 Methodists paid the first year the sum of $16,500,000 upon a subscription of $115,000,000 while less than 1,250,000 Northern Baptists paid the first year the sum of $11,300,000 upon a subscription of some less than $50,000,000.

Methodists made a per capita contribution the first year of their forward movement of the sum of $4.26, while Northern Baptists gave $9.33 per member.

Methodists have collected to date 72 per cent of amounts due on subscriptions whereas Northern Baptists are 84 per cent paid up.

The other great movement which stirred the hearts of our people was the drive of the Southern Baptists. Again this comparison is made, not for the purpose of taking from them any glory which has been so well earned, but only that together we may view aright what has been attained by Northern Baptists. The Southern Baptists set for themselves an objective of $75,000,000 and after a magnificent campaign went over the top and reached a sum which has been reported as ranging from $80,000,000 to $90,000,000. For the purpose of comparison the latter figure will be used.

Back of the subscription of the Southern Baptist drive is a membership of 3,124,880, as against 1,210,834 Northern Baptists back of the New World Movement.

The per capita subscription of Southern Baptists was $29 whereas Northern Baptists subscribed $40 per member.

According to announcements just made at Nashville, the total sum collected during the year was $12,907,843. No wonder that the announcement of the payment of such a sum for convention purposes in one year's time was made with great enthusiasm and was received with great applause. Surely Southern Baptists have occasion to glory over such an achievement, but if they have, Northern Baptists have still more such occasion, for out of a membership only 38 per cent as large as the membership of Southern Baptists, they paid a sum equal to 87 per cent of the amount given by the former.

On the basis of these figures the per capita given by Southern Baptists was $4.13 as against $9.33 by their Northern brethren.

The per capita increase of gifts of Northern Baptists of the present year over the last, is greater by more than one dollar than the per capita gifts of either Methodists or Southern Baptists, or as much greater as $5.43 is greater than either $4.26 or $4.13!

With such a history to cover the first year of payments on the New World Movement, Northern Baptists can face the remaining years of this effort with unshakable confidence. And with such a sum subscribed and paid by only a portion of the membership, and with the vast untouched resources which may yet be developed, the complete goal of one hundred million dollars is by no means an impossibility.

These are glorious and incontrovertible facts to hearten us as we meet in annual gathering. And all this has been accomplished in a year of financial depression when banks and all commercial agencies have found it exceedingly difficult to make collections.

Defend Freedom of Pulpit

The Pittsburgh Ministerial Union on June 6 declared that it cannot allow the Pittsburgh Employers' Association to dictate to church organizations what their attitude should be on social questions. The Ministerial Union expresses the conviction that the communications from the Employers' Association, urging business men to withhold financial support from the Young Women's Christian Association and the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America because of their industrial programs, do not fairly represent the employing group. The resolutions are in part as follows:

"Resolved, That we, the Pittsburgh Ministerial Union, resent this attempt of a commercial organization to prescribe limits within which alone the church and other religious organizations may move; that we reaffirm the historic right and the duty of the church to proclaim the whole truth in Christ as revealed in the Scriptures and as applied under the Holy Spirit to every relationship in life; that we deny to any political, commercial, industrial, or any other group or agency the right to set any restrictions on the freedom of the Christian church or its agencies to apply the spirit and standards of the Kingdom of God to the whole of life; that we declare it our solemn duty and purpose to defend this liberty of the gospel."

Fresh from the Field

Mr. Lonnie R. Call and Miss Stevie Kennington were married at Hyde Park Church, Chicago, by pastor L. A. Crandall, June 1. Mr. Call is director of religious education in Dr. Bitling's church, Second Baptist, St. Louis.

Dr. Elmer Burritt Bryan, president of Colgate, was on May 25 elected to the presidency of the Ohio State University at Athens.

Dr. Arthur T. Fowler of the North Church, Orange, N. J., has declined the call to the Hampstead Church, London.

Mrs. H. A. Tupper, wife of Dr. Tupper of the First Church, Washington, D. C., passed away after a long illness on May 28.

At its annual commencement on June 8 Franklin College conferred the degree of doctor of divinity upon Rev. U. M. McGuire, associate editor of THE BAPTIST.

Prof. Samuel J. Vaughan who for some years has been head of the department of industrial education in the University of Illinois, has been elected president of Hardin Junior College, Mexico, Mo., and assumed full duties on June 1.

Dr. L. L. Henson, pastor of the First Church, Covington, Ky., gave the hand of fellowship on June 5 to seventy-two new members. At the last business meeting of the church, another $1,000 was added to the pastor's salary.

During the young people's session at Des Moines on Sunday afternoon, young people from several European countries will be on the platform and will deliver brief addresses. Students from Burma, South India, West China, South China, East China, Central China, Japan and the Philippine Islands (all of them Baptists who have been connected with our own mission work) will also participate in the program.

Evangelist John M. Linden, Madison, Wis., after completing a series of seven revival campaigns in Iowa went for two meetings in Ohio during May and June. The one was a union meeting with the five churches of New Richmond and the other was with the Norwood Baptist Church. The Ohio campaigns were follow-up meetings after "Billy" Sunday's wonderful effort in Cincinnati.

The fifty-fifth annual commencement of Bates College, Lewiston, Me., is to be held June 16-22. Pres. Clifton D. Gray is to preach the baccalaureate sermon.

Board Meeting

The Annual Meeting of the Board of Education of the Northern Baptist Convention will be held in the Auditorium, Des Moines, Iowa, Thursday, June 23, 1921.—Frank W. Padelford, Secretary.

Alumnae Banquet

The twelfth Annual Banquet and Meeting of the Baptist Missionary Training School Alumnae Association will be held on Thursday, June 23rd, 1921 at 5:30 P. M. at the Harris Emery Tea Room, 7th and Walnut Sts., Des Moines, Iowa.

Tickets for the same may be secured at the Training School Booth in the Exhibit Hall Wednesday afternoon and Thursday morning.

Give Way to the Baptist Women

LEAVE it to the women!

If there are big things to be done, they will do them. If there are impossible things to be accomplished, they will tackle them. If there is service demanded, they will give it, without limit and without price.

Only because these things are so is there a Jubilee celebration this year of the Woman's American Baptist Foreign Mission Society which finds its culmination in Des Moines after a series of remarkable and enthusiastic district meetings.

In celebration of their fiftieth anniversary, the women set out to raise $365,000, and over-subscribed this sum by $100,000. Those who know best our churches and the amount of ready money many of our women possess can appreciate what this means. No wonder that the women are happy!

But it is not the money alone that is a cause of rejoicing. The greater occasion is found in an organization which has enlisted in the cause of missions 350,000 Baptist women, 37,000 Baptist girls and 30,000 Baptist children, and which is supporting in all our mission fields a magnificent body of women, many of them from our choicest families, who are doing work for women and children such as only women can do. The women have a right to be glad, and the men should take off their hats to them.

It is the women of our churches who have formed and maintained a society which has in it "an enthusiasm and esprit de corps found nowhere else in the denomination." It is the women who have been and yet are the great educators of our churches in missions. It is the women who have shown what splendid work can be done through voluntary, unpaid service. It is the women who have been teaching by their own self-sacrificing giving what Christian giving is and may be. We men salute the Baptist women, and especially those of this great missionary society.

The Woman's American Baptist Foreign Mission Society is the union of two societies, established fifty years ago, one in Boston and the other in Chicago. Both come into being in response to a need felt on the field. They were combined into the one present society in 1913, and since then an organization has been perfected so thorough and yet so elastic that there is every reason for thinking that the best years the society has ever known are just ahead.

Established in the confidence which grows out of the past, firm in the faith and promise of the present, with a vision of world need that is a call for their best service in the years ahead, and with a simple resolve to follow their Master wherever he may lead, the women come up to their Jubilee.

Shall Baptists Mortgage Their Future?

THE attention of our readers is called to a statement by the secretary of the Home Mission Society appearing on pages 647-8 of this issue. Skip whatever else you will, but be sure to read with careful attention this detailed announcement.

Several important matters will engage the attention of the delegates to the meeting of the Northern Baptist Convention at Des Moines, but none of them have greater significance than this one. Indeed in the policy which is here avowed by the Home Mission Society we are introduced into the very center of what is the main question which has now for several years been disturbing the denomination.

Put into plain words the form in which the question is here raised is this: Shall any or all of our societies and institution accept gifts to which creedal limitations and conditions are attached, and which make certain the perpetuation in named areas during all coming time of a particular type of religious life and theological thought?

In this particular case the statement of belief seems innocent enough, at least in the intention of the donor. Its practical effect would depend upon the attitude of the men whose duty was that of interpretation and who might conceive it in such a way as to destroy or nullify the educational and social work of the denomination.

Members of Baptist churches have always had the right, within the scope of the work being done by our societies, to designate their gifts whether for evangelization, hospital care or some other form of Christian service. This is not the matter in question. The issue is whether the widow with her two mites, the rich man with his million and all other members of Baptist churches are to be encouraged to attach to their gifts conditions based upon their own particular theological views and effective in proportion to the amount of their gifts. The question arising in the policy now proposed is whether an individual or church shall be accorded the right to prescribe the scope of the denomination's work. What then becomes of Baptist democracy? Such a course leads us straight into doctrinal anarchy not of a theoretical but of a practical sort. Conceivably gifts might be received from a second loyal Baptist, under conditions which would be in some respects the opposite of those laid down by the first donor, but which were to be employed in work in the same area.

There has been a considerable demand for a closer control of Baptist schools by the Northern Baptist Convention. The reason assigned for this demand is that there is danger of these schools coming under the control of persons who are not in harmony with the collective conviction of the denomination, and may thus become propagandists of some personal or factional interest. Whether that danger exists under our present educational system or not, the policy here proposed precipitates in our missionary societies the very evil which some fear in the conduct of our school. It abdicates denominational control of those societies, and exposes them to all the evils of irresponsible local and personal control.

The Home Mission Society glories in the fact that it has never asked any of its workers to sign an imposed creed. It has been content to leave the examination of candidates to local ordination councils, city mission societies or state conventions and has not hesitated to appoint men who were certified by such bodies as holding the faith common to our Baptist churches. With this policy we are in perfect agreement. Shall we now depart from it in favor of what is practically government by individuals instead of by the general body of Baptists?

There is a living body of theological opinion held in general by the Baptists collectively at any particular time. To this body of opinion, Baptist workers are subject. There is no reason why pastors, missionaries, professors, editors, secretaries and all others should object to testing their own views by it. No one is certain, however, that this living faith will express itself fifty or even ten years from now in the same terms as at present. The very fact that there is now a demand that we give to the world a new expression of our faith as Baptists is indication that many believe that the old statements have been outgrown or have become inadequate for their purpose. The evangelical facts abide for all Baptist churches, but the statements made in confessions and covenants vary and must vary. Christ would surely not be satisfied with a church which became stagnant or which drifted rapidly into such a formalism as a fixed statement would make certain.

The Home Mission Society has accepted a large gift on the conditions named by Sec'y White. What does the denomination think about it? Does not approval mean an increasing number of gifts to which the same or other theological conditions are attached?

Witness, but Wear No Chains

THE bond of union between Baptist churches has always been found in a vital religious experience and not in a form of words to which they gave allegiance. The interpretation of that experience they have found in the New Testament and not in any man-made creed.

From time to time, groups of churches have issued confessions of the faith they held in common, both as a witness to the world and for mutual information and encouragement. But they have always been careful to state that such statements merely represented the faith which was common to them and were not in any way intended to be binding upon other churches or bodies, all of which were encouraged to search the Scriptures for themselves. They have feared above all things the imposition of a creed which they felt would be the enemy of vital religion and a certain road to spiritual stagnation in the churches. Examples are the well-known New Hampshire and Philadelphia confessions.

Two years ago Southern Baptists gave out a fraternal address to the churches in which there was put into words the faith which was then held by the great body of the Baptist churches of the South. But this has never been regarded as a creed and no attempt has been made to use it as a yardstick by which men should be measured and their fitness for membership in a church or for the pastorate or any denominational position determined. Their spokesmen have more than once warmly resented the charge that such a statement had the character of a creed.

In recent years there has been great development among Northern Baptists in the way of denominational organization. Our anniversaries were formerly merely the annual meetings of a group of largely unrelated societies. The Northern Baptist Convention has given us a national organization through which work has been done with a maximum of efficiency and with a great reduction of effort. It is really a democratic body subject to no control but its own carefully formed judgment. This newer organization meets with the general approval of the churches. There is no longer opposition. If there are minor defects all know that they can be remedied in an orderly way by action of the body. The convention has never yet made any statement to the churches or to the world as to positions held by the Baptist churches of the North. Some have assumed that it never would make such a statement, confining itself exclusively to the promotion of denominational tasks.

This year, there is a growing demand that a statement of some sort be issued. There might be advantages in this, provided the task could be entered into with deliberation, apart from the toil and hurry of a great convention. Such a confession, if made, should take the form of an address to the churches. It should be framed by a large committee representing the denomination as a whole and not any one group in it, for there would be no value attached to it unless it represented the faith which is actually held by the churches. Early in the fall, such statement could be published in the denominational press and the committee could hold itself open to suggestions from individuals or from churches. Then at the next meeting of the convention the result could be placed before the delegates of our churches. Such a process is slow, but only in such a way could there be framed a statement which would mean anything and which would be acceptable.

Moreover (and here we touch on the heart of the matter) Baptists as a whole will never have anything to do with such a statement unless it is made clear to them that it is not a creed, that it is not to be used as a measuring rod by which somebody is to try individuals and organizations, that it is not to be an encouragement for heresy hunters and a beginning of heresy trials. True Baptists of every type will fight to the end anything which is to become for them a creed such as have been the blight of organized Christianity. A witness to the churches and to the world is timely; the adoption of a creed would be fatal. Whatever is done must conserve both the evangelical position Baptists hold and also their glorious heritage of liberty.

Our Debt to the Women of the Past

From 1871 to 1921—From two pioneer missionaries to ten great fields, 112 stations and 275 missionaries—Bible women, training schools, Sunday schools, social centers, hospitals, colleges—Pictures of Jubilee guests.

BY MARTHA H. MACLEISH

JUBILEE causes us to take a long look back into the past, to the day of small things, when, fifty years ago women came together to start a work for God of whose outcome they could not dream. The growth of their societies illustrates the power of seemingly insignificant things if undertaken for God and carried on in His strength.

The contrast between then and now is sharp. Then two missionaries sailed together, December '71, one from the Eastern Society, one from the Western. Now, nearly sixty are sent in one year. We have now 257 missionaries working in 112 stations upon ten great fields. We have over one thousand schools in which are nearly 125,000 pupils, taught not only by missionaries, but by some 1700 native teachers, themselves the product of our schools. These schools range all the way from kindergarten to high and normal, and now at last even to college grade. Also technical and vocational training is increasingly given. The ultimate object of all this is to bring youth into the knowledge of Jesus Christ and to help in establishing Christian civilization. No part of missionary work brings so many to Christ as the educational.

Wide Social Outreach

In purely evangelistic work we have 225 Bible women devoting their whole time to telling the story of Christ, Bible training schools in each country, orphanages, homes for widows, Christian social centers and thousands of Sunday schools. In medical work we have twenty-six hospitals and dispensaries and over 100 native assistants. In addition to training given in our own hospitals we have a part in two union medical colleges. We are beginning now to receive back into service, from colleges and medical schools, our own girls. Y Nandamah, one of our Oriental guests, is of that class, the product of our own schools, a graduate of a medical college, come back to work in our Nellore hospital. Our other guests are also the product, the first fruits, of these fifty years of educational work conducted by our two women's foreign mission societies.

What hath God wrought! Emily Judson wrote in 1849 to a friend in the home land:

Hope Survived the Drudgery

"The affairs of the mission are creeping on as usual. All sorts of means are tried and sometimes one succeeds and sometimes another, but I believe no one gets discouraged and why should they?"

"It is a glorious employment I can assure you and though it has pleased God to throw upon those now in the field the drudgery of preparation the day will come when both sower and reaper shall rejoice together. I am thinking, too, that great reaping time is not far distant."

Surely a reaping time is here. What shall we harvest in the next fifty years?

Of those two missionaries who sailed in December, '71, one was Alvira Stevens, from Rockford, Ill. Already Sarah J. Higby was out there. She left teaching in Chicago to go to missionary work under the Union Missionary Society, of which Mrs. Doremus was president. When our Society of the West was formed she transferred to it and was one of our ablest workers. In later years the British government conferred upon her the Kaiser-i-Hind medal for valuable services.

Another notable woman already in the Orient was Miss Adele Field. She went out by a sailing vessel in '65 to marry a missionary, Mr. Chilcotts, who had preceded her. After a long, trying voyage she arrived to find her dear one many months dead.

Miss Field Drinks Bitter Cup

The beautiful letter which she sent home is a wonderful lesson in faith and courage. She wrote:

"I had journeyed seven weary months over tempestuous seas and in strange lands to meet my beloved, and I have found his grave with the grass upon it seven months' old. I have come to my house; it is left unto me desolate.

"While I stood holding out my hand for a cup of happiness, one of fearful bitterness was pressed violently to my lips.

"I looked joyfully towards Providence and it turned upon me a face of inexpressible darkness. And because I believe in God I have been able to endure it.

"The voyage was long, with contrary winds, many storms and frequent calms. We were sixty-three days in going from New York to Cape Town, where we spent five days; forty-nine days in crossing the Indian Ocean to Java, and thirty in sailing up the China Sea. In Hong Kong, while I awaited the arrival of Mr. Chilcotts, Dr. Legge brought me tidings of his death. After a month in China, I, with Mr. and Mrs. Wilson of the Presbyterian Mission, obtained passage for Bangkok, and I arrived eight days ago.

"At Dr. Deans I have received such welcome as would be given to a beloved and long-absent sister. While their loving kindness gives me home and friends, they have with delicate consideration, kept the house which my husband had prepared for my reception just as he left it. I occupy it, and am far less unhappy than I would be elsewhere. It is so pervaded by the atmosphere of his holy life and triumphant death that everything I see and touch reminds me not so much of the joy I have lost as of the bliss he has attained. In it the 'things unseen' become as real to me as things visible.

"Here are his cast-off garments; he has put on robes of glory. Here are the lamps by which he studied; he has now the light of the throne. Here is his cup; he drinks now at 'the fountain of living waters.' Here are the trees he planted; he now walks under those whose 'leaves are for the healing of the nations.'

"Through all these mementoes of himself he says to me, 'If ye loved me, ye would rejoice because I go to the Father.'"

Miss Field turned her sorrow into new strength. She conceived the idea of training Bible women, and was first to put the idea in practice. In 1870 Minnesota asked the privilege of supporting her; so that she came naturally under the Society of the West when it was formed.

Maria Bronson Goes to Assam

In '72 Maria Bronson went to Assam, the country from which Mrs. Tolman had sent the appeals for help which resulted in formation of the Society of the West.

Medical work in China was started at Swatow in 1878, by Dr. C. H.

Daniels of Michigan. The hospital there was built by the women of Michigan, and to it Dr. Anna K. Scott went when she returned to the field as a medical missionary under our board.

But not only upon foreign field was notable work beginning. Foundations were being laid at home also for the great structure which has since arisen.

Three Women Who Started Things

Miss Ella O. Patrick, of Marengo, Ill., at once established a circle in her own church which has just celebrated its golden jubilee. Miss Patrick, though never well or strong filled many important offices for twenty years, and at last left a large bequest to the girls' school in Sendai, Japan, called in memory of her, the Ella O. Patrick School. This has now become one of our most important institutions.

Mrs. Justin A. Smith was perhaps first to establish regular mission study. She wrote for publication "Ten Studies in Baptist Missions." For ten years she also conducted in the Standard a page called "Children's Work in Missions," and sent out thousands of hektograph programs for mission bands. Who can estimate the fruit which this seed sown among the children of that day has produced in the present generation?

Perhaps the greatest of all, Mrs. A. M. Bacon was the leading spirit in establishing the Society of the West, and its able secretary for forty years. Late in life she fell and broke her hip and lay in a hospital for many weary months. There she had a world map hung upon the wall where she could see it constantly. On it were indicated fields and stations of our societies and as she lay, helpless in body, she continued instant in prayer for every missionary in each one of the stations. Who may know the power of those prayers?

The Roll of Heroines

It is impossible to give the names of all the large-souled women who went to the foreign field under the Society of the West. Among them were Miss Anna E. Fredrickson, who did a notable evangelistic work in Rangoon, Burma; Dr. Josephine M. Bixby, who established the hospital at Kityang, China, and gave her life for her patients; Miss Harriet N. Eastman, of Toungoo, Burma; Miss Annie Buzzell, who, after twenty-five years in Sendai school, has gone once more into pioneer work in the north of Japan, and writes of her joy in it; Miss Helen L. Corbin, now Mrs. J. R. Goddard; Miss Johanna

DR. Y. NANDAMA

Anderson, who gave her life to Burma; Emma Inveen, afterwards Mrs. Upercraft, who after a remarkably beautiful and fruitful life has just passed to her reward; Lavinia Mead who established the Osaka Bible Training School, and has been for over thirty years on her field; Dr. Anna K. Scott, who, after seventeen years of service as a missionary's wife in Assam, came home widowed, studied medicine and in 1899 went out under our society to do a notable work as physician in Swatow, China. There she remained until her grand-daughter was ready to come and take her place. Then there was Helen Elgie, of Michigan, beloved by all, who carried on the school at Ningpo, China, for many years, leaving it to Dora Zimmerman when she married Dr. J. A. Scott, of Japan; Anna V. Johnson, who established and has conducted for nearly twenty years our fine Bible Training School in the Philippine Islands; Anna Long, who has done a similar work in Assam; Julia Parrott, who went out twenty-five years ago to do evangelistic work among the Burmans in Mandalay; Alta and Stella Ragon, who have worked among Karens and Kachins in Burma, one of them for twenty years. The needs of the Burman field appear in Alta Ragon's reports, some years ago, to the Burman Conference—"I have had three incarnations in Burma," she said. "In the first I was a woman. In the second I was a man. In the third I was a man and his wife." Thus are our missionaries called upon to fill the vacant places.

Among other missionaries of long service are Miss Ella J. Taylor who has just been called home, and Miss Louise Tschirch who went to Burma in 1884 and was still there until she came home last year on furlough; Miss Dorcas Whitaker, a trained nurse, who went first in 1898 and is now holding a medical station all alone in India; Miss Whelpton, another nurse, who has worked in the Philippine Islands; Amy Acock who has spent sixteen fruitful years in Japan; Beulah Bassett and Pearl Page, happy, able workers in West China; Irene Chambers, working with them part of the time, called home by family needs, now ready to go back; Florence Doe and Edith Crisenberry in our delightful school at Nowgong, Assam; Bertha Davis, of Ongole, India; Nellie Lucas of Burma; Mary Jesse, who is now head of the Sendai School; Violetta Peterson and Cecilia Johnson, carrying on Miss Higby's work at Tharawaddy, Burma; Mary Jones, originator of the Mother-Craft School at Huchow, China; Louise Campbell, with her far-famed agricultural experiments in South China; Mary Parish and Helen Petherem in Burma; Helen Rawlings, training Chinese girls to be kindergartners in Hangchow; Melvina Sollman and Edith Traver, doing a great work in Swatow, where is also Fanny Northcott; Mary Cressy, carrying on Martha Covert's work of Bible training in Ningpo, and Lucile Withers, large enough and strong enough to hold her own at the end of this long line, though by no means at the end of the line in her nursing and training of nurses in China.

Many, through one cause or another, have dropped from our ranks, notable among them in Mary Nourse who helped to build up the Union Girls' School in Hangchow, and then went, as our contribution, to Ginling College. Others we have contributed through marriage, to the ranks of our Foreign Mission Society.

Time fails to speak farther of our Gideons and Baraks, our Samsons and Davids, our prophets "who, through faith subdued kingdoms, wrought righteousness, . . . obtained promises, out of weakness were made strong." They all illustrate the glory and the blessedness of investing one's life in work for God and humanity.

Our Doctrine of Liberty—Its Basis, Its Limits and Its Continuance

BY JOHN R. BROWN

THE doctrine of religious liberty, or freedom of conscience in religious beliefs, was not originated by Baptists, nor has it at any time been in their exclusive possession. They were the first, however, to take it out of the realm of academic rights and to give it a fighting chance. It was a principle for which they were ready to die: they incorporated it in all their early confessions of faith, they put it at the front in their struggle with kings and magistrates, and they finally had it written in statute books and in the common judgment of good men. John Locke gives them full credit for this achievement: "The Baptists were from the beginning friends and advocates of absolute liberty—just and true liberty—equal and impartial liberty." The Baptist doctrine of liberty is something taken for granted, but like all spiritual victories that have at last been reduced to a phrase, it calls for a re-examination.

It is singular, that in spite of this history, Baptists have never come through with a complete understanding as to the meaning of religious liberty. They are very sure that the state has no concern with doctrine, and that political coercion in matters of belief is abhorrent and to be resisted to the death. They are just as certain that no other body of Christ can lay upon them any authority in faith and practice. Even the godly Baxter tried to coerce them into an acceptance of the findings of the Westminster Assembly. He came out of that struggle with some mental smartings and complete defeat. It was his experience with the Baptists that made him say: "I abhor unlimited liberty and toleration of all, and think myself easily able to prove the wickedness of it." But Baptists have yet to pronounce in some way what some of the larger implications of religious liberty really are. It means something more than to believe what we wish. That is only singularity, and often a confession of ignorance. True liberty finds more points of agreement than terms of difference.

Our Theory of Liberty

Unfortunately, Baptists are not yet agreed on what constitutes liberty within their own ranks. They are as one as to what liberty means in relation to those who are without, but some have often tried to use a coercion within the denomination which has frequently developed into obscurantism and schism. Theoretically, religious liberty is granted in Baptist churches: if a man has had an experience in Christ, the Holy Spirit is supposed to be his teacher. His doctrine is his own. It can be confessed to other men, but in exact form can never be imparted to other men. It is a growing deposit of truth, changing in many points, and always subject to revision as faith deepens and life enriches. But always with each change the essential beliefs are carried along, so that there is mental and spiritual continuity. To prevent any coercion of beliefs, Baptists have had confessions of faith and have avoided schemes of definitive doctrine called creeds. All these confessions of faith, without exception, disclaim any authority to compel men to believe them; even the New Hampshire Confession, when first promulgated, carried a warning letter that the articles of faith which it contained were advisory only.

But in spite of such warnings and understandings the tendency develops in times of spiritual stress to turn confessions of faith into creeds. At the same time it becomes the contention of certain groups to insist that there are certain beliefs and positions which make a body of orthodoxy. The natural order in Baptist churches is then reversed; instead of judging himself to see whether he is in the faith, he is judged by a body of opinion drawn up by a certain section in the denomination itself. An unofficial creed takes the place of the liberty of the Spirit.

When this condition of things is reached, a conscientious believer has to find for himself the liberty of the Spirit once more. Religious liberty then becomes for him three distinct things: the liberty of belief, the liberty of preaching, or as it would be called in school or college, the liberty of teaching; and the liberty of association—has he any right to stay in a Baptist church? These practical aspects of his liberty are generally denied. The contention is often made that a man cannot believe in evolution and hold to the gospel of Jesus Christ; that he cannot use the results of the historical criticism and preach the truth as truth is in Jesus; that he cannot raise some questions about the historicity of some parts of the Bible and remain honestly in a Baptist church. Whenever these conclusions are reached, the right of judgment is taken from the reason and conscience of the believer and applied by a number who lay down credal tests, while at the same time they ask no questions about the fruits of the Spirit at all.

Denounce—Exclude—Withdraw?

Those who thus practically deny the rights of liberty of conscience within the Baptist denomination have had before them three practical alternatives of action, and sometimes of spiritual coercion. Since a heresy trial in the strict sense of the term is impossible among us, some kind of division of opinion must be created in which the unorthodox will be excluded, if not in the ecclesiastical sense, in the equally efficacious way of making further association and co-operation impossible. Denunciation is the first and in the beginning the most popular of these methods. The hue and cry is raised; suspicions are turned into charges; and reputations are thrown away. It was the method that John Gill used in his struggle for High Calvinism; the shafts of his disfavor were most frequently sent into the teaching and influence of Andrew Fuller. It was the method that the "rigid Baptists," as Bunyan called them, used in their attempt to drive him out of the denomination because his ideas of the church and the ordinances were too large for them to understand. For a time this method creates disturbance and divides counsels, but rarely are men led to change or to be driven out by it. The words of Bunyan himself are a commentary on the futility of the method: "Mine own self they have endeavored to persuade to forsake the church; some they have sent quite off from us, others they have attempted and attempted to divide and break off from us, but the mercy of God, have been hitherto prevented."

Exclusion is the next method which is resorted to. But when we remember the large number of churches there are, and when we bear in mind how the common sense of most churches asserts itself at last, the number of exclusions for questions of doctrine is very small. It is through associations that exclusions are generally made. A large number of associations have confessions of faith, which are turned into test creeds with some literalistic interpretations. Then a church is penalized because of its minister, or because it has not allowed a wave of doctrine to wash it away from its old-time moorings.

There is only one other practical method by which liberty of conscience may be impugned—by separation. It was once the only logical result of deep differences of opinion. But it is by no means easy today. Separation is a drastic act, involving great sacrifices if not high principles. Sentiment is a great deterrent, and when we see the earnest and clean lives of those from whom we most radically differ, when we realize what they have been to us in our sacramental experiences, we must convince ourselves that comradeship with them will be hurtful to faith and life before we can in good conscience repudiate them. It is always difficult, as Paul warns us, to judge the servants of another man—when we ourselves are also servants. Then too, we have always to learn from the cold world of fact, that less than one-tenth of all the separations in the universal church of Christ have lasted five years.

Liberty—a Field for Growth

Liberty of conscience, then, is built at last on community of interest and personal loyalty. Has liberty of conscience any defined limits, or is it an unmarked frontier of the soul, always steadily going out into the unknown? Is it a No Man's Land, where we may be finally lost? Milton once called faith "the land without frontiers." The limits of liberty are clear enough when we think of it as the field where we allow life to expand and ideas to grow. The freedom of the press is limited in law by these considerations: it must not publish anything that leads to immorality, that breaks down the reputation of honorable men and women, and that induces to the dishonor of God. Religious liberty has only the limits of good morals, of true faith, and of helpful truth. For us these are enshrined in the life and death of Jesus Christ. When the Name which is above every name excites us to worship, to serve, to sacrifice and to die—all the rest is interpretation, and it is the spirit which leads us into the Truth. If as Mill reminds us, the cure for the ills of political liberty is more liberty, it is even more profoundly true in the sphere of religious freedom. This is not the time, when a world is being reconstructed, to set up standards beyond which we forbid men to go. For one thing they will pay no heed to us, and just as inevitably if we deny liberty to them we shall find our own souls passing out into the narrow place where we become repeaters, and know nothing of the joy of new worlds and new inspirations and new truths. He who takes away the soul liberty of another imprisons his own conscience. When we are too anxious or timid about the limits of liberty may we not remember that high resolve of Roger Williams: "To keep my soul undefiled in this point, and not to act with a doubting conscience."

Roger Williams Stood Unshaken

If any man ever had occasion to find limits for liberty of conscience it was Roger Williams. Extravagances of opinion and even worse licenses of life troubled him and the town which he had founded. By banishment and by some other means of coercion he might have forced a surface unity of opinion. But in 1640 he and his friends passed this resolution: "We agree, as formerly have been the liberties of the town, so still to hold forth liberty of conscience." This comprehensiveness, which was thus formally granted, had already been made a basic principle by the church which he had founded. It is a high resolve to strike at any time. It probably is harder to make now than at any time for a hundred years. A complete reaction in social theory, in economics, and in political views is upon us. We are feeling it in the realm of the church as well. There is a natural impatience with difference of opinion, and a universal tendency to recrimination, which are accentuating themselves in certain kinds of doctrinal propaganda.

As the Holy Spirit has not yet given us all the Truth, and because it cannot be completed in any time of which we can think, liberty of conscience in matters of faith and interpretation we must always have. It will continue as long as there are truths to learn, souls to save, and a world to serve.

What Are the Real Questions Before the Northern Baptist Convention?

Organization of the Northern Baptist Convention satisfactory to both sides—Real ground of debate stated by two representative leaders

I. Government, Gospel and Goal

BY WM. B. RILEY

A WEEK ago I contributed an article to THE BAPTIST in answer to an open letter addressed to me through the columns of the same. There was neither the dignity nor weight to that letter nor to my reply that becomes the tremendous subject before us.

Having answered the letter as it seemed to me to deserve, I now ask the privilege of discussing the real questions that are up before the Northern Baptist Convention. I think they might be voiced under three heads—our government, our gospel, and our goal.

Our Government

The convention form of government has not been made the subject of special criticism by anybody. We were a practical unit in preferring the convention, proper, to the old-time anniversaries of the societies, and it is doubtful if there are any considerable number who regret the new organization. It has had at once an autonomy and continuity that have united in the interest of economy of time and efficiency of transaction.

There has been complaint from the first that liberal theologians have been specially honored in connection with the program, but if that be true, it is a matter of politics rather than organization and is nothing against the convention form.

There is a very wide-spread impression to the effect that certain officials of the convention have assumed somewhat autocratic attitudes toward individuals and churches that would not wheel into line and do with alacrity what existing committees had requested at their hands. In a careful investigation of these complaints (many of which have reached me), I find that there are few instances in which they are justly lodged against the convention officers proper. In a great majority of the complaints, the autocratic attitude has been assumed by state, rather than by convention officials, and this is more a matter of personal temperament than of imperfect organization.

Our Gospel

When it comes to the second subject, however,—our gospel—we are on far more critical ground. Here our forces are well-nigh hopelessly divided.

The line of cleavage is not the question of millennialism. If it were, the breach could be healed, and the factions could be brought immediately into a close fellowship of service and even of love, as the Southern Baptist Convention abundantly illustrates.

In the Northern Convention brethren are attempting "to walk together" without "agreement," and the conflict is one of creed. As we see it, it is the conflict between German rationalism on the one side and the old evangelical faith on the other side; the conflict between modernism and orthodoxy; the conflict between the philosophy of DesCartes and the so-called science of Darwinism, and the discipleship of Jesus; the conflict between the doctrine of the divine immanence—pantheism—and the divine transcendence—theism; the conflict between the question of an "inspired Bible" or an "evolved book;" a "divine Christ" or a "highly developed man;" between "the efficacy of the shed blood of Jesus" and "the efficiency of self-sacrifice;" the conflict between infallibly-based doctrines and a religious basis that shifts with the rise of every sun. But in the last analysis, it comes wholly to one question—that is, the old question of the Reformation. For that matter, it is the whole question of Christianity from its birth: Is the book we call the Bible divinely and infallibly inspired, a God-given revelation, or is it a purely human product, revealing the mental development of man in the process of evolution?

To bring the people who believe the latter to be true to accept the positions of the former, is impossible. We are told distinctly by modernists that they cannot accept our views of the Bible. Then why not admit the fact that we cannot both be Baptists, since it is made clear by all the teachings of history upon the subject that no people ever affirmed themselves to be "one body" who could not agree upon "a basis of belief?"

Our Goal

The division over the question of our gospel has resulted in an equal division over the question of our goal. In the judgment of the orthodox our goal is the evangelization of the world. In the opinion of the modernists, our goal is the religious civilization of the world. These different objectives result in differently-placed emphasis. The first company, the orthodox, would make the preaching of the gospel, or evangelism, the great work in all pagan and heathen countries, believing as we do that once the people are evangelized, they will in consequence take care of the questions of education and civilization. In our judgment, nine-tenths of the money raised and expended by the churches ought to go into evangelization. In the older established parts of the world, colleges are abundant, and as things now exist, there is absolutely no more religious atmosphere or positive religious teaching in our denominational schools than exist in the state institutions. We count it, therefore, a wicked waste of money and a needless double taxation, to endow such schools. The modernists, believing as they do that religious civilization is the need of the world, have contrived by convention machinery to commit us to a program that calls for the expenditure of one-third of all money raised for school endowment, involving the support of their special apostles of modernism.

These principles affect the foreign fields as perfectly as the home one. We find that some of our schools on the foreign fields are captured by the new theologians and conducted in the interest of modernism, and we find that many of the missionaries now being sent forth from the modernist-manned home schools do not hold at all to the faith of our forefathers, nor, in the judgment of orthodox men, to any faith that can justly be called Christian.

This creates a difficulty in evangelization itself, and raises the question whether conservatives can possibly continue to contribute their money to the conduct of schools on foreign fields, or to the sending of missionaries to the same fields, who utterly oppose all that those churches hold to be fundamental in the Baptist faith.

Division or Debate?

To work out a way to solve this problem is difficult in the last degree. I can't expect a man who, by reason of his education, is committed utterly to the DesCartes philosophy and Darwin science, to consent either to my philosophy of religion or program of procedure. The amazing thing to the orthodox men is that the modernists expect us to consent to their philosophy and program, or, if we can't consent, to keep silence any how and put our moneys into programs that are utterly repugnant to us, programs that we believe to be opposed to Christ himself. It begins to look as though the only fair thing to do would be to divide the schools and divide the missions, separating the orthodox from the modernists, and let ten years of time test out which philosophy is true by a careful study of the fruits of the respective fields. This, of course, means cleavage in the denomination, but which is better—a kindly division or a continuous and bitter debate?

Shall the Majority Be Impeded by the Ultras?

BY JAMES M. STIFLER

I HAVE been permitted to see the manuscript of Dr. Riley's article and I feel that we are indebted to him for a clear and frank statement of what he conceives to be the issues at the approaching session of the Northern Baptist Convention. It is a sincere effort to clarify our thinking over the matters that are disturbing our fellowship and our common enterprises and is welcome. It will unquestionably promote harmony if others of us will endeavor to be equally explicit as Dr. Riley, which is my apology for what follows.

Dr. Riley correctly analyzes the general satisfaction which we feel with our denominational machinery. To call it "government" seems misleading because essentially it is not that. Our convention is a committee of the whole and our boards are sub-committees. There is not one man or church but is free to dis-gree and withdraw at any time both his cooperation and his support.

Charge of "Contriving" Answered

He suggests that one group have, by playing politics, "contrived" to secure control of the convention.

It has been my privilege to share in much of the convention work from the nominating committee up. Dr. Riley knows that not even Baptists are free from defects, and there have been without doubt some axes that sought grinding. That is human nature. The real point is whether there has been a full opportunity for everyone to advocate his point of view and freedom to be adequately represented.

I believe this to be the case. Since the schools are at present the focus of discussion and I have served for ten years on the Board of Education I know from experience that this board is a fair cross section of our denomination, and furthermore that what we call conservative theological opinion predominates on it, which I believe to be true of our denomination as a whole.

We Bow to No Baal

On Dr. Riley's second point, our gospel, one questions whether we are "hopelessly" divided. Divided we certainly are, even as every large body of men is divided, with a right and left wing and center, hyper-radicals, hyper-conservatives and middle-of-the-road people. It is my unshakeable belief that in the actual membership of our Baptist churches we are overwhelmingly in the center and leaning toward the right. There are many times nine thousand of us that have not bowed the knee to Darwinism, Pantheism or Unitarianism on the one hand, nor have we bowed to a mechanical and medieval view of the Bible on the other hand.

A close examination of our leadership in the convention will probably show this to be true there also.

There are men in positions of leadership in our denomination who theologically are Unitarian, who represent a form of religion that history has repeatedly shown to be impotent, and at the other extreme are men who would test every man by the rigid shibboleths of a Christian Phariseism as merciless as that which crucified our Lord.

Where the Great Majority Stands

Dr. Riley has hardly stated the case judicially, for the issue at Des Moines is not whether one or the other of these shall rule, but whether the fundamental division between them shall destroy the harmony of the great majority of us who agree with neither of them.

Premillennialism is assuredly not the issue. Our attitude toward the Bible assuredly is the issue and both the hyper-conservative and the hyper-rationalistic will find that the great majority of us believe the Bible to be the inspired word of God, Jesus the true Son of God and our Saviour, and that we should obey the suggestion that we gird up the loins of our minds, search the Scriptures and use our minds to get what we are searching after, viz., truth.

We believe with Luther that men under the guidance of the Holy Spirit are able to establish a canon and to interpret God's will for men, and that this exercise of spiritually-guided human intelligence has collated for us the books that comprise our Bible. And being Baptists we are not inclined to let either the man who calls himself orthodox or the man who submits to the degree of rationalist interfere with our freedom in Christ.

Moreover, we strive to be enough like Christ to say, "Forbid him not, for he that is not against us is for us."

Dr. Riley considers that we are divided as to our goal. There would be such a division as to goal if there existed the assumed division in our fundamental beliefs.

The goal of the orthodox as the evangelization of the world and of the modernist as the religious civilization of the world, is the issue as he puts it. I think he is correct. And I believe that if either ideal were allowed full sway we would get neither an evangelized world nor a Christian civilization.

We already have had a good many more than the ten years' experiment that he suggests. Fifty years experience of our own and boards of other denominations have conclusively demonstrated that when the foreign peoples are evangelized it will be when they hear Christ preached in their own tongue by a man of their own race.

Therefore, the main body of us believe that we shall quickest reach our goal of evangelizing all the nations by training the disciples just as Jesus did when he planned the evangelization of a whole world. So we would carry on evangelization and education side by side in about equal proportion, just as He did.

The problem as to our goal in foreign lands is only a reflection of our problem here at home.

"If We Can Stand Both of You"

And the amazing thing to the vast majority of us who do the heavy work and pay the bills is that either the ultra-modernist or the ultra-orthodox should insist that we stop or split or impede a great work that we are trying to do in a spirit of tolerant brotherly energetic love.

We do not believe that there is any cleavage necessary; if we can stand both of you, we think you should be able to stand each other.

Japan Plays Baseball

BY WILLIAM B. LIPPHARD

A SERIES of unique and unusual baseball games is being played in America this season quite different from any that we have seen before. The opposing team has come many miles across the seas from the Land of the Rising Sun. Waseda University of Tokyo has sent its baseball team to demonstrate before the eyes of interested Americans that Japan knows how to play the American national game.

The team is here on tour until July 14 and is accompanied by Prof. I. Abe of the university faculty as its business manager. H. B. Benninghoff, one of our own American Baptist missionaries in Japan, at the earnest request of the university, has come with the team as American advisor. Its schedule includes games as follows: University of Chicago, May 18; University of Illinois, May 21; Harvard, May 25; Yale, May 27; Pennsylvania, May 30; Johns-Hopkins, June 4; Chicago, June 11; Kalamazoo, Mich., Normal School, June 13; Albion, Mich., June 14; Oberlin College, Ohio, June 18; Oil City, Pa., June 21; Buffalo, June 23, 25; University of Michigan, June 28-29; Seattle, July 4; and games in the Puget Sound region until July 14, when the team will return to Japan.

Waseda University has had a remarkable growth since its founding, almost forty years ago by Marquis Okuma, a leading statesman of Japan. Without public support and without government recognition it has grown from a private school of a hundred ambitious youths to a great educational center of more than 10,000 resident students. Now a regularly recognized university under government control, it is qualified to train men for all positions in private and public life and to give appropriate academic degrees. Waseda is today the largest university in Japan. Since its establishment more than 15,000 men have been graduated. On the faculty are many men like Prof. Abe and other recognized educational leaders. These men are authorities in their respective lines, and their influence has given the institution its merited prestige. During the early years the institution had some difficult financial experiences. American visitors often wondered that university work could be carried on under more or less adverse conditions, forgetting of course, that many of their own universities have struggled against similar conditions until a comparatively recent date. But with success has come prosperity and Waseda is today one of the world's great educational institutions.

In the fall of 1908 upon the invitation of the university authorities, Northern Baptists through their Foreign Mission Society opened work among the students at Waseda and immediately assigned a missionary. Dr. H. B. Benninghoff, who had served some time at Duncan Academy in Tokyo, was asked to transfer his missionary activities to the university. One of the great assets to these efforts is the friendly relationship between the mission and university authorities. As a result of this missionary influence there is a splendid nucleus of earnest Christian young men. The deans of two departments together with the associate deans of two other departments are members of Christian churches. These four leading men exert a constant influence for good on the student body. Thirty other members of the faculty—which numbers more than 300—and several hundred students are Christians.

A fine new community center building, the gift of Mrs. J. E. Scott of Pasadena, California, as a memorial to her husband, is now being erected. This will be known as "Scott Hall," and will be used as a center for religious and social activities among the students. It will more than double Dr. Benninghoff's efficiency.

Should the Northern Baptist Convention Adopt a Doctrinal Standard?

Does the world know where Baptists stand on the Bible, on evangelical doctrines, on the principle of liberty?—How shall we let it know?

YES!

BY FRANK M. GOODCHILD

IT would be a very timely thing for the convention at Des Moines to adopt a confession of faith. Call it a doctrinal standard, a creed, a declaration of faith, just as you please. I should be no more disposed to split hairs about the name of the declaration than to split hairs in definition of the doctrines enumerated in it. What we need is such a simple, strong, positive statement of the beliefs that have held us together during the centuries, as would set us right before the world, and rid us of the confusion among ourselves.

Folks Think We Are Loose

The motion prevails inside our ranks and outside of them that Baptists have no convictions to speak of; that if we believe anything it is against the genius of our denomination to state it, and above all to put it in writing. We are supposed to be disciples of Pyrrho, and to hold all our judgments in suspense. We are supposed to be like Tito in George Eliot's Romola who asked the Lord to forgive him for ever daring to have an opinion about anything. A former Baptist preacher in New York said that no one has a moral right to say about anything that he would believe the same thing tomorrow that he believes today. That is, we cannot be sure of anything for twenty-four hours even. That would bring us at once to the position of Ernst Renan who could not conceive that there could be a faith worth dying for. Baptists never have held their faith so loosely as that.

And Baptists have been in the habit of making very plain statements of their faith, and of putting them in writing, too. And it has been their habit to require a statement of faith from those with whom they associated themselves in worship or work. Much has been said of Baptist liberty as though it meant the right to believe as one pleases and yet retain his place as teacher in a Baptist school, or as a member in a Baptist Church. Of course it means no such thing. Baptist liberty is the right to separate ourselves peaceably from those with whom we find ourselves in disagreement, and then to be undisturbed by either civil or ecclesiastical authority in the exercise of our faith so long as we do not interfere with the rights or conscience of others. When Roger Williams found himself out of agreement with the First Baptist Church of Providence he withdrew, though he had founded the church only a few months before. He might have remained and kept quiet about his convictions. He might have tried to bring the church to his way of thinking. He did neither. He withdrew.

If any one thinks that Baptists have been unwilling to state their faith in the past he has forgotten his Baptist history. In 1527 the Baptists of Switzerland expressed themselves in the "Seven Articles" which Zwingli denounced. English Baptists in Holland, exiles for their faith, made a confession of their faith in 1611. Sixteen Churches in England, mostly in Somerset, issued a confession in 1656. A confession was made by Baptists in London in 1660, twenty-five thousand people approving it. In 1678 another was issued in London, but it was called "An orthodox creed." Then there came what is generally known as the London Confession in 1699. With some changes this became the Philadelphia Confession in 1742, and was adopted by most of the associations of Baptists in this country. This was followed ninety years later by the New Hampshire Confession which has served our churches generally down to the present. It may be that some churches have no confession. But it is inconceivable that a Baptist council would recognize as a church a group of people unwilling to make a statement of what they believe.

We need to make a declaration of our common faith for our own sakes. There is great confusion of mind among us as a denomination. There is much suspicion. The air is full of accusations. We cannot hope to go on in this fashion. Numerous threats of secession are heard. A few conventions like that of Buffalo and we shall disintegrate. Men cannot walk together unless they are agreed. We cannot achieve the great things we have undertaken unless we move together. Let us find at once the things on which we agree. One article of faith might be sufficient for ourselves,—and that should be the age-long one which declared with all positiveness our confidence in the Bible as the inspired word of God, our only and sufficient rule of faith and practice.

What We Ought to Say, and Why

But for those who are outside our ranks something more is needed. The world is sorely distracted just now. It needs a virile faith to steady it. The things Baptist stand for are the very things the world needs in its present crisis. Besides acknowledging the authority of the word of God, we ought to set forth the main articles of evangelical faith. And in addition we ought to state plainly and strongly the distinctive things for which we always have stood,—the direct relation of each person to God with no mediator but Jesus Christ; the spiritual character of the church; the utter separation of church and State. These great truths held forth to the view of the world would furnish a rallying point for all distracted souls in this time of great distress. And the declaration would unite our own forces too, and make us a flaming evangel all over the world.

The sooner we can make such a declaration of faith the better. Our faith is simple and not difficult to state. We have many men amply capable, under the guidance of the Holy Spirit, of putting our common faith into vigorous words. To have a committee work over it for a year would be a delay that we cannot afford. The lack of a positive, united pronouncement of faith robs us of power, the power that we sorely need in establishing our Christian churches and schools at home, and in making the Saviour known to the ends of the earth.

Clinch It with a Covenant

And the declaration of faith should be followed by a covenant which should give a practical turn to what we believe, for a covenant after all is simply a creed turned into a motive, it is the resolution that turns faith into action. Des Moines would be a notable convention if it should witness the Baptist hosts standing together avowing their faith in the living God, and the almighty Saviour, and pledging themselves in the power and wisdom of the Holy Spirit to carry immediately to completion the great plans already made.

NO!

By FREDERICK L. ANDERSON

I AM asked to write on the proposal that the Northern Baptist Convention adopt a doctrinal standard at Des Moines. Let there be no mistake. A doctrinal standard is a creed, and its other name can not make it smell sweet to Baptists.

A creed is a formal doctrinal statement, which is intended to become or is likely to become a test of fellowship and service, a standard by which men are to be measured before they may be admitted to membership or office. Sometimes it may be used as a ready-made yardstick to determine whether men already in positions shall stay in them. Its essential quality is that it is imposed by its authors on others.

Rome Versus Rhode Island

Baptists have always disliked and feared creeds. They seem to be shackles, chains, imposed by those who pretend to authority and spiritual superiority. They are the weapons of force and ecclesiastical tyranny. They belong to the age of Constantine and Nicea rather than to the age of Christ and Paul. They fit the papal theory rather than the Protestant theory. "They smell of Rome rather than of Rhode Island." They go ill with the spontaneity and freshness of true religion, with the meekness and humility of Christ, with the liberty with which He has made us free, with the independence of the Baptist who acknowledges no lords but Jesus Christ, and who gets his experience, his truth and his orders in the secret place, where he and his Lord meet alone.

The imposition of a creed is always the sign that churchianity is getting the better of Christianity. It is begotten in suspicion and brought forth in self-will, and it is the natural foe of love, liberality and mutual confidence. It is the beginning of formalism, conformity, parasitism, obsequiousness and unworthy fear. It is the standardization of life, the strait-jacket of thought, and the prophecy of strife or stagnation. Brethren, let us hold fast to love, humility, service and the simplicity and freedom that are in Christ. Let us cling to the Potestant right of private judgment. Alas for the free Baptists, if in a moment of panic they demand a king like the nations round about and throw away four hundred years of glorious history as the champions and defenders of individual liberty!

A Wrong Way to a Right End

All this is not the purpose of those who propose a doctrinal standard, but it will be the result, if the present plan to standardize our faith succeeds. These good brethren want what I also most earnestly desire, the preservation of all we hold dear; but they have taken not only a wrong way, but a most disastrous way of attaining their object and mine. Of course, it is natural that men should first think of this method of a creed. But history has not only shown that it is the first step in a church's downward path, but that it is utterly futile in accomplishing its object. No man-made creed has finally prevented the Spirit from leading Christians on into larger views of truth. But creeds have bred silent interpretations, mental reservations, equivocation and hypocrisy, till at last men, who differ from the authors as far as the poles, have annually signed their creeds to the ruin of all sincerity, frankness and truth. And then have come the heresy hunts and the heresy trials. It always works this way, and the tighter you make the creed the quicker it begins to work.

Drives Away Our Best

Worse still this method has always driven away the fine open minded independent young men and women and has left only those who were willing to bow their necks to the creedal yoke. This for us would be a disaster, from which we might never recover, though we repented earnestly and with tears.

Brethren, in my next, I will show you (D. V.) a more excellent way, if I have a next.

Silver Trumpets of Women's Jubilee Still Blow

Jubilee at Minneapolis—Jubilee at Rochester—Jubilee at Washington—Grandma Strout, aged ninety, leads the singing—Belinda and Ezra glow with enthusiasm—Nine P's, a Jubilee acrostic and a lot of other things—Distinguished foreign guests.

Golden Jubilee of the Northern District

By MRS. J. A. MANSFIELD

MANY outstanding events marked the Jubilee celebration of the Northwest District at Minneapolis, May 24-26.

The presence of our distinguished foreign guests: Khanto Bala Rai, Nakaji San, Kan En Vong, Y. Nandamah, Dr. Ma Saw Sa, Martha Wenske and Madame Kolatorova; also of our own beloved missionaries, Misses Louise Techirch, Julia Parrott, Violetta Peterson and Evalyn Camp; not to speak of our three matchless leaders, Mrs. Montgomery, Mrs. Elmore and Mrs. Adams, insured the success of our enterprise from the outset. Mrs. A. F. Gale, the Jubilee Chairman was assisted by a large and capable corps of local Baptist women.

The program opened according to schedule with registration and a social hour at the First Church, Tuesday afternoon. Mrs. W. B. Riley was hostess, assisted by the wives of other Baptist ministers, our foreign visitors being guests of honor. The evening session was given over to the W. W. G. pageant presented by the chapter of the First Church, under the direction of Mrs. A. S. Cutler, followed by the illustrated lecture, "Our Mission Fields," by Mrs. T. E. Adams.

On Wednesday came the banquet of the decades, held at the Curtis Hotel, at which women engaged in missionary work from 1871-1881 were honor guests. Grandma Strout, aged ninety, led the 700 guests present in singing, "Blow Ye the Trumpet," and Mrs. G. F. Wilkin acted as toastmistress, with toasts by all our distinguished guests. Wednesday evening a group of young people from Trinity Church, under the direction of Mrs. E. A. Thayer, our beloved district treasurer, presented Mrs. Montgomery's pageant, "The Bible and Missions." Thursday afternoon was Children's Hour, with talks by our visitors and a pageant by the Children's World Crusaders of Judson Church, under the direction of Mrs. Edward Thorson. The W. W. G. banquet was held at Curtis Hotel at 6:15 p. m. with Mrs. E. V. Pierce, toastmistress and Mrs. Erle Luce in charge of arrangements.

The climax of the whole celebration was reached Thursday evening with the presentation of the pageant, "The Call and the Answer," by the women of the Calvary Church, under the direction of Mrs. T. H. Bellin, augmented by a large chorus choir from Twin City Baptist churches, with Mrs. C. C. Aller soloist and chorister. Mrs. Bellin added to the pageant by two very effective improvisations; a large illuminated cross and an open Bible. The large auditorium was packed and many were turned away. Mrs. Montgomery, Mrs. Adams and Mrs. Elmore spoke in highest praise of the pageant and expressed the hope that it might be repeated here many times.

The "Answer" to the pageant, when the call was given by our own beloved Evelyn Camp, was the volunteering for service of over 100 young men and women who took their place on the platform with Dr. W. B. Riley who gave a closing prayer of consecration.

The Jubilee was fitly celebrated by the Northwest District's voting to become a union district; i. e., to combine the work of both home and foreign missions, according to the new constitution adopted by unanimous vote. Mrs. F. B. Lathrop, chairman of the nominating committee, reported the names of new officers as follows: President, Mrs. D. D. Smith; administration vice-pres., Mrs. G. E. Young; foreign vice-pres., Mrs. A. F. Carlton; home vice-pres., Mrs. C. N. Patterson; recording secretary, Miss Alice Perry; treasurer, Mrs. A. E. Thayer.

The Northwest District feels grateful to all whose efforts made the success of the Jubilee possible, and especially to the daily press of Minneapolis which was more than generous in the matter of publicity.

Jubilee at Rochester, N. Y.

THE annual meeting of the Woman's American Baptist Home Mission Society and the Woman's American Baptist Foreign Mission Society was held at the Lake Avenue Baptist Church, Rochester, May 3, 4 and 5.

The Home Mission session was held Tuesday afternoon with Mrs. Orrin R. Judd, presiding. Mrs. J. C. Davis, Mrs. H. C. Choller, Mrs. C. A. Macy, Mrs. William F. Gurley, A. W. Pell, Mrs. S. A. Phillips, Miss Isabel M. Crawford, Miss Albertine D. Bischoff and Dr. Charles A. Brooks, participated in the several parts of a varied and interesting program.

On Tuesday evening the World Wide Guild held its banquet in the commodious gymnasium rooms of the church, with 600 women and girls at tables. Mrs. T. Raymond St. John presided with the foreign representatives as guests of honor. Songs and cheers were led by Miss Pidgeon of Rochester pledging service for the Master, and the "Daughters of the East" gave a return cheer for America.

Following the supper, Miss Alma J. Noble brought a welcome from Guild girls all over the world. Mrs. James M. Pratt announced a $1,200 gift of the New York girls to the Jubilee fund, which made Miss Noble a "Golden Day."

The Guild session ended with the historical play, "Such Things as Dreams are Made Of" by Margaret T. Applegarth.

Wednesday morning dawned fair and clear, and a packed auditorium was ready at 9:30 A. M. for the Jubilee.

Mrs. William F. Gurley presided. Mrs. William A. Montgomery, Mrs. Orrin R. Judd, Mrs. G. E. Goodman, oiled the wheels with greetings, felicitations and preliminary statements.

The next part of the session was in the hands of the missionaries, veterans from the field: Miss Ragon, after twenty-two years in Burma; Miss Vickland of Assam; Miss Julia Parrott of Mandalay; and Miss Pawley of Himeji, Japan.

Mrs. Montgomery presided over the afternoon session.

Mrs. Walter C. Mason spoke on the "Voices of the Past," recalling the early pioneers in New York State, Mrs. Stephen Smith, Mrs. James Colgate, Mrs. J. T. Smith, Mrs. Joseph Brokaw, Mrs. Kendrick of Rochester, Mrs. Noble and Mrs. Taylor of Buffalo and Mrs. Lewis Gurley of Troy. Mrs. James M. Pratt showed that New York District shouldered its quota of $78,000 and reported $100,000 pledged, of which $99,000 had been paid in full. Miss Nellie Prescott presented the foreign guests as the hope of "The Future": Dr. Ma Saw Sa, Burmese, superintendent of the Lady Dufferin Maternity Hospital at Rangoon; Dr. Nundamah, a "third generation Christian," the first woman among the Telegus to study medicine; Khanto Bala Roy of Bengal-Orissa, daughter of a high-caste Brahmin; Kang en Vong, head of the kindergarten department in Hang Chow, China.

The final meeting was held on Thursday morning with Mrs. Judd and Mrs. Gurley presiding.

Mrs. Charles Sumner Brown, Mrs. James M. Pratt, Mrs. George A. Vaughn, Mrs. Cornelius Woelfkin, Mrs. H. E. Ransier, Mrs. A. W. Pell, Mrs. John B. Anderson, Mrs. T. R. St. John, Mrs. Perry Allen Beck, Mrs. W. C. Bromley and Miss Mildred Noble presented in interesting reports the various aspects of the work for the year.

Mrs. Gurley and Mrs. Judd were re-elected presidents of the Foreign and Home Societies respectively.

The 997 registered delegates and visitors, represented all sections of the state.

Belinda and the Atlantic District

By HARRIET NEWELL JONES

YOU poor, dear Ann:

It was just too bad that your old enemy—rheumatism—should have chosen our Jubilee week to attack you. You ought to have been on hand for all the good times in Washington.

And now a letter must go to you right away—but oh, how can I ever get it on paper—our wonderful Jubilee!

Ezra says: "Go to it, Belinda; get it out of your system as quick as you can and then perhaps I can get a word in edgeways." So here goes.

Now, Ann, I want to say in the beginning that when I came home from the Boston Jubilee, I thought nothing anywhere could be half so good. And I still think so in some ways. But in some other ways (don't you ever tell, Ann) I think ours was as the old deacon says, "a leetle mite" better.

In the first place (for I'm going to divide this letter into sections and label each with a P) we had four P's that Boston didn't have. Here are the labels: The Place, the People, the Program, the Pageant, the Pins, the Processional, the President, and the Picture. The last four Boston didn't have.

1. The Place

Believe me, Ann, Washington is the nicest place in the world, particularly just now, for a Baptist convention. It had donned its best spring dress in honor of our coming. Every leaf and bud and blossom nodded the sweetest welcome and every short skirt and fancy shoe and beflowered hat and pleasant smile seemed to say "We're glad you've come."

I tell you, Ann dear, I felt proud of our Capital City—of its wide streets and lovely homes and fine buildings. And prouder still of our splendid Baptists, from the White House down to the members of the smallest Baptist church that helped to prepare for our Jubilee. The only thing that could have been improved was the weather and that was all right except for one day—and then O, how it did pour! But the Good Book says—though Ezra thinks it was Shakespeare—"Many waters cannot quench love," and it was proved then and there. So if you imagine for one minute that any kind of rain kept anybody away or dampened anybody's ardor, "you have another think coming," as Ezra would say. If Washington couldn't stop the rain, it could provide lovely hostesses (I'd like to write a page about mine), with closed cars so that we could go back and forth with not one hair of our happy heads uncurled from the dampness.

2. The People

Those who came and those who lived there were just the best ever. The Washington women were splendid. Ezra wonders if I'll ever get tired of singing their praises. They worked like beavers before and after we came. They met us with smiles and autos at the train, they fed us on the fat of the land, including turkey and cranberry sauce. (Here Ezra who keeps looking over my shoulder as I pound the keys of my machine and interrupting, said, smacking his lips, "Whew, how I wish I'd gone!") I told him he might have spoiled the meeting as he was spoiling my letter by making me forget what I was going to say next, and he has finally subsided.)

I wish you could have seen the lovely ushers!—a dozen or so at each session—bare-headed, white-robed, bright-faced girls, led by the dearest head usher, who made the lovely wands they carried so gracefully, the prettiest you ever saw, all wound with blue (the society's color) and topped with a large blue ring in which nestled a bunch of violets (Atlantic's flower) and from which floated the bow and streamers of yellow, the color of our Golden Jubilee. Boston may have had as lovely girls but it didn't have any such lovely wands. It did have some lovely District Flowers which were loaned us. We love them for that.

But I must hasten to

3. The Program

As I was chairman of the program committee, I can't say much about it only that the printer and Belinda made a good-looking one that worked out even better than it looked. Everybody enjoyed it and we never had a better time.

It began with the reception and banquet at the Immanuel Church—you know, Ann, that's what's going to be the Roger Williams Memorial and belong to all of us. Well, the banquet room was crowded, the tables beautifully decorated, the menu delicious, the sweet girl waitresses gaily garbed in unique aprons of the society's color and everybody busy and happy. Mrs. Abernethy the new pastor's wife of the Calvary church invoked the divine blessing. They say she's going to be a great asset to Washington's work.

Mrs. Howe, the gracious, was the hostess, Mrs. Kendrick, the stately, and Mrs. Johnson, the lovable, were the welcomers, Miss Langstroth, the friendly, was the toast mistress and Mrs. Baker, the ubiquitous, provided the quips, songs and phonegrams that kept us all happy and hilarious until we quieted down in the Auditorium to hear Mrs. Farmer toast the girls of America and Miss Parrott, the girls of the Orient. Then followed greetings from "The Smith and Jones Combination," and the introduction of our dear foreign representatives by Miss Prescott, and then the dramatic exercise written by Miss Applegarth and directed by two dear Washington girls—Misses Richardson and Everett. You ought to have heard it, Ann. It was funny but taught a beautiful lesson at the close. It was called "Such Stuff as Dreams are Made Of."

The sessions of the next two days were all in the Calvary Church where we were warmly welcomed by Dr. Abernethy, the very new pastor, and Mrs. Howe for the District's society and Mrs. Radcliffe for the nation's Capital. Mrs. Smith, the president, made fitting response. Miss Craft and Mrs. Swift brought us helpful messages each morning at the song and prayer service. Mrs. Morris was there to speak for the treasury, Mrs. Wilbur for the Baptist Institute, Mother West for the Home at Newton Centre and Mrs. O'Harra for our very oldest missionary society—that of the First Church, Philadelphia.

Then our dear missionaries—how we loved them and clapped them and wished for more time for them. Miss Culley, our very own first Atlantic missionary from Swatow, China; Miss Magilton, our efficient nurse and dear Dr. Degenring from Nellore, India; Miss Agnes Whitehead and Miss Clara Righter, our honored veterans; Miss Craft who, after many years of waiting here, soon goes back to her beloved Burma and takes her mother with her (isn't that wonderful?); and the charming Miss Parrott who came to tell us all about the place—Mandalay—where our Jubilee Building is going to be.

But I mustn't forget about the reports which we cut short so as to have more time to jubilate. Mrs. Doane reported for the foreign department and introduced the missionaries. Mrs. Jones reported for the home administrative department and introduced the state secretaries, also the White Cross, World Wide Guild, and the Children's World Crusade secretaries. With each report she asked all the delegates from that state to rise. Each company gave a response. Mrs. Savage marshalled seven of her leading New Jersey women to the platform who gave each a couplet to form an acrostic on JUBILEE.

J is for Jubilee, Jersey and Jones—

A name we pronounce with reverent tones.

U is for union and co-operation—

Which we need in the District as well as the nation.

B is for Baptist and Budgets and Brains—

Three very fine words we must keep without stains.

I is for ideals, without fuss and commotion—

They mostly exist in the Board of Promotion.

L is for labor, for learning and love—

A good combination to lead us above.

E is for echo which rings through the blue

When you call on New Jersey so loyal and true.

E is for effort and earnest endeavor

Which each of us here gladly pledges forever.

When the Pennsylvania Twins reported—Mrs. Sames of the East and Mrs. Berlin of the West, a great company arose and sang a Jubilee song to the tune of "The Battle Hymn of the Republic."

We had to have one business session, of course, when the delegates voted unanimously to become a union district and when the new constitution was adopted and the new officers and board elected. Mrs. B. D. Skerrett was the unanimous choice for president; the treasurer and foreign vice-presidents were re-elected; Mrs. Hudson was chosen for home vice-president; and two ladies—Mrs. Newcomb and Mrs. Swift—were elected for administrative vice-presidents. Mrs. Kennelly was made recording secretary and a few changes made in the personnel of the board.

4. The Processional

I must not forget the volunteers so happily introduced by Miss Colburn and welcomed by Mrs. Silver; nor the fine Jubilee report by the Jubilee president which showed that we had given at least $5000 more than our quota. Then followed the Jubilee processional which Mrs.

Baptists From Europe at the Des Moines Convention

BY JAMES H. FRANKLIN

REV. C. G. LUNDIN

NORTHERN Baptists will rejoice to know that representatives from Norway, Sweden and Denmark, as well as from other countries of Europe, will be in attendance upon the Northern Baptist Convention, in response to invitations extended by the American Baptist Foreign Mission Society and the Woman's Society.

The story of Baptist progress in Sweden is most remarkable. In 1848 the first church of our own denomination was established in that country. Today, after only seventy-three years, there are 600 Baptist churches in Sweden, with a membership of more than 60,000. They have a foreign mission society of their own, which supports forty missionaries in China, Africa and elsewhere, and a well-equipped theological seminary. During these years the Baptists of Sweden have sent 30,000 of their own people to America. The names of Broady, Bystorm and Benander are familiar to all of us. The representative of the Swedish Baptists at Des Moines will be Rev.

FACULTY OF SEMINARY IN DENMARK

C. G. Lundin, the Field Secretary of the Foreign Mission Society.

Baptists of Norway will be represented at Des Moines by Rev. J. A. Ohrn, their Secretary of Missions, and by his son, Professor Arnold T. Ohrn, of the Baptist Theological Seminary at Christiania. The Baptists of Norway are a courageous people. With one hand they are reaching up to the North Cape to establish a mission for deep sea fishermen, while with the other hand they are touching Equatorial Africa where already mission work is being undertaken. All up and down Norway may be found Baptist churches, about a dozen of them being within the Arctic Circle.

From Denmark comes Rev. T. P. Grarup, secretary for young people's work of the Baptists of Denmark. Danish Baptists are also facing the future with courage. Like their brethren in Norway and Sweden, they are a noble people and have in their veins the blood of the ancient Vikings.

In addition to these representatives from Scandinavian countries, the Foreign Mission Society will have as its guests at Des Moines, Rev. John A. Frey of Latvia, who was exiled to Siberia during the early years of the war while he was still a Russian subject, and Rev. Robert Farrelly and Mr. Henri Vincent of France, who are students at the Rochester Theological Institution. European guests of the Woman's Society at Des Moines will be Madame Kolator of Czecho-Slovakia and Miss Wenske of Poland.

International Uniform Lesson for July 3

THE EARLY LIFE OF SAUL

Acts, 21:39; 22:3, 28; 2 Tim. 3:14-15; Deut. 6:4-9; Golden Text, Heb. 3:7-8.

The Lesson Text

Taken from four different portions of the scriptures the lesson text indicates something of the influences that entered into the early life of Saul of Tarsus. The first quotation locates the birthplace of Saul and labels his religion; the second gives a hint of his education; the third informs the reader of his citizenship; and the fourth reveals the part the Holy Scriptures had in the boyhood of Saul.

The Lesson Taught

The heritage, the environment and the lives that enriched the early life of Saul may suggest some lines of thought for the teacher.

Heritage

Every human life is like a tree. The tree is half hidden. The roots are the unseen branches. So with the life of Saul of Tarsus. His greatness grew in large part out of his heritage. He himself recognizes that fact when he says he was chosen before he was born to be a missionary to the heathen. His pedigree as he gives it in his letter to the Philippians the third chapter goes back to the tribe of Benjamin, a small but noble tribe; to Israel without admixture reaching back to Abraham; to Hebrew society without the alloy of Sadduceism. Oliver Wendell Holmes being asked when the training of a child should begin, answered, "One hundred years before the child is born." There are no details recorded of the boyhood of Saul; but we can well imagine the kind of home into which he was born and which sheltered him in the formative years. The father was a man of sterling character who had rendered such distinguished service to his country that he was given the freedom of a Roman citizen. And yet despite his activity in the affairs of state, he maintained his religion as a strict Pharisee, bringing up his son in the orthodox faith of the Hebrews. Nothing is recorded of Saul's mother; but may we not see in his letter to Timothy, in which he makes reference to Eunice and Lois, a hint of his own home life and a memory of his own mother and grandmother. The hidden forces in the making of men before they are born and the influences in the first twelve years after they are born are potent factors in the moulding of character and the shaping of destiny.

Environment

By environment is meant Tarsus where he spent his boyhood, Jerusalem where he went as a young man to study, and the Roman world in which he was a citizen. Tarsus was a capital city and a university center. It was also the chief industrial city of Cilicia. To the north of it about 30 miles away one could see the mountains, and to the south almost within sight was the blue Mediterranean. The river Cydnus navigable from the sea as far as Tarsus was lined with wharves and ships. It was a cosmopolitan city. Xenophon had marched through it with his famous army; the Caesars never failed to visit it; Alexander the Great stayed for a time in it, and here Mark Antony entertained the famous Cleopatra. But as Sir William Ramsey says, "The crowning glory of Tarsus, the reason for its undying interest to the whole world, is that it produced Paul." It was Tarsus and the grace of God that made Paul a democrat. He was probably unconscious of the broadening influence of his boyhood environment in making him the first great Christian missionary to the Gentiles and the prime advocate of humanity equality before God. The cosmopolitan spirit of Tarsus had gotten into his blood and on occasion it manifested itself. Jerusalem also had its influence upon Saul. But the influence of Jerusalem was to make Paul an intensive Jewish scholar as the influence of Tarsus was to make him an extensive world commoner. Tarsus helped to make Saul a missionary; Jerusalem helped make Saul a teacher. Out of one came the churches of the Gentile world and out of the other came the epistles to the churches. The Roman world supplied the roads and the ships and the protection which enabled the great apostle to do his work. Paul was the creature of his environment just as all men are. It took Tarsus and Jerusalem and Rome to make a man like Paul. Every great leader reflects his early environment. Go back into the early history of any one of them and the proof of this statement is abundant.

Lives

It takes a life to make a life. Gamaliel had a profound influence upon the young man, Saul. The glimpse we get of Gamaliel in the Acts shows him to have been a man of fine judgment and excellent mind. It is true that Saul as a young man allowed his zeal to prejudice his judgment in persecuting Christians; but deep in his heart he knew that was not according to the spirit and teachings of his great teacher Gamaliel, and it is my opinion that Gamaliel had a good deal to do with the conversion of Saul. The death of Stephen doubtless made a profound impression upon Saul and brought back afresh the teachings of Gamaliel that if Christianity was not of God it would come to nothing. At any rate we could not have had Paul without Gamaliel.

Education in these days has become increasingly a thing of books and pictures and experiments in costly laboratories and psychology and credits academically valued, and the names of the great educators belong to the past. But we must return to the Gamaliels. Mark Hopkins on one end of the log and James A. Garfield on the other is the best kind of a college provided the log is short enough for Hopkins to get his arm around Garfield. "Sitting at the feet of Gamaliel" is much better than making an independent investigation as a student without Gamaliel.

A Patriotic Concert

By FREDERIC T. BAILEY

ALL DAY long the red hot sun had grinned at people's discomfort and when at last he passed beyond the western rim of that July Sunday one felt more like lounging in a hammock than attending church. Next day would be the "glorious Fourth" and word was passed around that tonight there would be a special patriotic service. Probably more hash, I thought, if the program is to be like countless others I have known, but since this is my only opportunity to see how things are carried on in this little country church perhaps I had better go.

Not much decoration, only a blackboard and a few low-lying shrubs along the back of the platform. Why didn't they have a decorating committee?

But the organ ceased and through the doorway at the right came a troop of children, each bearing a foreign flag. As they advanced to the platform eight found holes in the plank on the floor hidden by that shrubbery where they stuck their flags, while the twenty others hung theirs by small hooks upon a line which before had been unnoticed; a line running from the floor at the left of the platform up and along the top of the blackboard and down to the floor at the right, making a display like a battleship on parade.

Immediately following these came the superintendent carrying a large United States flag, and as the audience rose to sing America the flag was placed in a socket on the upper frame of the blackboard in the midst of the other flags, yet above all. I agree that is where America fits, but I was never told it in this way before. The decorations had suddenly become sufficient.

It seemed quite appropriate just then that the pastor offered prayer that the nation which under God holds this high position should realize its obligations to all the others.

The program went on with a logical and certain movement, picturing the beginning of the nation in "Ring, Grandpa, Ring!" and illustrating its growth by means of the blackboard.

First a boy drew a map of the United States, dividing it by vertical lines into three equal parts. In one of these he wrote Great Britain, Ireland, France.

Practicing on Pak

WE MAY as well call him Bateren, since that is what Yuki Ko (Little Miss Snow) will always be calling her father. Yuki Ko's quaint slant eyes had been seeing many amazing things since the day when the doctor from the village down the hill "threw away the spoon," as the Japanese so picturesquely say when life is fast ebbing into death and all has been done that can be done. The honorable little mother had waited for the venerable Man of Medicine to take his obsequious departure with many bowings and many regrets that he had not been successful. When he was gone, Yuki Ko had seen her mother's feeble hands grope under the tattered quilt upon the matting floor, then heard the frail voice saying to Bateren: "Honorable master, I do not know what this treasure may be, but there was a day when a Holy-Book-Go-About-Sell-Man gave it to me, and said it told of the way to peace. But how have I been able to find that way, having no knowledge of reading? Alas, I depart to my ancestors still wondering about this way; but you can read. May you find the road and lead our little Yuki Ko with you. A-ah!" There was a last feeble gasp for breath—and the little mother had passed on.

Yuki Ko was very small. And when she saw her father weep, she wept. She saw him clean the matting floors with Japanese neatness, so she helped him clean with all the pretty imitative qualities of a child of five. And then came the day when Pak was taken into their home,—poor old Pak, that foolish fellow from Korea whose vessel had been wrecked in a storm on the rocks beneath the village. Nobody wanted the castaway who was forever jabbering in such an outlandish language. But Bateren was lonely, he needed someone to help him work his rocky farm, someone to share his lonely meals and make the silences less full of echoes of the dear departed Okkasan.

Yuki Ko had small use for Pak: if Bateren thought he was to be considered a substitute for that lovely smiling mother, then Pak was a very poor substitute indeed. A cringing, uneasy sort of fellow, speaking part Korean and part Japanese, always afraid of evil spirits, never quite sure of his own safety in this strange foreign land, in this wild rough farm.

They lived on a picturesque hillside with knotted pine-trees here and there among the rocky fields of stubble, while far below rippled the sapphire sea—a most unprepossessing farm, very unwilling to yield anyone a decent living. But to Yuki Ko it was, of course, the whole wide world; to Pak it was a temporary haven; while to Bateren the farm was like some sullen dragon which he attacked each year trying to draw its golden teeth, gathering only rocks!

Every evening Bateren would sit in the waning sunset glow and read the little book left him by his wife. Yuki Ko could see astonishment flit over his wrinkled yellow face, then perplexity, sometimes despair, and sometimes joy—sheer joy! She knew it was a curious book to cause such changing expressions, but these expressions were as nothing compared to the startling things that Bateren began to do.

She could see that Pak did not understand them either. Poor Pak, he hardly knew what to make of life when Bateren began trying things out on him. Plainly it made him exceedingly uncomfortable; yet actually, he had never been so utterly comfortable in his whole checkered career. There was, for instance, the matter of the wadded coat.

"Pak," said Bateren, one chilly evening, "you are shivering. You are not nearly warm enough in those thin cotton garments. Here, take this wadded coat of mine—you will find great comfort in it."

"But, worshipful sir," gasped Pak in high confusion, "it is of too luxurious a nature for poor unworthy me, a mere Korean shipwrecked man. And moreover, what will warm your honorable chilliness if I wear this?"

Bateren looked at his little black book: "I am a man with a new God, and he tells me to give away a coat if I have two. So say no more about this matter.

So Kuki Ko saw Pak wear the long, softly-wadded garment, while Bateren had none. Yet it was plain that Pak, while warm, was full of secret terror, like one who might wake up from pleasant dreams and feel a stick upon his shoulder in reprimand for such presumption.

Then there was the matter of worship. Yuki Ko had never liked climbing the hill to the gaudy shrine where there was a brass gong to be struck and a red-and-gold idol to be worshipped—an idol with staring painted eyes and a most unpleasant scowl. The only part she liked was when the wind blew through the pine trees and tinkled the bells hanging on the eaves of the pagoda. "That will make his honorable self happy," she would whisper; yet the painted scowl on the idol's face never oozed into a smile of delight; so Yuki Ko wondered a thing or two, even then.

But Bateren's book had a new kind of worship which he taught to Yuki Ko and Pak: together they would kneel upon the matting floor to repeat after Bateren certain words from his book. Poor Bateren, he tried so hard to memorize those words—yet, after all, it was Yuki Ko who learned them first by heart. But she felt it was a curious prayer, with no idol anywhere in sight, no rice to lay at his feet, and above all, no gong to strike to be sure he was awake and listening.

Then came the matter of the Sabbath field. One day Bateren took Pak around the farm exactly as if he had not seen it before: "Pak," said Bateren, when the tour was over, "which of these miserably poor fields is the best?"

Pak scratched his head: "Worshipful master," he said finally, "they are all of an unhappy sameness, except that there are a few less rocks in that field over there and a little more fruit on those trees."

Bateren nodded: "My very thought. Now Pak, listen carefully: that field is now more to be mine the vegetables that grow in it are not to be cooked for your stomach or mine, neither is the fruit to feed any of us. You understand?"

"Oh," grinned Pak, "you can sell it!" "No, not that," said Bateren, "but I have given it to the new God I worship. Every vegetable is his, every bit of grain, all the fruit. And as soon as all is ripe I will go on a pilgrimage and carry everything to him, for my book says he likes to receive it on a day called the Sabbath day; but how should I know what day that is?"

"Master," sighed Pak, "surely this is an uncomfortable religion of yours, to have to give so much away?"

Yuki Ko remembered yet how Bateren laughed: "But I do not have to give, I want to! Tell me—are you happy in my house?"

Pak chuckled as he would not have dared to chuckle a year before: "I am uncomfortably happy," he cried, "I ask myself ten times a day whether I am not the master here, and you the servant! Is there a pot of rice—whose stomach is the better filled? Mine! Is there hard work to do—who lifts the heaviest end? Not I, but you. Is there a cozier corner on the matting, who sits there? Not you, but stupid me! Oh master, I am eaten up

We drop a seed into the ground,
A tiny, shapeless thing, shrivelled and dry,
And, in the fulness of its time, is seen
A form of peerless beauty, robed and crowned
Beyond the pride of any earthly queen,
Instinct with loveliness, and

The perfect emblem of its Maker's with great desire to know what makes you such a different person."

So Bateren explained about this matchless God who wants no sacrifices, no wild expensive prayers, no clanging gongs, no noisy demonstrations. In gentleness of spirit he merely asks that the friendless man be treated well, that the stranger be considered as this God himself. "And I," said Bateren, "have such feeble wits inside my poor old head, I knew I never could fix so many sayings in my heart unless I practiced them one at a time on someone near at hand. 'Twas thus I memorized the little that I know—practicing on you, poor Pak. Yet you are happy; I, too! So now that all has ripened in my Sabbath field I must start off upon my pilgrimage."

They stacked both fruit and vegetables in bamboo baskets slung over Bateren's bent shoulders. Yuki Ko stood by in great excitement: "When you find this God, be sure to tell him how you've practiced on old Pak!" And Pak himself wept happily: "Tell him I will come myself some day and worship him."

So Bateren went off into the great wide world to find his God. But on the way he met another traveler who also had a pack upon his back, and as they walked Bateren told his tale, and when he finished the other man cried: "My friend, the pack upon my back is full of Bibles such as the one you have been practicing so faithfully, and I tell you of a surety that the God you seek is not an image in some fine gilt shrine, but a spirit living in the hearts of men—I perceive he dwells already in three hearts within your home. Let us turn back and seek your home."

So that is how it happened that Christian work was started in that rural province of Japan, financed at first by vegetables and fruit raised in the Sabbath field.

But even as the colporteur was telling of his God to the three who worshipped blindly, there were other men in other places questioning—wondering—waiting—hungering—longing in despair for some great Someone Somewhere to surround their weakness with his strength, to fill their hungry hearts and warm the coldness of their idol-worship with fires of love and joy. Spurred on by the words of the Book so casually bought from the peddler of Bibles, they too may soon begin practicing—practicing—fulfilling God's great decree: "My word shall not return unto me void, but shall accomplish the thing whereto I sent it."

"The seed is the Word of God."

When Christmas Came Twice In One Year

By "PEGGY"

ONE SUMMER, several years ago, we were all on a farm that father had rented for the month of August, and on the lawn beside the old white farmhouse was the dearest little pine-tree that you ever saw the perky kind that seems to have "shined up" every needle, ready for inspection.

One afternoon mother was sewing in the shadow of this little tree, and Bill and I were sprawled on the grass watching the busy ants doing something terribly important in ant history, no doubt, although we could not explain it to ourselves. Suddenly I rolled over on my back and looked at the little tree, and cried: "Wouldn't it make a perfectly darling Christmas tree, mother?"

Whereupon Bill forgot the ants and growled: "I don't see why they only have Christmas once a year, anyhow!"

Mother laid down her sewing, and the most delicious secret look crept into her eyes, the kind we always know means "something splendid is in store." So we watched her, spell-bound; then she said: "Suppose Christmas does happen to come twice this year, would you like it?"

"Rather!" we cried in a cheerful duet.

"Well, as a matter of fact, it can come twice, if you really want it"; and she drew from her workbag a letter from a college friend of hers who is now a missionary in India, the jolliest kind of a lady (as we well remember, since she stayed with us before she sailed) who had had a very dismal twenty-fifth of December in her new station because she had been expecting some Christmas presents for her nice, new pupils; but not a single gift had ever reached her, and she hoped this would never happen again, as the simplest little present brought such pleasure to the dear brown children in her school. And no sooner had those simple gifts been carried back to small mud huts than grannies and grandpas, mothers and fathers, uncles and aunts would begin saying: "This new Christian religion isn't so bad, after all!"

So mother decided that she was going to pack a box of simple things for this far-away missionary—thimbles and pins, dolls and toys, pencils and pads, postcards and pictures, all sorts of things that the little children of India could carry home so joyfully. But the minute I spoke of a Christmas tree, mother had a sudden vision of that little tree decorated with tinsel and popcorn and candles, of everybody in the neighborhood coming with their own small gifts; of a lovely little Christmas pageant given by the young people of the village church; of Christmas carols sung by starlight on an August evening—all this mother "saw" in the twinkling of an eye! Do you wonder Bill and I love the delicious secret look that often comes in her dear brown eyes?

No sooner had she "seen" this in her mind's eye than she began to "do" things. She and I made a hundred little red tartan stockings, and Bill and father wrote a hundred green cards cut out in the shape of Christmas trees (mere triangles of green, they were, jogged here and there to represent boughs) announcing: "You are cordially invited to a Summer Christmas Tree celebration on the lawn of Homestead Farm, 7 P.M., August 21. Pageant by village young people; carols by starlight. Ticket of admission will be a coin in this red stocking and a small gift to be sent to a missionary in the Orient."

The village pastor thought it was the finest kind of an idea for a summer social, and so did everybody else. All the neighbors came, and brought presents enough to fill two boxes,—one for a missionary here at home, and one for a missionary in the Orient. Our little pine tree was loaded down with small red stockings full of coins, and the pageant was the kind of thing that made you glad you'd brought a present and some money, when you saw the good those presents did to the children of the world! The nice part of this story is that anybody can have Christmas twice in one year, by having a summer Christmas tree of their own. They don't have to live on farms either; for our Editor told me that a city girl, fifteen years old, wanted to have a summer Christmas tree, but not a pine tree could she find on anybody's lawn—but she said to herself: "There's one in the park, though! We'll have a picnic, a Christmas picnic in July!" So the young people's society in her church agreed it was the best plan they ever

Topic July 3.

THY WILL BE DONE—I. WITH MY STRENGTH

Matt. 6:7-15 (Consecration Meeting)

Beginning with this topic, we are to have a series on "Thy Will Be Done": I, With My Strength; II, With My Pleasure; III, With My Mind; IV, With My Time; V, With My Money; VI, With My Plans. Matthew 6:7-15 will be used as a basis for the discussion of each topic. With the right sort of preparation such discussions will be of inestimable value to growing young Christians.

1. A common question. There are a few people of uncertain age who rather resent the question, "How old are you?" Along with this question, we might well ask, "How strong are you?" Certainly there is but little place in a modern world for a weakling, mentally, morally, or spiritually. He will soon be trampled down and out.

2. Our earthly dwelling. Sometimes not a very handsome affair. Quite willingly would some of us change faces with the other fellow. But, this body of ours is home. We haven't very much use for the person who keeps the home looking like a rag-dealer's establishment. We should have less use for the fellow who defiles his body with vile associations, who commits slow suicide by engagements in sensual amusements, coming home all hours of the night, who burns up the finer tissues of his body with the cigarette smoke. There is no one who will today argue that such a fellow can do God's will with his whole strength. He has a divided allegiance—he is daily paying tribute to the little gods of his own making.

3. How are we building? Some one says, "The times have changed." Of course they have, but in some instances they have changed for the worse, especially in the "let go" of some of our finer moral idealism. But, some one says, "The crowd's doing it. Why can't I?" In other words, such a fellow wants to move along the line of least resistance. He doesn't mean to have a mind of his own—he simply wants to tag along behind the other fellow. Nothing quite so drab in our city life as to find a whole block of houses built just alike. It is so with human lives. The great Architect is awaiting the privilege of building out of your life something different. Cut the crowd! Blaze your own way! Follow God!

4. Your strength is needed. What for? Just to follow the beaten paths of other days? No! Your strength is needed for leadership, leadership in your home, in your church, in your community, in your school, in your state, in your nation, in the big, big world. What is your answer? This certainly is the day for rich red-blooded young people who have a vision of themselves, of God, and of world service. To have such opportunities and privileges and not lay hold of them, is to lose one's soul. With the Psalmist we should be able to say:

"The Lord is my light and my salvation; whom shall I fear?"

The Lord is the strength of my life, of whom shall I be afraid?"

Baptist Young People's Convention

Following the sessions of the Northern Baptist Convention in Des Moines, the 30th anniversary convention of the Baptist Young People's Union of America will be held in Cincinnati, June 30 to July 3. After the usual welcome addresses and response, Pres. W. Fred Reynolds will read a paper on "Thirty Years of Progress," covering the activities of the union for that period of time. "Evangelism" is the keyword of the convention and the first address will be delivered by Dr. N. B. Henderson on the theme, "The Helplessness of God." After the convention business Dr. F. F. Gibson will have charge of the quiet half-hour speaking on the theme, "Passion for the Salvation of Souls."

Conferences

Thursday and Friday afternoons of the convention will be given over to conferences on missions conducted by Dr. W. A. Hill; juniors by Mrs. Mabel Gill Fox; city and associational organization by Mr. T. G. Newbill; church vacation schools by Rev. C. A. Carman; intermediates by Mr. H. L. Batts; stewardship and tithing, and the devotional life by Dr. F. A. Agar; religious education as a vocation by Miss Meme Brockway.

The Second Day

The second day will be given over to a consideration of the elements of success in evangelism. Dr. F. E. Taylor will speak on "The Supreme Business of Every Christian," followed by the usual convention business. Dr. F. F. Gibson will again lead the quiet half-hour on the theme, "The Man Who Hid His Talent."

The Third Day

"The Power of Prayer" will be the day's theme. The address of the morning will be, "The Power of Prayer in Evangelism," by Dr. F. E. Taylor. Dr. Gibson will conduct the closing quiet half-hour on the subject, "How to Pray."

Evening Sessions

These sessions will open with a discussion of "The New Day for World Service." First, the need; second, the opportunity; and third, the part of the young people; led by Dr. Sumner R. Vinton. His presentation in pictures will be one of the great features of the convention.

On the first evening of the convention the Rev. G. A. Clarke will speak on, "The Heart of Our Task." He will be followed on the second evening by Dr. F. E. Taylor on, "Elements of Success in Personal Work." On the third evening Dr. Allyn K. Foster will speak on "The Faith of a Red Blooded Man."

Music of the Convention

The music of the convention will be under the direction of the Cincinnati convention committee. One of the outstanding features will be the singing of Mr. A. E. Greenlaw, the noted negro soloist.

The Last Day

Sunday, July 3, will be the last day of the convention. The day's thought will be centered around "Worship" and will open with a prayer service at 7 o'clock. The delegates will attend morning worship in the churches of Cincinnati and vicinity.

The great missionary service on Sunday afternoon will be in charge of Rev. F. K. Singiser. This will be followed by the coronation address in the evening by Dr. A. Ray Petty on "The Mind of Jesus."

Cleveland B. Y. P. U.

I do think that the Cleveland Association has accomplished a great work in the year just ended. We held our annual meeting and election of officers last Friday night. It was a good rally with about 300 at the banquet and as many more came in for the rally.

Our special speaker was Dr. W. H. Vincent of the Ashland Avenue Church, Toledo. He certainly gave us enough to think about for some time. His subject was "Making the Best of It." This was the closing meeting of our association for the year.

In the first place we have at last been able to unite the Baptist young people of our city, and we are hoping that before many months go by we will all be in the B. Y. P. U. This has been accomplished only by the personal work of our civic committee and the other officers. We have made it a point in Cleveland that the officers will do as much visiting as possible to the local societies.

I myself have spent many Sundays visiting the societies. But I believe that the time has come when the city of Cleveland will have to have another president. Last Friday night I was again elected to head the association, making my third year. One of our officers, Harold H. Smith, who headed the civic work this year, has been called to head the junior church of the Euclid Avenue Baptist, Dr. Bustard's church. We consider this a great honor for our young people, considering that Harold is less than twenty-five. Everything is going fine for the convention.

Iowa Letter

Over the Top

There was general rejoicing on May 5 at Baptist headquarters in Des Moines when the returns were all in. It was found that Iowa had paid in $10,000 more than was due on what she had pledged for the New World Movement. Dr. S. E. Wilcox had no small part in this happy result. He had taken pains to write to churches all over Iowa where the full amount due to the pledges had not been sent in. He varied the letters to suit the churches that he knows so well. This undoubtedly helped largely in stirring the churches to act promptly. This service rounded out nearly twenty years for Dr. Wilcox in connection with the Iowa Convention. The Board passed a resolution of appreciation and hearty thanks and voted a loving cup to Dr. Wilcox. Every Baptist church in Iowa will say amen to this happy deed, for our brother is well known and loved in churches and homes all over the state.

The work done by Miss Mate Goodell also richly merits mention. She had general charge of sending out receipts, giving information and following up collections. She had full faith that the whole amount due would surely be paid on time. Individual interest, individual effort, individual faith count and count heavily in awakening the people and insuring success.

Meeting of Board of Managers

This meeting was largely attended and there was much important business. We now have three pastors-at-large and two more are needed. The results of the labors of these men in reviving churches and helping to locate pastors are highly gratifying. Dr. G. P. Mitchell gave an interesting report of the labors of these men and of the pastors who are supported in part by the Iowa Convention. He had returned recently from our seminaries in the East where he was looking for young men to become pastors of some of our churches. He also had important conferences with the men at the headquarters of the Home Mission Society with reference to the work in Iowa.

A live interest was shown in the church at Iowa City. The board voted to co-operate with the church in the large program that has been adopted. The help will be given partly in way of a loan and partly in way of gift. Many Baptist students are in Iowa City at the state university, and the time has come when these students must be cared for.

Council Bluffs will receive $600 to help in city mission work. Pastor J. F. Catlin is leading our Baptist forces in that good city into a larger vision of the work before them and into fine achievement.

Dr. G. W. Cassidy entered upon his work as promotion director just after the first of May. He buckled on the harness quickly and immediately got next to the great task. Past experience and achievement have given him strong equipment for such a task. He brings faith and cheer, a warm, winning personality, and fine business ability to the work that the convention has asked him to do. He is in sympathy with the small, weak churches as well as with the large and the strong ones. The young people give him a hearty welcome in associational rallies. Other programs call for his time. There is no question but that a uniting of all the Baptist forces and resources in Iowa under the leadership of Dr. Cassidy will enable the state to do her full part in the paying of the $100,000,000 by May 1, 1924.

The Northern Baptist Convention and Iowa B. Y. P. U.

Our Baptist young people are much alive to the fact that the convention comes to Des Moines in June. They are planning a B. Y. P. U. booth in the Coliseum. Here they want the young people of all the states to register and receive badges. Of course this registration does not entitle the young people to vote in the affairs of the convention, but it will serve as an introduction, get the young people together and pave the way for fellowship and other plans in recreation and service that the Des Moines City B. Y. P. U. desires to extend to its guests. Manifestly a deepening of the interest of all of our Baptist young people in the life of the denomination, in its plans and prospects, is desirable.

Iowa Baptist Assembly

This body is due to meet at Iowa Falls, July 20-31. A program is in preparation by the committee that will challenge the attention of our people over Iowa. We are promised the help of Dr. Wm. J. Sly, District Secretary Milton M. McGorrell and Miss Ella B. Weaver, all from Philadelphia, Dr. R. M. West and Dr. Sumner R. Vinton from New York, returned missionary Rev. A. C. Bowers and Mrs. Adah Boyce from Chicago. Des Moines University will favor the assembly with addresses from Pres. J. W. Million, Chancellor L. D. Osborn, and Dr. Howland Hanson. Dr. G. W. Cassidy and Dr. G. P. Mitchell of the Iowa Convention will also help. Rev. C. A. Carman of Shenandoah will give special instruction to leaders and teachers for vacation Bible schools and mid-week church schools. Rev. C. C. Browne of Dunkerton will direct recreational life and teach the Bible to the boys. Others will add to the program. The assembly grounds are having attention from the committee appointed to plan and prepare another court for lawn tennis. Our young people are looking to the assembly with deep interest. To many of them it gives the crowning time of the year in recreation and fellowship and in inspiring hours of instruction. Much of the purpose and zeal of our Iowa Baptist Life Service League has been awakened and fostered at the assembly.

This and That

Pastor Otis L. Spurgeon has a brotherhood, seventy strong, at Swea City. Every part of the church life is responding, rich in promise. Iowa would like twenty rural pastors who would care for all of the interests of the church as well as Pastor A. Van Benschoten is caring for the church at Horton. His people are much encouraged. Hard work counts. "The Challenge of the Children," is the name of a pageant that Rev. C. A. Boyd, director of religious education in Wisconsin, has prepared to be presented at the Northern Baptist Convention. The pageant is true to life and it is written with insight and skill. It will repay the close attention of parents and Sunday school people generally. Under the local direction of Dr. S. E. Wilcox, convention plans will call for many evangelistic meetings over the city.

Colorado Letter

By W. F. RIPLEY

The fishing season opened May 25. The tourist season is on. Between the Isaac Waltons and the tourists Colorado's famous trout are experiencing rather unusual attention.

Evangelism

Convention Evangelist Steadman recently closed a good meeting at Florence. There were twenty-two additions to the church. By unanimous resolution the church asked for a return engagement. A pastor was called and is already on the field.

Convention Evangelist Starring has just closed a meeting at La Junta. In spite of various community activities there was a good interest and several additions to the church.

Chapel-car Evangelist Blinzinger, Evangelist Steadman and Evangelist Starring will attend the pre-convention conference on evangelism at Des Moines.

Pastoral Changes

On Sunday, May 22, the Broadway Church of Denver extended an unanimous call to Rev. F. E. Eden of the First Church, Pueblo, to become pastor. He has accepted the call and will begin his ministry with the Broadway Church on June 19. His pastorate with the Pueblo Church has been one of the best in the history of that organization. His departure is as much a matter of regret to the church at Pueblo as it is a matter of delight to the Broadway Church. Pastor Eden is one of the strongest preachers in Colorado. The outlook at Broadway is most promising.

Rev. Geo. L. Boroughs, who has been pastor at various points in Colorado since 1898 and who has recently completed some work in the Kansas City Theological Seminary, began his work as pastor of the church at Grand Junction the first of June. No Baptist minister is better or more favorably known in Colorado than Bro. Boroughs. The Baptist fraternity heartily welcome him to Colorado.

Rev. P. H. Evans has just gone from Monte Vista to Florence. He has done a good work on the field which he leaves. On the new field he will have charge of the rural church at Wetmore, which is one of the three oldest Baptist churches in Colorado.

Getting Results

W. A. Pipkin, the association missionary in Baca County, has recently held a splendid meeting at Kim in the eastern part of Las Animas county. A church with fifty-seven charter members was organized. We understand there are numerous "Hammers," "Lances" and "Hatchets" in the membership. The "Hammers" will not knock and the "Hatchets" and "Lances" will cut only in the right manner.

The First Church, Colorado Springs, is experiencing such good attendance at the regular mid-week meeting that one must come early to get a back seat. The missionary committee is particularly active in putting on novel and worthwhile missionary meetings once a month.

The church at Brighton has been organized some six months. The building is moving on rapidly toward completion. The membership has reached eighty-six. There are between eighty and ninety in the Sunday school regularly and the attendance at the mid-week meeting has not fallen below fifty in three months. Some record for a church with eighty-six members. It has recently over-subscribed its allotment in connection with the New World Movement.

The First Church, Denver, is enjoying an era of prosperity. In the eight years and eight months that Dr. A. H. C. Morse has been the pastor 1765 members have been received. From Sept. 1, 1920, to May 31, 1921, 305 new members were received, of which number one-third were by baptism. For almost a year hardly a Sunday has passed without baptisms, and the ordinance has been administered frequently at both the morning and evening service.

Eastern Colorado

The churches of this association held their fifth Sunday meeting at Flagler on May 27-29. The local church did a most heroic thing in raising $1065.67 to liquidate an indebtedness of some $900 incurred in the completion of its new basement. On the same day it heroically went over the top in completing its allotment in connection with the New World Movement. Pastor J. Sheridan Bunch of Ordway is now aiding Pastor A. G. Kochenberger in special meetings.

Director Hansen reports splendid interest and a most promising outlook for the summer assembly to be held at Boulder, July 2-10. In addition to the best among Colorado Baptists we will have the inspiring services of a number of outstanding speakers from outside the state.

The Jubilee rally for the Rocky Mountain District will be held in Denver, June 14-16.

The world's conference on fundamentals will be held in Denver, June 12-19.

With these two meetings immediately preceding the Northern Baptist Convention and our summer assembly immediately following Colorado Baptists are promised a variety of enlightenment and inspiration that should minister adequately to each one of the fifty-seven or more varieties of Baptists. Anyway our attention is focused on Des Moines and we expect to be represented there with our best of quality and our maximum of quantity.

An Announcement

The Foreign Mission Society announces an important change in foreign secretarial responsibility for the administration of the Belgian Congo Mission. At a recent meeting of the board of managers this responsibility was transferred from Secy. J. H. Franklin to Secy. P. H. J. Lerrigo. In the judgment of the board, several reasons made this transfer seem advisable. There is at present a heavy responsibility involved in administering the work of the society in the Far East, particularly in view of the numerous perplexing problems now demanding attention. Furthermore, an unusual amount of work has been required in connection with the reconstruction plans and the relief work in Europe. This has placed numerous burdens on Secy. Franklin and some measure of relief seemed imperative, especially if all the mission fields were to receive adequate attention from the board. Although Secy. Franklin was most reluctant to sever official relations with the Belgian Congo Mission, its geographical relationship to the other fields made it clear that the most practical readjustment would be its transfer to one of the other secretaries. Accordingly, the responsibility for the Belgian Congo Mission has been transferred to Secy. Lerrigo. In addition to other considerations there is a decided advantage in having the secretary in charge of the recruiting of candidates and of supervising the newly established medical service department of the society in more direct and personal contact with the actual work on the fields. Inasmuch as the Belgian Congo Mission has never been visited by a secretarial representative of the board, Dr. Lerrigo has been authorized to visit the mission as soon as possible.—William B. Lippard, Recording Secretary.

Northern Baptist Theological Seminary

By MRS. CHAS. H. PARKES

The commencement exercises of the Northern Baptist Theological Seminary began Sunday morning, May 29, at the Second Church, Chicago, with the baccalaureate sermon by Jacob Heinrichs of the faculty, on the "Authenticity of the New Testament." Sunday evening, the missionary sermon was delivered at the Austin Church by Dr. Charles L. White, executive secretary of the Home Mission Society. It was characterized by the dignity, grace and forcefulness for which Dr. White is noted. Both exercises were largely attended despite the heat, and admirable music was furnished by the chorus choirs of the churches.

Monday evening, May 30, the Chicago Baptist Ministers' Conference met at the seminary building. Three aspects of the Ministry—Evangelist, Teacher and Missionary—were discussed respectively by Rev. John W. Hoyt, pastor of the Belden Avenue Church, Chicago, Prof. Geo. R. Wood, of the faculty, and Dr. Charles L. White.

Dr. Hoyt emphasized evangelism as the first and most important thing in the Christian ministry; without it there can be nothing great or mighty in the work of the church. If the minister is to be an evangelist he must have first, enthusiasm—one of the great motive powers in life; second, he must take aim—preaching is usually too general; third, there must be a keen appreciation for the word of God; and, fourth, there must be prayer, which, in the speaker's opinion, is the greatest thing in the way of preparation. There is a vast difference between being "evangelical" and "evangelistic." The first is like the reservoir filled with sparkling water, to which one must go for a drink. Evangelistic is like the reservoir on the mountain, with that sparkling, life-giving water, with a pipe running down the mountain-side into every home. It was the speaker's earnest wish that every minister might attack the evangelistic side of his work, with the purpose of winning souls for God.

Speaking of the minister as a teacher, Prof. Wood said Jesus Christ was and is the world's greatest minister because He was and is the greatest teacher the world has ever known. In order to be a good teacher, the minister must know God as revealed in His Word. The power lies in the truth and not in the teacher. The true church is an asset in the community, and will be so recognized. In the last analysis, character determines what men say and what they will do. It is character that makes effective what men say and do. What Jesus was in his relationship with men had much to do with the effectiveness of His teachings.

Dr. White said the Christian minister should be not only a missionary to his own people, and be acquainted with all their needs, meeting them by faithful service, but he should reach out into neglected zones all about him. He must teach in ways which require his own initiative, which cannot be taught by another or learned in any school. He must train his church to do this. He fails if he tries to do it alone. The church members must become missionary in the same sense that the early Christians of the first centuries were missionary—everyone speaking quietly to the man by his side. The whole world is the parish of every church. The minister must reach out into all the social life of the community because he is a missionary of Jesus Christ. In all governmental relations which he may enter, he must do so as a missionary. He must ever and again, as Judson did in Burma, come out with some great pronouncement of faith. The Baptists have never had a creed, but ever and anon we must gather ourselves together and state the things for which we stand. We keep the great essentials welded together by remembering that we are a missionary organization, set for the evangelization of the world.

The alumni of the seminary held their annual meeting and luncheon at Steven's, Tuesday noon. Rev. Albert Johnson, of Albany Park Church, was elected president of the alumni, succeeding Rev. Augustus Fleischmann, pastor at Sterling, Ill.

For the first time the graduation exercises of the seminary were held in its own building, its commodious chapel being filled with hundreds of friends. The class, like the Apostolic band, were twelve in number, with no sign of a traitor. Four were young women, of whom three will be deaconesses among the German Baptists. Two higher degrees in course were given and the honorary degree of doctor of divinity was conferred upon the Rev. Edward Babcock, graduate of Colgate and successful pastor of the First Church of Lowell, Mass. The commencement address was a stirring one by Dr. Judson B. Thomas, the well-known pastor and president of the Chicago Baptist Ministers' Conference, on "Denominationalism—an Asset or a Liability."

Nearly all of the graduates enter promising fields immediately. The seminary, though only eight years of age, has struck its stride, demonstrated its usefulness, and gives promise of a great future under the leadership of Dr. Taft, aided by the faculty and the splendid board of trustees.

St. Louis Notes and Comments

By W. E. DARROW

Rev. Ernest A. Main preached his last sermon as pastor of the Water Tower Church on May 29, to a large congregation. A reception was given him and his family on the following Wednesday evening. His post-office address for the present will be, Los Angeles, Cal., General Delivery.

Miss Amy Goodman, a graduate of this year from the Louisville (Ky.) Training School, is the new woman's secretary for the St. Louis District, Missouri Baptist General Association, with headquarters at 206 Metropolitan Building, this city. Her territory will cover about thirty counties in the eastern section of Missouri. Miss Goodman is a Missouri girl, and has a considerable acquaintance in the state.

Rev. L. R. Call, assistant pastor of the Second Church, this city, was joined in marriage to Miss Stevie Kennington of Chicago on the evening of June 1 in the Hyde Park Church, Chicago, Rev. L. A. Crandall, officiating.

A number of our Baptist pastors had an outing at Forest Park on Monday, June 6, which was enjoyed by them. The families of some of them were present, and added to the pleasure of the occasion.

The writer completes on June 9 three years of service as pastor of the Grand Avenue Church. There have been 151 additions to the church membership during that period, of which eighty-five have joined the past year. The church has also gained in material way and the outlook for a yet greater work in the future is very encouraging.

Arizona State Convention

The Arizona Convention met in annual session with the First Church, Bisbee, C. T. Garnett, Pastor, May 4-8. The sessions of the convention were harmonious throughout. The discussions were on a high plane of Christian consideration and all exhibited an earnest desire to know how best to do the Lord's work. It was thought by many that the period of intercession in the midst of the forenoon and afternoon sessions had much to do with the spirit of the whole convention. Throughout the entire convention emphasis was placed on the Word of God and the necessity of the presence of the Holy Spirit in the life and work of ministers and people as necessary preparation for Christian service.

The presence of such visitors as Mrs. Mary L. Bishop and Dr. Alonzo M. Petty of the General Board of Promotion; Dr. W. A. Stanton of India; Dr. A. Mangano and Pres. Duke, representing our schools; Dr. Bruce Kinney and Rev. E. R. Brown of the Home Mission Society; and Dr. Geo. L. White and Dr. J. D. Springston of the Publication Society, insured for us talent of unusual merit.

The convention opened with a pastors' conference, pastor Francis W. Taylor presiding. R. Marion Garrett, Pastor R. S. Beal and Dr. Petty occupied the forenoon. The afternoon session was spent in the discussion of "The Preacher and the Holy Spirit" in which Pastor Summers, Pastor Morris and Pastor Dunlap presented formal topics. Hal P. Fudge of Globe preached the annual sermon in the evening, followed by an address by Dr. Petty on the subject, "What Jesus Thought of Himself." This address by Dr. Petty was thought to have been one of the finest addresses ever given in a state convention in Arizona. The officers elected for the new year were Cecil T. Garnett, president; E. R. Beuler, vice president; R. Marion Garrett secretary.

The Woman's State Missionary Society met in the afternoon of Wednesday and after the business session, reports of various committees, an address was given by Miss Ethel L. Ryan and Mrs. Mary L. Bishop.

The sessions of the convention proper were presided over by a layman, Col. L. W. Coggins of the Calvary Church, Phoenix. Colonel Coggins was campaign director for the New World Movement fund and succeeded in leading Arizona as the first state to subscribe its full quota. Colonel Coggins presided with ease, fairness and dignity and as a reward of his excellent service was re-elected for the next year.

The annual sermon was preached by Dr. Geo. M. Lehigh, pastor of the First Church, Phoenix, who spoke on "Moses wist not that his face shone." The sermon was deeply appreciated by the convention and meant much for all the future sessions of the convention in its spiritual preparation for those sessions.

REV. H. O. MEYER

Pastor, Calvary Church, Des Moines

Dr. Bruce Kinney and Pres. V. L. Duke of Redlands University, California, spoke during the denominational period. Both emphasized the fundamental things for which we stand and gave us a new vision of the possibilities before us as Baptists and placed fully upon us the obligations of our great task.

A paper by Prof. J. C. South of the Bisbee schools on "The Relation of Church to Law Enactment and Law Enforcement" was so well written and contained so much of vital truth needed by our Christian people today, that it was ordered printed by the convention.

The report of the Board of Managers showed that more money had been raised and expended than in any other one year and the convention had extended its influence in a larger way in many directions than ever before. The New World Movement has proven to be the greatest blessing to Arizona of any movement in the denomination. The total receipts for the year for mission purposes was $26,314.95 as over against $9,665.76 of last year. This made possible a larger amount of church edifice work, a better support of missionary pastors and the ability to lay foundations for future development.

At each evening session there was a stereopticon lecture with an address accompanying moving pictures showing the work among the Mono Indians of California. Lee I. Thayer of the Hopi-Navajo Indian Missions spoke of the work among the Indians and the Rev. E. R. Brown of the work being done among the Mexicans. The people of Arizona are keenly alive to the problem presented by these two groups and as a result of these addresses and pictures a new impetus was given for more and better work in the future.

Resolutions voiced opposition to a bill in Congress to make an appropriation of $24,000 for the repair and restoration of the Tumacacori Roman Catholic Mission; to uncensored and Sunday movies; to card playing or like games for the winning of prizes; to governmental diplomatic representation to any ecclesiastical court, and to the appropriation of the funds or properties of state for any sectarian purposes whatsoever.

The Sunday services were full of inspiration. After Sunday school Dr. Mangano brought the message for the morning, emphasizing the place of the United States in the world's evangelization. In the afternoon the B. Y. P. U. held its sessions. An interesting program was concluded by the young people, followed by an address from Sunday-school Field Worker Gamble and the convention closed with an evangelistic sermon by Pastor R. S. Beal of Tucson.

The convention was well attended and will be remembered as one of the best in some years. The serious industrial and financial situation in the state could not be forgotten. The four industries of the state are at their lowest ebb; the mines and smelters closed; no sale for cotton, on account of the long continued drought; cattle are dying by the thousands, and no sale for wool. The people could not but feel depressed; but in the midst of it all there was a profound faith in God and a re-consecration of life and substance in order that his work may be accomplished and his will done.

IDAHO

A COUNCIL from the churches of the First Association of Idaho ordained Rev. J. R. L. Haslam to the gospel ministry May 18, 1921. Rev. Joel F. Wood was moderator and Rev. A. L. Black clerk.

State Convention

The thirteenth annual meeting of the Idaho Convention was held with the First Baptist Church of Boise, Dr. Floyd I. Beckwith, pastor, May 24-27.

Tuesday morning and afternoon was taken up with the Ministers' Conference. Dr. E. B. Meredith presiding. Dr. Beckwith discussed, "Some Elements of Success in the Pastorate." Rev. A. C. Lathrop spoke on "Reaching Our Goal in the New World Movement." Supt. A. B. Minaker spoke on, "A United Building Program." Rev. E. O. Butler discussed "Standardizing the Ministry." All of these provoked a lively discussion. It was voted to recommend a united building program and the standardization of the ministry, that we can and will complete Idaho's allotment on the New World Movement. A permanent Pastor's Union was formed with Rev. A. F. White of Caldwell, president and Rev. W. T. S. Spriggs, Nampa, secretary-treasurer.

Dr. E. M. Poteat had charge of the devotional hour of each session. A fresh view of the many sides of Christ's prayer life greatly enriched the feast of good things on the whole program. The annual sermon was preached by Rev. A. F. White. His theme was "The Mission of the Church"—to hold up Jesus as the truth, the way, the life.

The reports showed the past year to have been one of real progress in the local churches' offerings and the New World Movement funds. The amount of money contributed by the churches to the New World Movement was more than three times that contributed in any previous year. There were 558 baptisms reported, with 1193 total additions to the churches. Six building propositions were reported in progress and four new churches organized. By-laws were added providing for the following new departments: rural church, social service and religious education.

The speakers from the outside were: Dr. E. M. Poteat, Dr. P. C. Wright, Rev.

J. T. Latta, Rev. John Firth, Mrs. L. J. P. Bishop, Miss Lucile Withers, Dr. S. Z. Batten. Two hundred and twenty-five sat down at the banquet on Wednesday evening. Miss Meme Brockway gave the address. The following officers were elected: President, Judge F. S. Dietrich; first vice-president, W. H. Witty; second vice-president, Rev. W. F. Roberts; third vice-president, Dr. Floyd I. Beckwith; treasurer, Dr. S. R. Rightenour. The next annual convention will be held with the Gooding Church and Rev. A. C. Lathrop will preach the sermon.

UTAH

THE UTAH BAPTIST CONVENTION closed a most successful meeting of three days and evenings in Ogden, June 3. We had with us a number of strong men and women, such as E. M. Poteat, Samuel Zane Batten, P. C. Wright, Bruce Kinney, J. T. Latta with Prof. Mangano and Mrs. J. L. P. Bishop, who certainly gives tone to our Baptist cause in this mountain region.

Attendance was good. Reports from the churches, with one or two exceptions were optimistic and the work of the missionaries in the state showed progress and was much appreciated. A plan of work was outlined which, if carried out by the Home Mission Society, will call for a number of additional missionaries in the state.

OREGON

"EAST SIDE CHURCH, PORTLAND, made the anniversary of Dr. W. B. Hinson's birthday a very happy occasion on the evening of Friday, May 13. Three hundred church members and friends gathered at a banquet served in his honor. Twelve tables were beautifully decorated representing the twelve months of the year. Toasts were responded to by representatives from the different tables, and Dr. Hinson was presented with appropriate birthday gifts. During the evening it was unanimously voted by the church to make Dr. Hinson a pastor of the East Side Baptist Church for the remainder of his life.

OREGON BAPTISTS have bought land for a permanent assembly site at Columbia City, where the next meeting of the state convention will also be held August 8-10.

MARSHFIELD has raised a subscription of $10,145 for a new house of worship.

It has also bought and paid for lots in the center of the city for a building site.

MEDFORD—Pastor F. R. Leach has closed the first year of his pastorate with a gain of 100 members.

NORTHERN CALIFORNIA

ON WEDNESDAY EVENING, May 25, in the First Church of Oakland, occurred the ordination to the gospel ministry of C. M. Gardner, colporteur of A. B. H. M. S. and A. B. P. S. and of E. A. Fridell who has been serving as assistant to Dr. John Snape of First Baptist Church, Oakland, while completing his course at Berkeley Divinity School.

ON MONDAY, MAY 23, the ministers of the San Francisco Bay Association attended a meeting at Burlingame to do honor to Rev. E. R. Bennett, who is closing his pastorate there and is retiring from public ministry, after continued service for more than fifty years. Mr. Bennett expects to make his home during his declining years with his daughter who is the wife of Gilbert H. Brink, D.D., Secretary of American Baptist Publication Society.

SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA

REV. J. WHITCOMB BROUGHER has a series of Chautauqua engagements running from June 22 to August 24.

SAN DIEGO FIRST CHURCH, Rev. F. O. Belden, pastor, received into its membership during the month of May last, thirty-eight persons; of whom seventeen were by letter, fifteen by baptism, and six on experience. Nearly one-third of these persons are connected with the U. S. naval service.

WESTERN WASHINGTON

AN ORDINATION COUNCIL was called by the church at Lyman to meet Tuesday afternoon, May 31, to advise them concerning the ordination to the gospel ministry of their pastor, Earl Cochran. Rev. J. E. Nofstinger, of Mt. Vernon, was elected moderator; Rev. Ed C. Cofer, of Blaine, clerk. After a thorough examination the council voted heartily and unanimously to recommend the church to proceed with his ordination. After a chicken dinner was served by the ladies of the church the services were held in the evening. Mr. Cochran became pastor of the Lyman and Concrete churches April 1 and is very much encouraged with the condition and outlook.

CENTRALIA: On Friday, May 27, the building of the First Church at Centralia was entirely destroyed by fire. The pastor, Rev. Edker Burton, lost his library which was in the study in the church building. The loss is partially covered by insurance and the church is planning to rebuild at once.

DR. A. M. BAILEY, pastor of the First Church, Seattle, gave the commencement address at McMinville College on Sunday, June 5, and Rev. W. E. Henry of Everett gave the address to the graduates of the preparatory department of McMinville College on June 4.

Paragraph from the Report of the Department of Promotion

The churches of Western Washington are missionary in spirit. All but one of the churches have contributed to our New World Movement fund. There was received during the year $90,318.28 as compared with $28,036.17 for the previous year. On the part of both pastors and people there has been hearty sympathy, delightful harmony and full and generous co-operation. There has been an increase in the number of titheers and systematic givers; also an increase in the number of young people enlisting for life service. A greater number of the churches are sending in monthly remittances, showing greater regularity of giving by the members. The increase in the amount given was over 300 per cent. There has been an increase in the average standard of giving by the churches from an average of $280.36 to $903.18. There has been an increase by individuals from an average of $2.46 to an average of $7.89. This has been the more gratifying—and shall I say surprising—when we consider the financial depression that has prevailed all over Western Washington, due to the closing of mills and logging camps, the low prices of farm products, the large number of men out of employment and the losses sustained by merchants through falling prices. It can indicate nothing less than a deeper interest in and a greater sense of responsibility for our missionary task. When we consider that in the increase of pastors' salaries, the amount expended for current expenses, the securing of new parsonages, taking subscriptions and planning for new church buildings, the payment of debts, the revival spirit and number of baptisms, this has been the banner year in the convention's history, and then we realize that the increased emphasis on our missionary task and increased giving for it has stimulated all departments of church work, and that the spiritual value of the New World Movement is greater than the financial.

INDIANA

Marion is rejoicing in the coming of its new pastor, Rev. D. L. Woodward. He is a graduate of Lake Forest College and of Rochester Theological Seminary, and enters with bright promise upon his work. Rev. U. S. Clutton has completed thirteen years at Tuxedo Park Indianapolis. He began with 117 members, has baptized 370, received 744, dismissed 448 and has a present membership of 413. A colony of 106 members was recently sent out to constitute Emerson Avenue Church. Mr. Clutton organized the first troop of Boy Scouts in the city eleven years ago, which is still active; the first daily vacation Bible school in the city six years ago, which has continued with increasing interest to the present season; and this year the first week day Bible school in the state. He has maintained a junior church with an attendance of about 100. He is at present president of the Indiana Baptist Assembly.

Franklin Graduates Forty-two

Franklin closed the best year in its history with its annual commencement June 8. Dr. Shailer Mathews preached the baccalaureate sermon and Dr. Allyn K. Foster delivered the commencement address. Among the buildings projected for the "greater Franklin" is Columbus Hall Commons to be reared in honor of Dr. C. H. Hall, a surviving member of the famous faculty of a generation ago. Forty-two fine young people received bachelors' degrees. Honorary degrees were conferred as follows: Frank B.

Batchelor of Kalamazoo College, Dr. A. J. Vining of Toronto, financial secretary of Franklin College and U. M. McGuire, associate editor of The Baptist received the degree of Doctor of Divinity; Prof. A. P. Brigham of Colgate University, Doctor of Humane Letters; Pres. W. P. Deering of Oakland City College, Doctor of Laws. Addresses by Dr. C. A. Brooks, The Hon. Fred Owens and others, a poem by Dr. C. H. Hall and a rich musical program under the direction of the Prof. Percival Owens, head of the college conservatory, constituted distinguishing features of the week's events. During the year past additions to the financial resources of the college amount to $212,000. The enrollment in the two lower classes this year is nearly equal to the largest enrollment in the entire college in any previous year. Pres. C. E. Goodell was recently elected as the Indiana member of the National Council of the National Economic League.

OHIO

MIDDLETOWN—Rev. Franklin A. Stiles commenced his pastorate here March 6. The second Sunday he was here the Stiles Bible Class was organized with an enrollment of twelve and a campaign was started to enroll 200 by June 1. When the campaign culminated the enrollment was 345 with 255 present. It became necessary to enlarge the Sunday-school quarters to take care of the 1100 members. The average attendance has jumped from about 300 to over 600. The new addition to the Church will cost about $15,000.

OBERLIN students and Oberlin people in general had a treat last week when Pres. Faunce of Brown came to give the baccalaureate before the Theological Seminary, taking for his stimulating theme "The Church as the Interpreter's House." He spoke also before the college students in the noon service at Finney Chapel before 1200 or more undergraduates.

CARMEL CHURCH, new Strattsville, has voted to send the pastor, Moses W. Evans, to the Northern Baptist Convention, defraying all expenses.

WILLIAM ALLEN PRICE was ordained at First, Ashtabula, May 31.

NEBRASKA

Rev. O. P. Miles, formerly a successful pastor in Indiana, now located at Denson place, Omaha, is pleasantly located, but cannot quite forget his old haunts in the Ohio Valley.

Rev. Fred Young, who recently went to the First Church at Fremont from Westport, Ind., has been most cordially received and is delighted with the prospect.

Evangelists Littrell and Moody have just closed a campaign with pastor W. A. Nickerson at Reynolds, with twenty-two confessions of faith.

Glenville has received sixteen new members by baptism since the coming of Pastor J. M. Cornelius last December. It will send him to Des Moines.

Commencement at Grand Island College

The commencement exercises at Grand Island College were in every respect a most enjoyable occasion. There were five graduates from the college and three from the academy.

The exercises opened with the baccalaureate sermon on May 29, delivered by Rev. J. L. Barton of Omaha.

The May fete on Monday was a simple but unique program, G. I. C. campus presented a scene of play and activity such as it has never seen before. The wand drill, a Y. W. C. A. acrostic, was written by Miss Hall and was very effective.

The Patterson contest and the Wyrick contest were held on Tuesday evening. The contestants did excellent work. The annual address before the Christian associations was given Wednesday evening by Rev. R. R. Braden, student secretary of the college.

Thursday morning ushered in the final exercises of commencement week. Dr. W. T. Elmore of Lincoln gave the address of the morning on "The Path of Progress," his general theme was, "Is the World Growing Better or Worse." It was optimistic, unique, and inspiring.

These exercises were followed by the dinner served in Hibbs Hall. Toasts, awards, and songs sent all home with the feeling that after all, there was something worth while in the small Christian college that was missed in the larger "top-heavy" universities.

A group of seven boys left for Estes Park on Saturday, their expenses having been provided in part by some public-spirited men in Grand Island. The Y. W. girls also provide the expenses of their president, Elsie Dyke of Chambers, to Lake Geneva.

WISCONSIN

APPLETON First Bible school has reached the standard of efficiency; also the B. Y. P. U. and The Women's Union. The three Guilds and Crusaders are doing a very fine work. In the past eight months there have been forty-one additions, twenty-six of these by baptism. Plans are now being laid to erect a new building next year. It will be strictly an institutional church.

A community church vacation school will be conducted for five weeks this summer with seven cooperating churches. Mrs. A. L. McMillan, wife of the pastor, has been chosen as general director.

EAU CLAIRE, First, at its annual meeting, gave Pastor Everson R. MacKinney a present of $100 and voted to send him to Des Moines.

ILLINOIS

Erie has completed its new building, and dedicated it June 12. The cost is $25,000. Pastor C. A. Lillie is ready now for an enlarged program of work.

Chicago Baptist Association

The eighty-sixth anniversary of the Chicago Association was held at the Woodlawn Church on the afternoons and evenings of Thursday and Friday, June 2 and 3. Mr. J. J. Fraser, the retiring moderator, presided over the first three sessions, and Rev. Chas. T. Holman, of Normal Park, the retiring second vice-moderator, presided over the closing session.

The reports presented by the various officers, commissions, committees and other bodies were in general of an encouraging nature. The incomplete returns indicated a substantial increase in the number of baptisms and accessions over the preceding year, the net gain in membership being reported at about 1000, against a net loss of 101 in each of the previous two years. The beneficence contributions, mainly due to the New World Movement, showed a phenomenal advance over all previous years. Dr. H. O. Rowlands, in his own happy manner, welcomed seventeen pastors who had entered the association during the year. Two forceful sermons were preached by Dr. Howland Hanson, of Morgan Park, whose theme was "Christian Idealism in the Face of Opposition," and by Rev. Francis C. Stifter, of Wilmette, who spoke on "The Revelation of God." Stirring addresses were delivered by Moderator Fraser, on "Looking Backward and Looking Forward"; Dr. J. W. Hoyt, of Belden Avenue, on "Evangelism, the Supreme Business of the Church"; Dr. L. A. Crandall, of Hyde Park, on "Training for Christian Life."

Rev. A. H. Gage, director of religious education, on "Religious Education in the Local Church," and Dr. Carl D. Case, of Oak Park, on the question, "Is the Coming Generation Going to Furnish the Christian Workers that Will be Called For?" Devotional services were led by District Superintendent Jos. C. Dent, Rev. W. H. Jones, of North Shore, and Dr. M. P. Boynton, of the entertaining church. The evening addresses were interspersed with anthems and other vocal selections, mainly by the home choir.

The woman's hour of the Friday afternoon session was presided over by Mrs. R. P. Fales, president of the Woman's Mission Union of Chicago. The leading features of the hour were: "Glimpses of My Foreign-Speaking Friends," by Mrs. Washington Laycock and Mrs. Raymond Knapp; "Why I Am Training for Christian Service," by three young women from the Missionary Training School, and "Voices from the Orient," by Mrs. Paul Hackett, of Burma, and Rev. L. F. Wood, of the Congo. The largely-attended Mother and Daughter Banquet, held on the Friday evening, to which fathers and sons were graciously admitted, was also presided over by Mrs. R. P. Fales. Miss Louise Rowlands spoke on "Our Mothers," and Mrs. Herbert Goodman on "Our Daughters." The newly-elected officers of the association are: Moderator, Dr. R. N. Van Doren; first vice-moderator, Mrs. Smith T. Ford; second vice-moderator, Dr. Carl D. Case; clerk, Dr. Benjamin Otto; assistant clerk, Rev. A. C. Hodgson; treasurer, Mr. Lewis C. Walker; historical secretary, Mr. Henry R. Clissold.

The total enrollment was 427. Much credit is due to the pastor, Dr. M. P. Boynton, and the church for the excellent way in which the association was entertained. An invitation was accepted for the next annual meeting to be held with the First Church of Elgin.—Arthur C. Hodgson.

MINNESOTA

THE DANE-NORWEGIAN CONFERENCE of Minnesota met with the Norwegian-Danish Church of Minneapolis, June 1-5. The attendance was very good and the reports encouraging. Some progress is being made in the work among these people. Many of these churches are strong, earnest and aggressive. The dedication of the Norwegian Church of Minneapolis was held on June 5. Dr. Frank Peterson led the endeavor to secure pledges in a masterly way, and nearly $4,500 was secured. This is to be paid in by next November and will practically care for all of the obligation. This is a splendid achievement in which we all rejoice.

THE SOUTHEASTERN ASSOCIATION held its thirtieth annual meeting at Rochester. The attendance was not large. The number of baptisms reported from churches was fifty-two, which was a good increase over the preceding year. Work in the active churches of this association is making good progress and excellent results are being achieved. There is need of laying hold of much of the country district round about, because of the fact that the gradual decrease of rural population has made work more difficult.

REV. MORRIS PETERSON conducted evangelistic campaign in Soudan. This is one of the oldest churches on the Iron Range. Something over ninety converts was the result of the meetings. This means the resuscitation of an old church and will mean much for the cause.

THE OWATONNA CHURCH has secured a pastor in the person of Rev. A. C. Wickenden who graduates from the Divinity School of the University of Chicago and will begin work August 1.

REV. E. W. VOLKENANT has become pastor of the Brownsdale and Lansing churches.

CALVARY CHURCH, Minneapolis has adopted a budget for the coming year of $19,500.

MICHIGAN

REV. CLARENCE S. BURNS at Ypsilanti is undertaking a broad program of service to reach the students at the Michigan State Normal School and Cleary Business College in that city.

FIRST FLINT, reports 184 members received during the year, making the membership at this time 1000. The church school, numbers 1230. The assembly and social rooms of the church have accommodated an average of seventy-eight meetings a month. The finance secretary received a total of $38,958.00 of which $21,418 was spent for current expenses; $5,846.00 for beneficence, and $8,855.50 on the improvement fund. The Third Ave. Branch which was started three years ago has grown to the point where a permanent edifice is required.

WASHTENAW ASSOCIATION held its last session, as an Association, this spring—the delegates voting to accept the recommendations of the Committee appointed by the Board of Managers and unite with the Wayne and Lenawee Associations. The increase in baptisms was greater than for many years, while the giving for benevolences has doubled and in some cases trebled, with an expenditure for local work largely increased.

ST. JOSEPH VALLEY ASSOCIATION met at Union. More baptisms were reported than for several years, and the benevolences were largest on record. The annual sermon was preached by Rev. H. A. Buell of Three Rivers, and General Director Grant M. Hudson and others of the convention staff assisted on the fine program.

THE OUTSTANDING FEATURE of the year's work in the Hillsdale Association is the effect that the New World Movement and the various calls for aid have had in revealing to the churches something of their ability and responsibility in the use of their wealth. Missionary giving considerably more than doubled; in many cases going three and four times larger; while one church increased its missionary offering twenty-three times! (The writer states that other interests had to suffer in order to make this possible.) The annual meeting was held at Reading and was well attended, interesting and profitable. The association would like some one with "pluck, proficiency and pertinacity" to work among some of the weaker churches.

THE EIGHTIETH ANNUAL MEETING of the Jackson Association was held in Memorial church, Jackson with 187 delegates and visitors. Pastor W. B. Hartzog of Mason preached the annual sermon. Dr. J. F. Ingram of Burma made his work live before the audience and as his custom is, he put a new meaning into the work of foreign missions. The entire program was inspiring and helpful. More than 300 attended the B. Y. P. U. session on Friday evening.

KANSAS

UNDER THE LEADERSHIP of J. R. Edwards, Sedan, Kansas Church is moving along. A number from the Sunday School joined the church this Spring. During the month of June a united series of meetings is being held in a tabernacle. The "Roses" are in charge. Sunday school and B. Y. P. U. are growing.

VERNON CLOUNGER was ordained at Cherryvale, April 19.

REV. W. T. HALL, pastor at Ingalls and Harmony in the West Central Association, was ordained at Ingalls, May 8.

EVANGELIST SCHEUSSLER and party are in a very successful meeting at Hanston. At the last report there were seventeen conversions, and the interest was growing.

CENTRAL ASSOCIATION held its annual meeting at Gypsum May 24-25. D. E. Vaughn of McPherson was re-elected moderator and Rev. W. A. Holladay of Peabody was elected clerk. The attendance was above the average, and progressive plans for the year were projected. Eight of the seventeen German Baptist churches in the state are within the bounds of Central Association, and a resolution was passed looking towards fraternal cultivation of these churches for a more intimate association and co-operation.

BAPTIST PASTORS and ministers of Topeka held their annual reunion at Gage Park west of the city, May 31. The number present, including women and children was forty. Rev. O. M. Showalter was elected president of the ministers' organization, and Rev. A. Rohde of the German Baptist Church, was re-elected secretary.

THE SUNDAY-SCHOOL AND YOUNG PEOPLE'S CONFERENCE of the German Baptists of the state was held at Lorraine, May 30-June 1. The attendance was large. Rev. J. M. Gurley spoke on "The Challenge of the Present Time to Our Baptist Young People."

NEW HAMPSHIRE

THE CHURCH at ALTON mourns the loss of its pastor in the sudden death of Rev. O. H. Wallace from apoplexy. Mr. Wallace died in his study in the forenoon of Memorial Day. He had served the Alton Church but one month as pastor. Mr. Wallace was a native of Bethlehem, N. H. He had held pastorates in New Hampshire, Pennsylvania, Massachusetts and came to Alton from the church in Bristol, R. I. He is survived by his wife, a son Earle, and a daughter Helen who is field worker in New England for the women's societies under the direction of the General Board of Promotion.

REV. M. R. FOSHAY has closed his pastorate with the First Church, Manchester, preaching his farewell sermon May 29. Mr. Foshay at once took up the pastorate of the First Church in New Haven, Conn. The church in Manchester has prospered under the ministry of Mr. Foshay. Baptisms have been frequent and all departments of church work have moved forward with an energy inspired by the pastor. Mr. Foshay has been a denominational leader in the state. On the concluding Sunday of his ministry three were baptized and the hand of fellowship given to eleven.

REV. CHRISTINA MACKENZIE closed her pastorate at Loudon on May 29. Two were received by baptism. The work has prospered during the three years' pastorate. Miss MacKenzie becomes pastor of the church in Deerfield.

AT A RECENT MEETING of the executive committee of the board of the N. H. Convention Rev. J. K. Miller, colporteur-missionary, was made pastor-at-large and Rev. F. W. Rollins, pastor at Bradford, was appointed colporteur-missionary.

MAINE

SINCE THE BEGINNING of the pastorate of Rev. Howard H. Brown who came from New Jersey four months ago the work of the church in the capital city has gone forward in an encouraging manner. With the hearty support and assistance of the church visiting committee great emphasis has been laid on the work of visitation. First the aged, sick and shut-in members of the entire church and congregation were carefully called upon and then the regular work of visitation was taken up, resulting in the finding of many new and unvisited families who are renewing their interest in the church and Bible school. There have been twenty-nine additions to the membership of whom twelve united on profession of faith and seventeen were received by letter. Others are waiting to come into the church in the near future. Preceding Easter the pastor conducted a week of special meetings with decision day in the Bible school. The pastor has been called upon for a number of addresses outside of his own pulpit and has also preached the annual sermons before the I. O. O. F. and the memorial sermon for the G. A. R.

RHODE ISLAND

REV. ELMER A. LOVE, pastor of the Union Church, Providence, has resigned and will conclude his pastorate July 31. He expects to take up work in Missouri where he formerly studied and labored.

REV. ANTONIO J. DE SOUZA, Portuguese missionary, rejoiced greatly when two young Portuguese girls were baptized by Dr. Frank Rector in Pawtucket on May 29.

THE ROGER WILLIAMS CHURCH, Providence, has voted to send its pastor, Rev. S. D. Ringrose, to Des Moines, paying the entire expenses.

BOTH REV. J. CHESTER HYDE and his wife of Sheldonville, Mass., are "workers together." Mrs. Hyde is in demand for missionary addresses. Both expect to attend the anniversaries at Des Moines.

CONNECTICUT

REV. A. D. CARPENTER, pastor of the First Church, Willimantic, baptized eight on April 29; also fifteen at Easter. These converts came largely as the result of personal work on the part of the membership. The pastor has a "far look" in evangelism, and being a thorough believer in church evangelism has been laying broad and deep the foundation looking toward having his church, a "church in action", that individuals may be "added to the church daily." Mr. Carpenter attended the Newton Commencement, receiving his Th.M. degree. His thesis was "Science and Immortality."

THE HARTFORD MINISTERS' MEETING was held with the Asylum Avenue Church, June 6, the speaker being Rev. R. G. Ferguson of Rockville. The following resolution was passed: "In view of the fact that a small group of brethren are apparently attempting to force their creed upon the Northern Baptist Convention and its constituency, we, the Hartford Baptist Ministers' Conference, do hereby re-affirm our steadfast adherence to our fundamental Baptist principles of liberty and democracy and protest against any departure therefrom. We furthermore deprecate the efforts of the Committee on Baptist Fundamentals, so called, as destructive and divisive, and petition our delegates to the convention to use their votes and influence to discourage their activities."

A CONFERENCE OF CHRISTIAN WORKERS of Italian churches and missions for New England, Baptist and Congregational, was held in the Hartford Theological Seminary May 31-June 2. Baptist leaders present were Drs. C. A. Brooks, New York; G. W. Brink, A. Di Domenica; W. J. Sly, Philadelphia; W. G. Towart, Vermont; W. E. Waterbury; O. J. White, Boston; A. B. Coats and W. T. Thayer, Hartford; Drs. A. Mangano, New York; Frank A. Anderson, New Jersey; Herbert J. White, Hartford. There were five sessions in which the following general subjects were presented: "Problems of Leadership", "Religious Education", "Young People and Adults", "The Church School", "Pressing Forward". Attendance and interest good.

A SUCCESSFUL DAILY VACATION BIBLE SCHOOL leadership institute, under the auspices of the Connecticut Baptist Convention and The Connecticut Sunday School Association, was held in the First Church, Hartford, June 3-5. The faculty was made up of Rev. W. G. Towart, Bennington, Vt; Mrs. Elizabeth M. Finn, Philadelphia; Mrs. Lucy Stock Chapin, Hartford.

EASTERN PENNSYLVANIA

PASTOR W. F. ROWLEY, of the Davisville Church, baptized ten on May 1, of whom six were young men. This is the largest number baptized in one day in the past fifty years of the church's history.

THE SEVENTEENTH ANNUAL SESSION of the Harrisburg Association was held May 17 and 18 in the Central Church Steelton, pastor, Rev. J. P. Currin. The meetings were well attended. Mr. Harold D. Germer, a student of Crozer Seminary, was examined and approved for ordination.

Crozer Seminary Commencement

Rev. Wm. H. Main preached the baccalaureate sermon, and Pres. Emory W. Hunt of Bucknell the sermon before the Y. M. C. A. The conference of Baptist ministers heard Prof. Allen Hoben of Carleton College, Northfield, Minn., on "The Church and the Social Process."

The alumni officers for the coming year are Rev. Thomas J. Cross, president; Rev. Jos. A. Bennett, 1st v. pres.; Rev. W. S. Booth, 2nd v. pres.; Rev. Chas. A. Walker, sec.; Rev. Rittenhouse Neisser, treas.; Rev. G. N. Arbuckle, orator for 1922, and Rev. T. P. Holloway, alternate.

A testimonial banquet was tendered by the alumni to Pres. Evans who has served the seminary thirty-one years, the last twelve as president. Rev. Oliver C. Horsman delivered the annual oration on Jesus as "God's Son in Fact, or only in Name?" Greetings came to Pres. Evans by decades from Rev. N. M. Simmons, Rev. Frank Macdonald, Rev. Horace T. Houf and Rev. Howard Parry.

Though the seminary is now fifty-three years old, two of its original board of trustees were present, namely, Mr. Geo. K. Crozer and Dr. Wm. W. Keen. On Monday afternoon, June 6, Mr. Crozer presided at a meeting of the board of trustees. The next morning it was found that during the night he had passed silently to his abiding rest.

There were eleven in the graduating class: Guy Nelson Hartman, Edward Walter Miller, Howard Parry, Charles Martin Bond, Ray Hamilton Abrams, Joseph Evans Balderson, James William Clayton, Antoni Czaplik, Thomas Scull Davis, Owen Osborn Dietz and Archibald McAllister.

Constantine Bila and Charles Edward Goodall received the B. D. degree, and Rev. Powell Holcroft Norton that of M. Th.

A lunch under the trees on the campus closed a delightful commencement season.

WESTERN PENNSYLVANIA

REV. W. V. BACON, pastor of the Duquesne church, baptized seven Sunday evening, May 22.

DR. F. T. GALPIN has presented his resignation to the First Church, Pittsburgh, to take effect September 1.

DONORA CHURCH gave a delightful reception and recognition service to the new pastor, Rev. Stewart M. Smith, Friday evening, May 20. Mr. Charles Kane presided. Greetings were brought by W. C. Chappell, Rev. A. M. Gregg, Rev. Henry Madtes, Rev. G. W. Scarberry and Deacon Harold C. Dunn. Local pastors of other denominations extended a cordial welcome to Mr. Smith.

MR. WASHINGTON, Charles Embrey, pastor—Present membership, 325; raised for benevolence, $3329.07; for current expenses, $5499.60; total, $8828.67. Trustees report the purchasing of the property next to the church for the purpose of building a parsonage.

REV. W. W. WEST, pastor of the Sheraden Church, after an absence of a month from his pulpit on account of illness, has gained sufficiently to resume his pulpit work.

WILKINSBURG CHURCH, Rev. Floyd L. Carr, pastor, has voted to purchase the property adjoining the parsonage to provide space for the proposed new church edifice. The cost was $12,000.

REV. WALTER RUCH, of Sparsville, Pa., has been called to the pastorate of the Latrobe and Derry churches.

REV. MILTON C. J. WESTPHAL began his pastorate with the Union church June 1st.

REV. J. R. CAMPBELL, of the Clarion Association, has accepted a call to the Vandergrift church.

NEW YORK

Rochester Anniversary

The anniversary exercises of the Rochester Theological Seminary were held this year, May 22-25, in the First Church of Rochester. The baccalaureate sermon was preached by Pres. Clarence A. Barbour upon the theme "The Light That

Railroad Rates to Des Moines

For the Des Moines Convention, the passenger associations have agreed to a round trip rate of fare and one-half of the regular one way fare, with a minimum of one dollar for the round trip.

This rate is applicable from all stations north of the line of the Ohio and Potomac Rivers, except in New England where the railroads will maintain their present fares, but those living in that territory will participate in the reduced rate after they leave those lines, as indicated below.

From California, Nevada, Oregon, and Washington, an excursion rate of one and one-third fare has been arranged from June 1 to Aug. 15 inclusive.

Excepting those who live in the states of California, Nevada, Oregon, and Washington, members of Baptist churches and dependent members of their families who are attending the convention, desiring to avail themselves of the reduced rates, must secure identification certificates, which may be obtained from the secretaries of state organizations, from those arranging for parties to the convention, or from the undersigned. Those living in New England should procure these certificates, so that they can purchase through tickets from their home town to Des Moines, for while the New England fare will not be reduced, they may thus be able to participate in the reduction which is made west of the New England lines.

The reduced fare tickets will be on sale at the ticket office in your home town, to holders of certificates, on June 15-21 inclusive, with return limit of midnight, July 4, to those living in Colorado, Idaho, Montana, New Mexico, Utah, and Wyoming. Those who live in Illinois, Iowa, Northern Michigan, Kansas, Minnesota, Missouri, Nebraska, North and South Dakota, Wisconsin, Arkansas, Oklahoma, and States East of Chicago, the dates of sale will be June 16-22 and limit of final return, midnight of July 3.

Tickets must be validated at Des Moines for return, June 20-July 1 inclusive, by ticket agent at the regular ticket office of the line by which the passenger arrived; they will be good only on that line, and must be used on the day of validation.

If the above is not clear, or any further details desired, consult the ticket agent in your home town, who will be instructed therein.

State secretaries, transportation leaders, and others requiring certificates for use by those attending the convention from their localities, should apply at once for them to the undersigned.—W. G. Brimson, Manager of Transportation, Northern Baptist Convention.

A Patriotic Convert

Germany, Austria, Italy, Spain, Portugal, Switzerland, Denmark, and Greece, which together equal one-third our area. Another boy drew a blue line around the great lakes and in these wrote Great Britain and Ireland to indicate their extent. A third boy erased the map and swung a big half-circle, like a rising moon, writing Philippines at the left and Maine at the right to show we extend half way around the globe. Next two boys held the ends of a string seventeen feet long to represent the navigable rivers of Europe, and with them two other boys with a string forty feet long representing the rivers of the United States. A boy drew four bales of cotton to represent the amount raised in the United States and one for the rest of the world. Another drew four stalks of corn to represent the crop of our country, and one for the crop of the world outside. Still another drew a tall, smoking chimney for the manufactures of the United States, and two for the rest of the world.

With these great resources come great perils. One man spoke on the perils of immigration; another on the peril of wealth, and a third illustrated the evils of congested population by reading "Nigger Martha's Wake," by Riis. The choir sang Kipling's Recessional.

Then came the presentation of some of the influences working for the betterment of the country. The school, by a superintendent of schools; the church, by the pastor; and the individual, by a third speaker.

No one knows whether the outside temperature remained the same, for all thought of it was blotted out by the music and the recitations and the addresses which hammered home my responsibility to myself and my God; for I am the church; I am my country.

Jones had planned and explained to follow the report. All the Jubilee months, weeks and days, holidays and national days, a lot of us, more than a hundred at least, were in it. With yellow song books in our left hands and yellow streamers floating we marched in and out and up and down, crossing at the platform where the reviewing party stood, till every aisle was filled all singing our Jubilee song, "We've a story to tell to the nations," etc. Everybody said it was picturesque and impressive and that's what we wanted.

Then there were

5. The Pins

First, Mrs. Doane made the presentation to Mrs. Smith, the retiring president—a gold four-leaved clover with its diamond heart, to which the recipient made graceful response. Then Mrs. Silver made the presentation to Mrs. Jones, the retiring home administration head—a platinum bar with its sapphire heart. But when the great audience arose and repeated together after Mrs. Silver, "May our Heavenly Father continue to bless our Harriet Newell Jones," the recipient was rendered totally unfit through emotion to make any response. The love and appreciation beautifully expressed for both were so heartfelt and true that the memory of it will linger as long as life shall last.

At another session another pin which I didn't get a chance to see was presented by Mrs. Smith to the Jubilee president with hearty thanks for her loving service and two beautiful corsage bouquets of orchids and lavender sweet peas by Mrs. Jones to Mrs. Silver and Mrs. Doane—all of course from loving friends. Don't you think this "P" deserves a place in these rambling pen-points? The flowers were of course to be pinned on each recipient. And now for written by Mrs. Montgomery and directed by Mrs. Baker. As you have read a description of it and will see others as it is to be given, I suppose, in each of the ten districts, I need only tell you that it went splendidly, and beyond the highest hopes of all of us who were in it. The spirit of the society was perfect; and the heathen women stumbling across the darkened platform, the music, the scenic effect, the five Decades in misty grey, the messengers from Eastern lands, the representatives of the Jubilee and holidays, the districts, each with an armful of her district flower, the states, the secretaries, the Guilds and Crusaders, each group with one spokesman, and all in costume made a wonderful picture; and when the volunteers said, "We will go down. Will you hold the ropes?" and all the participants raised their hands high and fairly shouted, "We will! We will! We will!" I tell you, Ann, it was positively thrilling. The pageant was preceded by the illustrated lecture on "Woman's Work in Fifty Years." It was given without a hitch by Miss Nellie Prescott and was most instructive and greatly enjoyed.

7. The President

and Mrs. Harding received us one afternoon at the White House. Such a wonderful event to the many hundreds who availed themselves of the privilege. Such a fine, handsome, good face is his. Such a charming personality is hers, such graciousness of manner, such heartiness of greeting! Pleasant and natural were both as we waited in a close group in the center under the camera's eye to make on the beautiful lawn of the White House, with hundreds on either side and back of us. When the picture was made, and the President with the first lady of the land turned to leave the group, Mrs. Peabody who was standing next to me at the moment said, "I wish we could sing our Jubilee song." I was so excited I said, "Let's," and we struck it up together when everybody immediately joined, while the President stopped and some one passed him the song book and said he sang, too. Wasn't that just splendid? One lady was so excited that as she shook hands she ejaculated, "My dear President!" and "My dear President's wife!" and like the dear man he is he said, "Thank you! Thank you!" Of course this wonderful picture will be handed down to our great, great grandchildren. Even Ezra seems a little awed as he studies this yard of picture and says, "Well, you women do beat all for making things go!"

I forgot to say that at the first session Mrs. Smith read regrets from the President's secretary and also from Secy. Hughes, and at the last session Mrs. Jones read telegraphic messages from Pres. Tustin of the Northern Baptist Convention, from Dr. Aitchison and our beloved president, Helen Barrett Montgomery. I shall close this long letter with the last beautiful "P."

9. The Products

or perhaps I should say some samples of products—the wonderful products of our society's fifty, fruitful years. These dear foreign representatives were introduced by Mrs. Peabody as no one else in the world could do it. I wish you could have heard them—Madame Kolator from Czecho Slovakia, Dr. Ma Saw Sa from Burma, Dr. Nandamah from India, Kang en Vong which means "Gladness" (though her adopted name is Grace Sweet), and Khanto Bala Rai, daughter of a high caste Brahmin. The audience was stirred to the heart as it listened to the beautiful thoughts and hopes expressed in such good English with touches of humor, pathos and wit thrown in—honestly, Ann, I don't see how they do it. Well, we loved them and clapped them to our hearts' content.

And then we had the beautiful closing address from Mrs. Peabody, I might have labelled this "P," Peabody or Purpose, because she sent straight home to us the purpose and the meaning of it all in her own captivating way. The address, earnest, tender and compelling, made a fitting close to our eighth annual meeting and our long-anticipated Jubilee.

And now, Ann, we've seen the products, we've accomplished the purpose in that we have reached and more our financial aim and honored our pioneers, here and abroad. Shall we not help to generate new enthusiasm and new determination to "carry on" the work they so well began, till we, too, pass and our children shoulder the responsibility and begin to prepare for the next Jubilee.

Jubilees will pass but responsibility will continue. Let's never forget that, Ann dear. Ezra says he couldn't if he would "with Belinda around"; but I know he wouldn't if he could.

As ever, yours, BELINDA.

Obituary

Rev. George D. Stevens

This Brother fell asleep at his home in Oceanside, California, on the morning of May 24, aged 82 years. The funeral service was held Thursday afternoon, May 26, at the First Baptist Church of this city and was very largely attended. The body was laid to rest in the charmingly located cemetery here.

The services were conducted by Rev. Charles M. Kilgore, pastor of the church, and according to the request of Brother Stevens before his death Rev. Mark B. Shaw, who had welcomed him to the membership of the Fairbrook Baptist Church when he first came to California 27 years ago, spoke the words of a loving tribute, and of sympathy and affection to the sorrowing friends.

Brother Stevens was born in Maine, a graduate of Waterville college, and a teacher, and superintendent of schools, in Wisconsin, before he gave himself to the pastorate. He was pastor of four different churches in Wisconsin, and on the death of his wife, came to California. Here he engaged in merchandising, and served his community as justice of the peace, and postmaster as long as he cared to hold those positions.

The past five years he has been retired living with his wife in a beautiful home in Oceanside. This wife, a sister of his first wife, has been a comfort and true helpmeet.

Brother Stevens was a first cousin to Rev. Mr. Bartlett well known in Iowa, and of F. W. Bartlett, prominent in Baptist work of all California. M. B. S.

OUR MUSIC CORNER

ECONOMY FOR THE CHOIR LEADER

William Ripley Dorr, organist and choirmaster at Emmanuel Episcopal Church, La Grange, Ill., contributed an article to a recent number of "The Diapason," which should be of great practical value to all chorus directors or to any of us who have to face the problem of spreading a certain appropriation designated for music supplies over a very uncertain and too rapidly growing list of desired material. He suggests in detail a very efficient way to circumvent this obstacle. Headed as "Suggestion for Copying Music," he writes:

"Every choir director has run across hymn tunes, amens, kyries, responses and other musical fragments which he would like to use if he had some cheap and easy way to obtain enough copies for his whole choir. There are many copying devices, but all have certain drawbacks. The waxed-paper mimeograph stencil is very fragile, and usually the copies are difficult to read. The first few copies from a hectograph are good, but if more than twenty-five or thirty are printed, the last ones are faint and it strains the eyes to read them.

"But there is a cheap, easy and altogether satisfactory commercial process which is used for reproducing an unlimited number of copies of any kind of musical matter, typewriting or manuscript—the ordinary commercial blueprint process.

"To make a blueprint, a 'tracing' is necessary, made in India ink on commercial tracing paper. Obtain a ruling pen, India ink, a T-square, a triangle and a drawing board from a draftsman friend or a high school student taking mechanical drawing. To make the staves put a piece of regular ruled music paper on the drawing board, with a piece of tracing paper over it, which is a little larger than the finished copies are to be. Then, with ruling pen and drawing ink, go over the lines of the music paper, thus reproducing as many staves on the tracing as you need for the purpose at hand. This saves all the work of measuring out the staves. Next take the tracing paper from the drawing board and put it on a typewriter with a piece of black carbon paper under it, with the carbon side uppermost, so that when you write on the machine the carbon paper will leave its impression on the back side of the tracing. Now put in the title at the top, and the words to be sung in their proper place between the staves. Be sure to space out the words so that they will agree with the bars of music. Of course the words can be put in by hand, but the typewritten words are easier to read and look better. Next write in the music with India ink and a lettering pen, and the tracing is finished.

"If you live in a good-sized town any architect or engineering firm can give you the name and address of a commercial blueprint company. Take the tracing to it and it will make as many copies as you wish, and the charge should not be more than 5 cents each for an ordinary sheet. Some blueprint firms have special rates for architect's specifications, which are made from a special thin tracing paper called 'specification paper,' and are standard size, 8½ by 11 inches. If the company you patronize has this special rate, it will pay you to adapt your work to its requirements and get the lower rate. You can probably get two or three short compositions or two hymns with all their verses on one specification sheet, and you can cut them apart with scissors or a paper cutter afterward. If there is more than one composition on a sheet, draw a line in pencil on the tracing where they are to be cut apart, and a faint line which makes a guide for cutting will appear on every print.

"If there is no blueprint company in your town, any high school senior taking mechanical drawing can get the materials and print the copies for you, and could probably even make the tracing for you if you gave him a good copy. Or you can buy the commercial blueprint paper and a large printing frame from any photographic supply house, or one of the big Chicago mail order houses, and do the printing yourself.

"To print the copies it is necessary first to cut the blueprint paper the desired size, and this cutting should be done in a room in which the light is subdued. Place the tracing on the glass in a printing frame face down, then put a piece of blueprint paper over it with the sensitive side down, put on the back of the frame and expose it glass side up to the direct rays of the sun for about two minutes. Then remove the print from the frame and plunge it into cold water and move it around, whereupon the lines should turn clear white and the background a dark blue. If the lines are not white enough or if the background is too dark, reduce the time exposure; if the background is not dark enough, increase it. Let the prints remain in the water a few minutes, rinse them and hang them up to dry. If a rapid printing paper is used the exposure can be made to a mercury vapor light.

"There are several variations to this process. Some produce prints with sepia or black background. By making a blueprint on very thin paper, and printing the copies through that, it is possible to make blue, brown or black line prints on a white background, but the ordinary process described above is the simplest, cheapest and quickest."

FROM THE SCRAP-BOX

During Lent it is surprising how many cantatas are sung by the church choirs of the country. And more surprising is the fact that, so few of the choir directors advertise these performances. We believe strongly in the efficacy and propriety of advertising all special music in churches. Local newspapers, recognizing the general importance of cantata performances, are invariably ready to lend a helping hand, and more use should be made of their friendly columns. Putting it somewhat oddly, is it not a little unfair to prepare some beautiful cantata for a good rendition and then neglect to tell the public where and when it is to be sung?

Program notes on organ recital programs are highly desirable if accurate and well written. It takes a writer with a fine sense of news value to prepare good program notes—that is to say, somebody who can ferret out and present the most interesting facts about a composition from a mass of information all seemingly of equal importance.

* * *

There was a time not very long past when the public transcriptions for organ of master compositions would have made a surprisingly inconsiderable list. This condition no longer exists; in fact, if transcriptions continue to be published as plentifully as they have been in the last two or three years, they are apt to become too numerous and to usurp the functions of the original compositions for the instrument. It is well to remember that transcriptions never are as important as original compositions. Beautiful, pleasant and gratifying to welcome they may be, but they should not and can not take the place of writings solely inspired by the organ and composed with only its resources in mind. Original composition for any instrument is the food upon which feeds the instrument's development in all respects. This must not be lost sight of in the case of the instrument which affords so much opportunity for exploitation in the transcription field.

An Important Announcement

BY CHARLES L. WHITE, Executive Secretary

THE Baptist denomination is composed of separate local churches, which voluntarily organize through Associations, conventions and missionary societies for mutual helpfulness. The chief work of the churches is to evangelize the world. They do this separately or through agencies which they create and support.

Each local Baptist church has for its first work the propagation of the spiritual truth which it holds and preaches. Each such church must enjoy through the missionary agency it helped to organize or accepts, the fullest opportunity to do its own mission work. It should have, if it so desires, its own missionary whose character it approves and also whose doctrinal statement given to the society is acceptable to itself.

Each member in good and regular standing also in each local church who is able and desires to do so through the same agency of which his church approves, should have the same privilege to pay for the support of his own missionary whose character he approves and also whose doctrinal statement to the society is acceptable to him. He should be encouraged as his church should be, to support as many such missionaries as he has the desire and means so to do. The same right should be accorded to the widow with her two mites.

The American Baptist Home Mission Society was organized by Baptist churches through their delegates in 1832 in New York City to promote the preaching of the gospel. It was given by them no confession of faith. Those who formed the society left no doubt however what their purpose was and what they intended it to do.

Society Has no Creedal Tests

The society has never prepared a confession of faith but each annual report to the churches has been its report of a faithful discharge of its stewardship. The society does not impose creedal tests upon its servants.

It accepts gifts from local Baptist churches and their members for the support of missionaries of Christian character who have been regularly ordained by councils of Baptist churches. The board always assures itself through the recommendations of cooperating state conventions and city mission societies or through a doctrinal statement which it requires of all missionaries seeking appointment that they believe and will preach the basic structural evangelical facts taught by Christ and his apostles, and which constitute the common body of Baptist belief.

The society always accepts contributions from any Baptist church, and if asked, assigns to such a church its own missionary, to be paid by its own offerings.

If it so requests, the church may examine a missionary's doctrinal statement submitted at the time of his appointment, and if he is found to be in substantial accord with the evangelical views of the church, he may for that reason be assigned to it as its missionary and be so supported.

The same right is accorded to any individual member of a Baptist church to examine a missionary's doctrinal statement to see if he can conscientiously support him as his missionary, and to do so. He may also provide an income to support such a missionary by authorizing his church, or a committee of his own selection, who shall take similar precaution in the acceptance of missionaries to be supported, from funds which he places in their hands as his trustee. He may also instruct such a church, or a committee, that if the society's constituency and religious convictions become so changed that a board of managers, appointed at some future date, are not in sympathy with the evangelical facts, the holding of which by missionaries has made them acceptable to his trustees, to give the fund to another organization, which he clearly names in the trust agreement.

Must Act as Agent of Churches

The society has no right to refuse to act as the faithful agent, and to discourage the fullest initiative of Baptist churches, and of their consistent members in extending the Redeemer's kingdom in North America. If it should so act, and could not be controlled by the Baptist churches, its receipts from them would cease, and the churches would organize another Home Mission Society to evangelize North America.

A beloved member of a Baptist church, who is able to contribute large amounts for mission work, has created a trust fund with certain trustees. Instead of selecting trustees who might have been self-perpetuating outside of any recognized denominational agency, he has honored the American Baptist Home Mission Society in requesting its board of managers to be his trustee, and has given to them in trust certain valuable securities which it is expected will yield considerable annual income for certain missionary equipment, and for the support of missionaries who believe:

1. In the inspiration and supreme authority of the holy scriptures;
2. In the deity of our Lord Jesus Christ, his incarnation, his atoning death, his bodily resurrection, and his return;
3. That Baptist churches composed of those who have been baptized into the fellowship upon a confession of their faith in Christ as their Redeemer and Lord are commissioned to make their chief business the evangelization of the world.

The acceptance of this gift by the board is in perfect harmony with what we have already said above.

How will the board discover the missionaries to be supported by the income of this fund?

It will ask no one to sign an imposed creed. The donor does not believe in creeds. He agrees with the statement published by Rev. Robert Burdette as follows: "I love the creed that is written nowhere save in the New Testament, which allows growth, and the changes which must come with increased light and stature without periodical revision." He believes also that missionaries who hold and teach these basic, structural, evangelical facts will not drift into rationalism.

Each prospective missionary will present through the cooperating city mission society or state convention a doctrinal statement which all missionaries asking for appointment furnish. If the board after examining this voluntary doctrinal statement finds it is in harmony with the points, 1, 2 and 3 as stated above, his salary and expenses may be paid from the income of the fund if he is to labor within a certain area.

I doubt if the society has ever had a missionary who has not been in harmony with these simple evangelical facts which are so self-evident as to be axiomatic and therefore not debatable among Baptists.

The salaries and expenses of such missionaries may be paid and the trust fund further provides as follows: "To aid in the erection and repair of meeting houses and the erection and maintenance of buildings to be used for such missionary institutions as may be required to do the missionary tasks of the Los Angeles Baptist City Mission Society, the San Francisco Bay Cities Baptist Union and the Seattle Baptist Union; payments from income received by said The American Baptist Home Mission Society not exceeding the amount of twenty-five thousand dollars ($25,000.00) annually, to be made to Los Angeles Baptist City Mission Society as and when voted by the Board of Managers of the said The American Baptist Home Mission Society.

"If the annual income received by said The American Baptist Home Mission Society shall exceed twenty-five thousand dollars ($25,000.00), such excess, not exceeding fifty thousand dollars ($50,000.00) annually, shall be divided equally between the San Francisco Bay Cities Baptist Union and the Seattle Baptist Union, payments to be made, however, only as and when voted by the board of managers of The American Baptist Home Mission Society.

State Conventions Ultimately Affected

"If the annual income received by said The American Baptist Home Mission Society shall exceed seventy-five thousand dollars ($75,000.00), such excess shall be used by The American Baptist Home Mission Society in the discretion of its board of managers for the payment of salaries and expenses of missionaries, colporter-missionaries and evangelists and to aid in the erection and repair of meeting houses, the erection and maintenance of buildings for missionary institutions and schools and the equipment of same as may be required to do the missionary tasks of and in cooperation with the Baptist State Conventions of Southern California, Northern California, Oregon, Western Washington, East Washington and North Idaho, Idaho, Arizona, Nevada, Utah, Wyoming, Montana, Colorado, Wisconsin, Michigan, South Dakota, North Dakota and Minnesota; preference always being given to the types of missionary work above described or of other types which may providentially develop with the passing of the years, especially among the Negroes and Indians and peoples from Mexico and Asiatic and European countries."

Looking to the Future

But the donor does not know what the future may bring forth and so provides that if at any time it shall be proved that the officers and board of managers of the American Baptist Home Mission Society are not in sympathy with the beliefs stated as above, then and in that event said trust fund shall be transferred to another institution provided the faculty and trustees of said institution are in sympathy with the beliefs stated. If the faculty and trustees of said institution are not in sympathy with the beliefs stated, then said trust funds shall be transferred to certain other organizations.

The donor is a business man who looks far ahead in all of his transactions and has learned to anticipate possible contingencies. He is following this same custom in creating a trust the income of which contemplates widespread missionary work and the providing of necessary missionary equipment. He therefore arranges that if that improbably and unexpected and unbelievable day should ever come, that a denomination calling itself Baptist has so completely discarded evangelical truth that a board of managers appointed by it should not be in sympathy with statements 1, 2 and 3 as above stated, then he believes that it should be proved incompetent and provides that the trust fund shall be paid in that contingency to others. This provision is both wise and just if it seems important to the donor. The board of managers of the society has entered into this trust agreement and the transaction has been completed.

This statement is made with the full approval of the un-named donor because incorrect reports have gone abroad and in the interest of the truth and of the great cause of home missions. The Baptist churches and their members making up our denomination are always entitled to a knowledge of all the acts of their agent. Announcements would have been made several weeks ago had not certain situations arisen which made publicity at that time unwise.

Legality of Transaction Clear

The legality of the transaction and the society's right to enter into this first agreement under the premises stated is approved by Judge Edward S. Clinch of New York City, who has been the society's counsel for thirty-seven years.

The American Baptist Home Mission Society was incorporated seventy-eight years ago "for the purpose of promoting the preaching of the gospel, or the establishing, maintaining, or aiding Baptist churches or missions, for the acquisition of sites in contemplation of the erection of houses of worship and other buildings, and for the establishing or maintaining or assisting in the establishing or maintaining of schools and other institutions of learning in connection with the missionary work in North America." The society from the time of its incorporation has been faithful to the purposes for which it was incorporated, its board of managers are loyal to these purposes and I trust that their successors always will be found to be.

The donor is grieved over the selfish hoarding of wealth of many professed followers of Christ, and hopes for the early day when his gift to the Home Mission Society shall seem small in comparison with the gifts of very many of his Baptist brethren.

To Bless the Great West

This is no case of a man employing his wealth to prevent justice, or to entrench wrong, or to perpetuate a caste system in industry or to keep things as they are. It is the case of a man making and safe-guarding a great gift to support a group of true-hearted missionaries of Christ, who hold to a few dynamic spiritual verities and who will give their lives in glad co-operation with their Lord in saving the people of this polyglot nation. He does this with a fine strategy endeavoring to bless the hundreds of millions of people who will some day inhabit the great West and thus do his part through them in winning North America for Christ, that American may be a strong base of supply, for the evangelization of the world.

The donor is a Baptist and intends that the trust money in question shall be administered by Baptists. So strong is his intent that he makes no provision for a reversion of the trust fund to relatives, but directs that it be always administered by Baptist institutions.

Church News by States

Failed." It was an appeal earnest in spirit and noble in purpose to young men going out as moral and religious leaders in the world to preserve the spiritual sensitivity of their own souls. The conscience is the spiritual eye of the soul. If that eye should be clouded or dimmed the soul gropes its way in darkness. The address before the Students' Association of the Seminary by Pres. Emory W. Hunt of Bucknell University was a plea for the centering of life upon Christ as the only one who can lift men to their highest possibilities and satisfy their deepest longings.

The Genesee Baptist Ministers Conference which holds its May meeting in connection with the anniversary exercises of the seminary had as its guest and speaker Pres. Charles E. Goodell of Franklin College. Pres. Goodell gave an able presentation of the value to the colleges of an independent self-controlled existence. It is the independence of the colleges from coercion by denominational bodies that makes possible permanent policies, long-time projects and wise administration. Trustees, just as teachers, have to grow into their positions. The theological conference under the auspices of the seminary was held in Alvah Strong Hall on Monday afternoon and was addressed by Prof. William Adams Brown of Union Theological Seminary. Professor Brown chose as his theme "The Contribution of Theology to Church Unity." He made clear the continuously vital function of systematic theological thinking in these days. Theology reveals the unifying spiritual values embodied in the doctrinal views of divergent religious groups. It invites all religious bodies to test their truth by its efficiency in history and in contemporary religious experience. It teaches men to distinguish between a faith which is the fountain of life and the arguments by which that faith is defended.

On Monday evening, May 23, the members of the seminary body and the friends of the institution participated in a very enjoyable social occasion in the First Church. After the supper which was served by the ladies of the First Church two splendid addresses were delivered by Rev. Samuel Bawden of India and by Rev. Bernard Clausen of Syracuse, N. Y. Mr. Bawden pointed out the challenge of the non-Christian world to Christian leadership in our time. Mr. Clausen commended to young men entering the ministry certain philosophies of life exemplified in the careers of eminent baseball players. It was a unique and highly successful method of stating profound truth.

The annual meeting of the alumni on Tuesday morning was addressed by Rev. David Lee Jamison upon the theme "The Resurrection of Jesus from a Lawyer's Point of View." The conference on practical Christian work held during the afternoon of Tuesday found Pres. Gray of Bates College continuing the discussion of Pres. Goodell concerning the present conditions in our denominational colleges.

The formal commencement exercises occurred Tuesday evening. The commencement address was delivered by Dr. William C. Bitting of St. Louis. Dr. Bitting treated the task and the career of the minister outside his relationship to his church. He appealed to the members of the graduating class to assume denominational responsibilities, to hear the call for leadership in the community as well as in the local church, to be men sensitive to the moral issues of the time, to be prophets as well as church administrators. It was a noble treatment of an important theme. The words of Pres. Barbour to the graduating class were full of heart interest. True ministers he said were men who loved Christ, loved truth and loved the people.

Fifteen men were graduated from the Seminary this year: David N. Boswell, Robert A. Farely, James C. Hill, Grant J. E. Keetch, Clarence E. McFadden, Alban H. McKnight, James D. Morrison, Richard O. Shannon, William R. Shaw, Lewis D. Slayton, William H. Smith, Milton C. J. Westphal, James O. White, Robert J. White, Jr., David L. Woodward. The future plans of the members of the class so far as they have assumed definite shape are as follows: Mr. Farely returns to work in France his native land; Mr. Hill continues his studies in the seminary for another year and also his pastorate at Darien Center, N. Y.; Mr. Smith has been awarded a graduate scholarship in the seminary for next year; Mr. Boswell goes to the Student Dept. of the American Baptist Home Mission Society; Mr. Keetch to the Baptist church at Eureka, Montana; Mr. McFadden to the Second Baptist Church (colored) of Terre Haute, Indiana; Mr. Morrison to the North Baptist Church of Camden, N. J.; Mr. Shannon to the Baptist Church at Laurel, Montana; Mr. Shaw to the Conley Memorial Baptist Church of Detroit; Mr. Westphal to the Union Baptist Church of Pittsburg, Pa.; Mr. J. O. White to the Baptist Church at Indianola, Iowa; and Mr. Woodward to the First Baptist Church of Marion, Indiana.

It has been a good commencement season.—Justin W. Nixon.

LET EVERY BAPTIST LIFT

THIS is the way to raise the millions for the New World Movement—600 men out of sight but all lifting. At Camp McArthur, Waco, Texas, it was necessary to move a Y. M. C. A. hut. An officer of engineers suggested a method. The floors were taken up, 600 men placed along the joists, 200 around the building outside, the command was given—800 men all together—and the building was lifted off its foundation. "Forward, march!" and it started toward its new location half a mile away. NO! there was no great strain on anybody. Nobody had to lift more than fifty pounds. Cooperation did it.

The Spiritual Reach of a Great Society

THE AMERICAN BAPTIST HOME MISSION SOCIETY labors in nearly every State in the Union, and in Cuba, Porto Rico, Mexico, Nicaragua, El Salvador and Honduras.

Its missionaries work among twenty-two foreign-speaking racial groups and eleven Indian tribes in the United States.

It has an extensive missionary educational system among the Negroes, Indians (reaching twenty-three tribes), Spanish and other foreign-speaking peoples.

In Mexico it has a well-equipped hospital.

Special attention is given to Christian Community Service in urban and rural neighborhoods. Demonstration country churches are being established, equipment provided and staffs secured to spiritualize adequately all community contacts.

Through an adjustment with the Publication Society it pays the salaries of the colporter-missionaries and the missionaries on chapel cars and gospel cruisers.

Acting under a Brotherhood Committee, it establishes brotherhoods and stimulates their active program of service, which includes camp work for boys, in which the Publication Society and the Home Mission Society are jointly interested.

It stimulates Evangelism through wide areas and increases interest in this type of work among churches and pastors.

It aids, through its various departments and by the counsel of an expert architectural department, in the erection of churches, schools, parsonages and Christian community center buildings.

This Department of Architecture is organized for service and operates without profit to itself. It seeks to assist architects, churches and institutions to secure better results from money spent by making available the experience and study of specialists. Although the department charges one per cent of the estimated building costs for its advisory and consulting service in working out the requirements of a given building, the architect furnished with these requirements gladly deducts this one per cent charge from his usual fee. Hence the service of the department adds nothing to the building cost.

An International Seminary in East Orange trains missionaries not only for the racial groups in America but also to become leaders of their own peoples in Europe.

The Society conducts its work in closest co-operation with the Woman's American Baptist Home Mission Society and the American Baptist Publication Society.

The task of The American Baptist Home Mission Society grows as the nation increases. Its income has always kept pace with its opportunities. Opportunities are God-given.

Our nation must not fail spiritually. The Home Mission Society must do its best to prevent the spiritual collapse of the nation.

The Home Mission Society must be ready for the long future and for every contingency in missionary undertakings.

The Home Mission Society has the vision and faith. Its legion of supporters are urged to pray daily for its missionaries and its secretaries and that our Lord may provide new friends and adequate funds.

Let's Have Piety Plus

SOME men seem to think that they are spiritual when as a matter of fact they have only an acute attack of piety. Phrases and shibboleths are poor substitutes for an intelligent interest in and devotion to God's work. It may not be a sin to be pious but we verily believe that it is a sin to be merely pious. We dare not be ignorant of the great Christian movements in the world. Does every family in your church have the channels through which they can be informed? Help them to be pious plus.

Killam's Kollum

We Stand Corrected

J. E. Cook, Watertown, S. D., writes: "My dear brother: For if you do not say 'dear brother' you are no 'Baptis,' especially when you intend to land on the aforesaid, which I certainly aim to do. You are wrong, dead wrong! I've known them for over fifty years! They never put on that final 't'. Its BAPTIS. And my dear brother I am grieved that you in your position should fail to give us the psychology of the situation. Why should Baptists change the 'p' except that 'p' stands for popery, or silence the 't' except that 't' stands for tithes?" Why did we never think of that before?

We Take It Back

In the issue of June 4 we mentioned a rumor about Mr. Bryan and the Baptists. We declared the rumor false. Now we find the gentleman announced as special contributor to the Watchman-Examiner.

As Plain As Day

"Killam, you make me laugh whether I see you or read you. I want to ask one question: Why do you put that Kollum in the front of the paper? Jokes are usually put in the back of a paper." The man who asked this question is none other than Dr. Charles Brooks of the Home Mission Society. It is a fair question and deserves a frank answer. Now, it is this way. Baptists have a lot of problems—some of them theological and some of them biological. They are serious matters, especially the former. THE BAPTIST every week carries much material bearing on these problems. We have found that when we have serious matters to face it is well to meet them with a smile, hence we place this Kollum in the front of the paper.

A Case of Mistaken Identity

In the issue of May 7 we made a few "observations" on when "news" is not "news" but simon-pure publicity. We were extremely mild in our statements. When the article was read in print the author sang one verse of the old hymn, "The Half Has Not Been Told." Nevertheless in an incredibly short time letters began to reach our desk. They must have come by plane or wireless. They contained "disclaimers." We ought to say right here and now that no one of these modest men was in mind when we penned our "observations." It is a case of mistaken identity. One pastor whose news items have been denatured reminds us that his church is one of the twenty leading churches of the Northern Baptist Convention and deserves publicity. He is right. We submit, however, that it takes just as much grace, devotion and religion to be a pastor of one of the twenty smallest churches of the convention. THE BAPTIST proposes to give every church, great and small, as far as it can, a square deal.

Fresh from the Field

Rev. R. D. Licklider, pastor for the last two years and more of the First Church, Hammond, Ind., has resigned in order to accept the pastorate of the Memorial Church, Fresno, Cal.

In connection with the flood situation in Pueblo, Colo., the Baptist State Convention of Colorado promptly placed $1,000 at the disposal of Rev. F. E. Eden, pastor of the First Church, Pueblo, for use in relief work.

Following a meeting on Friday evening at which Dr. J. H. Rushbrooke spoke to the Baptists of Washington, on Saturday morning he and Rev. W. W. Lippard of the Foreign Mission Society were received by Secretary of State Hughes who expressed much pleasure at the favorable outcome of the persecution situation in Roumania. Later by appointment they were received at the White House by the President who told Dr. Rushbrooke that he should make the latter's report the basis of his Sunday reading.

During the pastorate of Dr. A. H. C. Morse at the First Church, Denver, the benevolences have increased until for the year just past they were 600 per cent above those for the first year. For the last fiscal year this church's benevolences have exceeded those of either the Central Presbyterian Church or the Trinity Methodist Church, the two strongest churches of these denominations in Colorado. Both of these two sister churches have a larger membership and are generally regarded as having a more wealthy constituency.

Rev. Alonzo Ray Petty, pastor of the Judson Memorial Church, New York City, was given the degree of doctor of divinity on June 11 by Occidental College, Los Angeles, Cal.

The women of the Central District, W. A. B. F. M. S., and the women of Michigan particularly, were highly honored in that Mrs. R. E. Olds of Lansing, Mich., was the presiding genius at the Golden Jubilee celebration and annual meeting held in Chicago May 18-20. Mrs. Olds' grace and dignity as the presiding officer on this Jubilee occasion, combined with the sweetness of her personality, contributed largely to the spiritual atmosphere which permeated the entire convention, and carried through so successfully the merging of Central District W. A. B. F. M. S. with the W. A. B. H. M. S. into a union district of foreign and home missions. At the close of the convention Mrs. Olds retired from the presidency of the district, but her associates in the work are happy that she will continue her membership on the district executive board.

The Bible Institute Colportage Association of Chicago states that of Mr. D. L. Moody's books there has been a total of 22,560,548 copies published on the Association's order.

Prof. Henry B. Robins of Rochester has returned from his trip to the Far East during which he has visited the mission fields of the Foreign Mission Society in Japan, China and the Philippines. His visit was greatly appreciated by the mission fields of the Foreign Mission Society, and the reports he sent in show painstaking work and unusually clear discernment of the problems found on our mission fields. He will speak at Des Moines on the evening of June 27.

George W. Coleman Will Head Babson Institute

The appointment of George W. Coleman as President and Dean of Babson Institute, announced at its second commencement at Wellesley Hills, Mass., June 15, argues well for the continued success of this new and unusual school for executives.

Prominent for twenty years in the business circles of New England, Mr. Coleman, probably first became a national figure as president of the Associated Advertising Clubs of the World during 1912-13. Since that time the Open Forum Movement founded by him at Ford Hall, Boston, in 1908, and developed and extended under his able direction has become a part of our American social and civic consciousness.

Mr. Coleman is also prominent in religious, political and literary circles. His efforts have been of vital force in the development of Christian education. Political Boston, will remember him as member of the city council for three years; president of the body during 1915.

Few men are as well fitted to carry on the pioneering work that Roger W. Babson is undertaking in this new school where each of the students is equipped with secretary and dictaphone; where problems from the business world replace text books; where classes give way to conferences; where experienced business executives are graduated at the end of two years intensive work ready to "change desks" and take over responsibilities in the business world at large.

New Scholarship Plan

Through the co-operation of the American Baptist Home Mission Society, the Woman's American Baptist Home Mission Society, the Board of Education of the Northern Baptist Convention and the New York City Mission Societies, eight denominational scholarships are now available for Baptists students desiring to fit themselves for specialized leaderships, as Heads of Christian Centers, Organizers of Christian Americanization Programs and Directors of Religious Education, through a special course in connection with Teachers College and Columbia University leading to the M. A. degree.

The five prerequisites are, that those applying: (1) hold the A. B. degree; (2) be imbued with rugged health; (3) have a genuinely missionary motive and spirit; (4) pledge themselves to definite denominational service after the course of study is completed; (5) be recommended through one of the aforesaid societies.

Signed:—Dr. George R. Hovey, American Baptist Home Mission Society; Mrs. Katherine Westfall, Women's American Baptist Home Mission Society; Dr. Frank L. Padelford, Board of Education, Northern Baptist Convention; Dr. Charles H. Sears, New York City Mission Societies.

All communication should be sent to Stanley B. Hazzard, Director of Religious Education, 276 Fifth Avenue, New York City.

Are Industrial Questions the Church's Concern?

The question as to whether industrial problems are any part of the business of the church was answered in an emphatic affirmative by Rev. William Pierson Merrill, pastor of the Brick Presbyterian church, New York, in speaking in Chicago at the recent meeting of the World Alliance for International Friendship. He said:

"A group which is positive in its assertion that the Church has no business with business is making its voice heard in the land. Doubtless many of them, perhaps most, are thoroughly honest in their conviction that religion and business work better if kept in separate compartments. The fact that a man is fervent in his faith or sound in moral principles does not qualify him to lay down the lines on which society must advance through the economic and industrial jungle. It is plainly an impertinence, when a minister or any other religious leader attempts to tell business men how to manage the details of their business. But it is not an impertinence, it is a rightful and a necessary act, when a minister or a council, or any body of religious folk, declare the true principles on which society must be organized in order to be right and Christian, and point out obvious applications of those principles.

"When financial leaders in industrial sections of the United States declare that the Y. W. C. A. and the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America are stepping out of their proper sphere in avowing their hearty adherence to social principles and ideals clearly Christian and adopted and held by practically all the leading religious denominations; when they further attempt to cut off contributions from such organizations on the plea that they are dealing in unwarranted ways with matters outside their proper sphere; when they demand that proposed religious gatherings shall cut from their program discussions of 'The Church and the Industrial Order,' under penalty of financial embarrassment; when they insist that the Church shall confine itself to the statement of abstract principles, and take no note of their application; an issue is joined which the Church cannot ignore. The Church cannot afford to take orders from any outside group or class, or from any one except its Divine Head. To allow any set of men to mark off its field, or limit its scope, or declare its function, is intolerable. The Church must take the consequences of asserting its proper concern in the affairs of the world. But to alter its policies or to restrict in the least its sense of a vital function in social matters, because the power of the purse is applied, in spiritual treason."

The Suffering of Love

"WOULD I suffer for those whom I love?" When love is new it does not raise the question. But as life goes on it brings close to men the lesson that love which does not give itself is not genuine, and that the daily, almost unconscious forgiveness which love demands is not possible until one has learned to take upon his own heart the load of suffering which belongs to the other. In a moral world, in which there is no forgiveness without suffering, one cannot love without paying the price.

Even the Father above has commended his own love toward us by passing over a "via dolorosa." The suffering of Jesus is, whatever else it may also mean, a revelation to us of the suffering which eternally touches the heart of the forgiving God. He himself has borne our sorrows and our sin and our burden. I can love a mother whose brow is furrowed with the care assumed on my behalf. I can love a God whose heart is bowed down to death: indeed, I could love no other kind of a God. When I know love, I shall be ready to enter into the "fellowship of his suffering," and to help to fill up "that which is lacking in the sufferings of Christ." The sin and sorrow which breaks his heart will burden mine also and I shall enter into the spirit of that compassion which heals the hurt of the world.

So curiously wrought, however, is the structure of life that the suffering of love leads to life's deepest joy and peace. Jesus endured the cross "for the joy that was set before him." His exultant spirit was never dimmed by men who misunderstood him, who perverted his teaching, who lifted violent hands against him. The suffering Paul wrote a psalm of joy to the Philippians. As I come into the goodly fellowship, I shall learn better how to endure men's peculiarities, their uncharitableness, their zeal which seems bad because it does not just go along with mine. If the Master could suffer such and yet keep sweet, his disciple should be able to do a similar thing and yet remain happy. Just because I love him so much and all that are his, I shall be quick to forgive, glad that it is given me to suffer for love's sake. The deepest rewards of love will come to me through its suffering.

Shall I not then quiet my soul both in its strivings and in its rebellion? I may win my contention in an argument and lose what is better. I may get my rights and lose touch with my Lord. I may think myself happy and miss the secret of happiness. My task is to love supremely the Lord whose gift to me is life eternal and to give myself with him to the redemption of a sinning, sorrowing, struggling, beautiful world. Each generation will witness its clashing of opinions, but through all this love's quiet, fruitful toil must go on. The suffering Lord will have a suffering servant. But the peace of God which passeth understanding will come hand in hand with the suffering. And that alone shall abide which is permeated with Christ's love. To have fellowship with him all the way is best for me and for my church and for the world.

In the Valley of Decision

REPRESENTATIVES of nearly ten thousand Baptist churches are assembled in the Northern Baptist Convention at Des Moines. They have met under a collective trusteeship to God, to these churches and to the human race. In this assembly some vital decisions are to be made on questions which do not appear in the agenda.

Judgment is sitting on the Baptist Soul of the North, to determine whether we are sufficiently Christly, generous, magnanimous, broad and clear in vision to center our fellowship in things of first importance; whether, united in those things, we can hold together and move together to common ends worthy of our principles, history, numbers, wealth and influence. If we meet that judgment with a clear vindication of our worthiness, then not only our own land and time but distant ones will have cause to thank God for the present crisis of Northern Baptists at Des Moines.

It must now be apparent that upon most of the questions that have been agitating our people, victories of faction over faction are likely to be Pyrrhic victories. Majorities may so vote that issues appear on the records to be settled, but if men are still going to carry a campaign of faction into the churches, if there is still to be a propaganda of mutual accusation and debate, of confused counsel and cross purposes, then no victory leading to such a result is worth winning. Unless a tolerant unity can be achieved at Des Moines through a common passion for Christian values higher than those in dispute, precisely such factional warfare awaits the denomination.

To know just how the human race originated is something; to give right direction to human life in our own time is more. To discover how the Bible came into being and to define its authority in accurate terms may well be attempted; but true loyalty to the Bible consists in building human life amply upon its obvious and unquestioned verities. A sound Christology is a valuable religious asset; but to have the mind of Christ is a priceless spiritual endowment. To find out clearly whether the fifty-third chapter of Isaiah refers personally and consciously to Jesus of Nazareth may be a noble quest; but a nobler thing is to demonstrate in the life of the Christian or of the church a living martyrdom to the service of God and humanity such as filled the prophet's dream. A correct theory of the return and kingdom of Christ is desirable; but a service far more honoring to him and hopeful to mankind is to mobilize all of the forces he has left to represent him here in an effort to carry into utmost effect the spirit and principles of his kingdom in our own time.

It will be worth something to find out just what things in our schools invite criticism and call for correction (for imperfections will always exist in them); but a far higher achievement will be to provide adequate equipment and support for our educational system, to vastly enlarge our educational program and to increase ten-fold the number of our young people who resort to these schools for training. A new doctrinal statement may be a more or less serviceable device; but Baptist fellowship is not a device; it is a creation of God in which articles of faith never have been and cannot be a major factor. To enter into such fellowship is an experience that far transcends any intellectual agreement about dogma.

What Baptist does not know to the depths of his soul that the comparison of values here pointed out is true? Is there a man or woman in the Northern Baptist Convention whose sincere judgment does not ratify it? Why should there be any doubt as to the proper course for the Convention to pursue? Is it too much to expect of such a body of people that the only rivalry in it will be upon the point, "Who best can serve and best agree?"

In the churches at home a million and a half of Baptists are looking towards Des Moines with anxiety and hope. They are tired of hesitation, confusion and debate. Much of the debate they neither understand nor regard with interest. They are patient but heart-weary. They are positively hungry for a simple, free, large fellowship of effort to make salvation, as Christ projected it and as the need of humanity shall appear, abound on earth. Send back to them not the raucous discords of renewed factional controversy, but rather a thrilling, united bugle call like that of the silver trumpets when Jehovah's fiery cloud rose to signal a new march of God with his people.

Bon Voyage, My Friend!

J. B. GAMBRELL has passed away.

Seer, statesman, master of men and assemblies; devoted with the intensity of a single consuming passion to the promotion, unification and extension of the Baptist denomination; naive and strict in his theology; quaint, humorous and entertaining as a speaker and writer: his influence was felt as a conservative force throughout the South, and he crowned a long life of religious leadership by serving at its close in the exalted position of president of the Southern Baptist Convention.

These lines are written by one who was his personal friend.

As I write I sit looking across the shining waters of Lake Michigan to the shoreless horizon where a boat is receding from sight. So he seems to have gone from us.

I became best acquainted with his soul in the course of a correspondence between us just before he went to Europe some months ago. The subject was a matter dear to both of us alike, on which both of us had expressed ourselves publicly. It was the possibility of a world mobilization of Baptists for an adequate world program. We dreamed of such a movement with the enthusiasm of youth. He went and I shall go without seeing the fulfillment of that dream. But to have dreamed it with him and thus to have come into communion with the greatness of his soul, is to have experienced a profound personal enrichment.

Such is my debt to him. I salute him as he passes on to the invisible realm of glory.

How Blue Ought the Laws to Be?

GROWING moral recklessness and degeneracy in the pursuit of pleasure evokes a warning note in President Tustin's address appearing in this issue. On the other hand, there is a prevalent protest against "blue laws," and an organized movement to resist their enactment and enforcement. What is the proper Christian attitude on the subject?

Standards of right are vital, moral or legal. Conduct is vitally right when it conduces to the best life for all. It is morally right when it follows established custom. It is legally right when it conforms to authorized legislation.

For the Christian the vital standard is the highest and final one. Jesus set it forth in his life and teaching as the law of nature by which all laws of society, both moral and prescriptive must be tested. According to that standard the best life for all is the goal of life for each; pleasure is good in the degree in which it serves life, and society is bound to promote a sound use of pleasure and to avert dissipation. This standard the church must hold and affirm.

How far shall society attempt to enact the vital standard into law? In trying to answer this question, distinguish between self-indulgence in pleasure, and the business of catering or pandering to it. On the one hand, personal liberty is in itself so precious and has such large value for personal discipline that government ought to be cautious about limiting it by legislation. On the other hand, reckless self-indulgence and the business of promoting it for pecuniary gain are so prevalent and disastrous to society that government cannot be indifferent.

Between the preservation of personal liberty on one hand and the protection of society from the evils of general dissipation on the other, lies a broad zone of problems, every one of which is complex, and no one of which can be rightly solved without a careful study of all the factors involved. The vitality of the social organism itself depends in a large degree upon the way in which legislation expresses the public solution of these problems.

Whether the government ought by law to suppress pleasure resorts, public dances, Sunday shows and sports, exhibitions of nude art, the tobacco business, prize-fighting, horse-racing, and other practices presenting similar problems, ought to be investigated and debated by Christians and citizens generally with conscientious thoroughness.

In order that such inquiries may not be merely academic, but may be socially fruitful, such organizations as forums, clubs and study classes carrying on such investigations, ought to have capable committees on findings, to digest arguments, formulate conclusions and present proposals for united action.

Signs and Call of the Times

Opening Address of the President of the Northern Baptist Convention, at the Fourteenth Annual Session, Des Moines, Iowa, June 22, 1921

BY HON. ERNEST L. TUSTIN

FELLOW-DELEGATES to the Northern Baptist Convention:—

The fourteenth session of our great organization is called together at a crisis of the ages. Despite the ending of the most inexcusable war of all time, nation after nation seems still anxious to throw down the gage of battle, and war after war is being waged throughout the world. Within nearly every country riot and bloodshed are rampant, and the population of the countryside is pressing into the cities, turning producers into consumers, and raising innumerable social and economic perplexities. Even countries possessing representative government are having the most complex problems of entanglement to unravel.

Ex-President Taft recently said, "Respect for representative government is lower today than it was a century ago anywhere in the world".

There has come into the minds of the many a desire not merely for equality of opinion, but a demand for equality of condition. This has led to a great extravagance in living. A man seeing his neighbor dressing better, owning an automobile, and indulging in pastimes and sport, immediately concludes he is entitled to exactly the same advantages, whether he can afford it or not. The consequence is that countless thousands of our people are running beyond their means and generally living without the economic care and saving of our forefathers.

Womanhood Gone to the Dogs

In our social life there has been a most deplorable lowering of morale. The Auxiliary Board of the Episcopal Church in a scathing article on the "Moral Let-down in the Habits of our Women, Young and Old" has given among the fourteen points of its terrible indictment the following advice to its young women:

"Don't swear,

Refrain from immodest dress,

Avoid improper dancing,

Give up drinking,

Quit gambling,

Stop joy-riding,

Ban immoral plays".

The necessity of this advice for young women is thoroughly equalled by the moral degeneration and let-down habits of our young men. The press is teeming with cases of wrongdoing and embezzlement upon the part of the youth of our land, and in business lines the whole assumption seems to be—get money; get it honestly if possible; but get money.

In our local politics the morale is lower perhaps today than ever before. In nearly every city of our country the word of the boss is supreme. No matter how worthy the cause, indifferent to all logical and sensible argument, the boss can defeat any measure for the uplift and advancement of the people.

Where Surge the Restless Crowds

The great restless crowds of our young men and women who surge up and down the streets of our towns and cities while our churches remain almost empty is another of the problems most difficult of solution.

Along the countryside where formerly our fathers relied upon the great bulwark of religious belief and observance, has grown up a non-church-going and non-religious people whose knowledge of the sacraments is chiefly confined to those of marriage and death.

There is a clear, distinct call throughout the land for the unification of all forces of Christianity to consider the great questions confronting the political, business and religious world. This is no time for discord, jealousy or misunderstandings.

We need from north to south, and from east to west, the same great quickening, the same personal conviction of sin, the same desire for a Christ-like life that swept over our country more than a century ago. In those days we had to meet the spirit of the French Revolution translated by immigrants to our shores, and the atheism of Voltaire and Paine was everywhere discussed and was rapidly becoming the fashionable religion of the time. Students and writers agree that the great awakening of religious life at that period so purified and stabilized our civic and social life that we survived even the horrors of a great civil war. Devotional meetings, fraught with great emotional fervor, beginning in staid old New England, for eighteen months swept throughout our land, permeating even the most extreme western settlements. Family altars were erected, attendance upon divine service renewed, and the perusal of the Bible as the revelation of God to man was universally revived, while our young men and women eagerly believed that to be messengers of the gospel of Christ was the greatest calling among mankind. The return by our nation to an allegiance to God Almighty and the discarding of the false doctrines of that age is one of the great historical truths of our national life.

Today the great fundamental need throughout our land is the personal realization of a religious life. There should be unification of all denominations for a solemn season of prayer, not only for greater self-consecration, but for the repentance and conversion of all peoples of our country. We have come to regard enthusiasm and emotion when related to religion as showing weakness. This is utterly false. To a greater or less degree the heart-throbs of the individual, the emotions of the soul, control of actions in spiritual and worldly affairs. Many times I have seen strong men walk the floor with knitted brow and clenched fist, displaying the greatest and most heart-felt emotion at a crisis which has come into their lives; and can there be a greater crisis than the soul's becoming right with its Creator?

Lodges Beat the Churches

If our great denomination go from these meetings thoroughly and sincerely awakened to the fervor of New Testament times, with earnest belief in the necessity for the conversion of souls, many of the complicated questions confronting our land would be easily solved.

Oh, how sadly our loyalty to our religious profession and our passion for soul-winning compares with the spirit of the great social orders of our land! The Year-book shows that for the last reported year we had a loss in our membership in the Northern Baptist Convention of upwards of 90,000. In the last annual period the Masonic fraternity increased 70,693; the Elks added 120,864; and the Moose 15,610. Oh, the pity of it! We, who profess the great principles of Christianity, to allow these fraternal organizations to increase by thousands while we actually lose out in our work for the ingathering of souls. The great, the serious lack in the followers of Christianity of the present day is that we do not possess the fervor, the heart-throbs which characterized the Christianity of a century ago. We allow worldly affairs to crowd out our devotion and loyalty to our religious life.

Christian Education Lags

Throughout our land there has been a great increase of interest and enthusiasm regarding education. In many states new codes have been inaugurated providing for substantial advance both in the training and compensation of teachers, and provision for an increased school term, especially in the country districts, has been almost universally adopted.

While friends of secular education have thus been industriously occupied in broadening the scope of school life and school curricula, we who should be busily engaged in Christian education have not kept abreast of the times.

One of the greatest editors of our country recently said to me:

"You Christians do not realize the potent force of your Sunday schools; if you did, you would unhesitatingly throw so much force and vigor into their development that out of them would speedily come the greatest religious force of the country. Instead of doing this, you are neglecting your schools by having inefficient methods, poor and undeveloped teachers, and uninteresting and ignorant superintendents. Give any other organization in the country this latent force and it would instantly develop into an overwhelming potentiality."

We must give our Bible schools more individual, intelligent, exhaustive attention. There is no reason why boys and girls should remain in our schools until from twelve to fifteen years of age and then gradually slip away from interest and attendance. We should devise methods and means, both of study and of interesting social service work that would attach our youth of all ages to the school and keep them under the uplifting religious influences thereof. When we consider such a large proportion of the Protestant church members comes from the Bible Schools, and then take into account the number of our boys and girls who stop attendance at an early age, can we wonder we have such a marked decrease in the membership of our churches?

All careful writers unite in saying that materialism is increasing by leaps and bounds, and that the study of the Bible even in many of the denominational schools and theological seminaries is being supplanted by courses in interpretation and theory. What we need as a denomination, from the Sunday School to the theological seminary, is the Bible as a text-book and the prayerful teaching of the existence of an Almighty God; the gift of His Son to humanity; the vicarious sufferings and death of Christ; and the personal relation existing between mankind and a just and gracious God. In our colleges and theological seminaries we should have no one as a teacher who cannot be brought into harmony with the spiritual interpretation of the Universe.

Let us as Baptists sustain and develop not only our 22 colleges and 43 schools, but let us send our boys and girls to these schools and hold them responsible for the religious education of the denomination.

Oh, let us give up all questions of petty philosophizing! Let us cease criticizing each other, and with a simple belief in the revealing Word of God once more go back to the plain faith of our fathers in a personal relation to a personal Saviour.

What Shall We Do for Preachers?

The fact that more of our young men are not attending our theological seminaries and becoming heralds of our inspiring and God-given principles as a denomination is not due so much to the want of money or the scarcity of opportunity as to a lack of real, personal, overwhelming desire to preach the Gospel.

God will take us at His word. The opportunity for a sincere conviction of sin and a complete acceptance of Jesus Christ as a Saviour is with us as at the Apostolic season. This has been most clearly demonstrated by wonderful revivals at Brown and Bucknell Colleges where hundreds of our young collegiates made a sincere acknowledgment of the errors of life, and resolved, God helping them, in the future to become disciples of the Christ.

Oh, brethren, we earnestly believe that if we as a denomination confess our faults to a personal God and then use in the advancement of His Kingdom one small part of the endeavor that is being expended in political and business affairs, once more from the Atlantic to the Pacific will there be a revival of the religion of our God throughout our institutions of learning.

Some weeks ago a number of our devoted laymen met in Cleveland, and after careful, prayerful, fraternal and interesting discussion agreed to recommend to the brotherhood of our great Baptist denomination the principle of tithing.

One of the salutary lessons of the late War was to teach our people the art of giving upon a large scale and in a sacrificial manner. If we, as citizens, could then contribute again and again until it hurt, and if we felt the value of our citizenship in proportion to our pecuniary sacrifices, should we not as a denomination make such sacrifices of our material substance for the success of our work?

Our Tenth Would Turn the Tables

If we, as Baptists, would devote to the service of the Most High one tenth of our incomes, all questions relating to our Board of Promotion and to the raising of money for missionary and educational purposes, would vanish, and the amount raised by the contribution of one tenth of the income of our people would be a sum entirely sufficient for all our denominational expenses.

Our splendid Women's organizations in various districts have just completed a most wonderful series of meetings, commemorating their Golden Jubilee. The sacrificial work of our Baptist women, both in the Home and Foreign Missionary field, should be an inspiration and challenge to our entire denomination. We congratulate them most sincerely on the work already accomplished, and wish them Godspeed and greater success in their magnificent vision for the future.

Let us, as a people, in a humble, prayerful, devout and repentant attitude seek the blessing and help of Almighty God for our country, our cities, our towns, our homes, and our young people. Let us give up all unkind criticism of each other's beliefs and convictions. Religious freedom has always been the glory of our denomination. Let us continue in this exaltation; let us cling to the fundamentals, but also give every man the right to interpret according to the dictates of his conscience.

Let us, earnestly plan and strive for the religious education of all our people from the cradle to the grave. Let us try humbly, prayerfully and sincerely with the opening of this Convention to inaugurate a tremendous forward movement for another Pentecost.

The Latin-American International Problem

Latin America is disturbed—Believes priceless spiritual treasures menaced—Knows itself rich and helpless. Suspicious of American imperialism. Seeking refuge in a league of nations against us.

BY A. G. BAKER

FOR Latin America the most absorbing question at the present time is that of inter-continental relationships. It is true that there occasionally arise disputes between the South American countries who would understand the Latin American mind or discover the secret of happy relationships with the continent to the south of us must learn to hold their honor and dignity in equal esteem.

The case of Cuba may serve as an example of the different points of view of the two peoples. We of North America feel that in aiding Cuba win her freedom and in giving her a conditional independence we have done fairly well by Cuba. But Peruvians, Bolivians or Chilians are never quite so enthusiastic in their comments. A Peruvian author, Garcia Calderon, has written: "Cuba should serve the rest of Latin America as a kind of experimental object lesson. * * * The United States offers her peace at the cost of liberty. The alternatives are independence or material progress. * * * The choice between dignity and a future is a painful one." But no one who knows the Latin-American heart doubts for a moment what that choice would be. National dignity, even if it should mean prolonged strife and poverty, will be chosen every time in preference to an internal peace and prosperity which must be bought with the betrayal of that honor under the tutorage of a foreign power.

Latin Culture versus American Efficiency

The second possession which they wish to safeguard is their Latin culture. This culture consists of a literature which speaks their own language and warms their hearts with its passionate emotion. It consists of traditions and customs, hallowed with age, which have been bequeathed to them from those distant days when Spain and Portugal were setting the pace for the rest of Europe. It consists of a love of art, of refinement and of the beautiful, which will build a theatre rather than a school house, and will erect a monument to some national hero rather than bury money in an underground drain for the sanitation of a whole city. And today this refined type of culture trembles instinctively before the threatened inrush of the materialism and the crude efficiency of the North which can build a railroad, or manage a copper mine, but may not be able to appreciate the beauties of a Rembrandt.

Thus their patriotism becomes a religion. To them it seems that the preservation of their culture is in reality the preservation of the spiritual and of the ideal, as over against the materialism of those nations which have more recently grown rich and strong by the methods of commercial competition. And to the Latin American, the United States seems to be one of these prosperous nations in which the higher values of life are being swamped under a wave of commercialism and "efficiency." Writing in another connection, Garcia Calderon has said, in effect; that within the last fifty years the hub or center of the United States has shifted from Boston, the home of the Atlantic Coast idealism which gave the world the Monroe Doctrine, to the city of Chicago, the metropolis of the stock yards, the grain exchange, and of a score of themselves, but these rarely involve any great fundamental issue, and with the exception of the controversy between Chile and Peru, have been amicably arranged among themselves.

But what is greatly disturbing the people of the southern half of this hemisphere is the fact that they see certain priceless treasures of theirs, inherited from the past, seriously menaced by foreign powers while they themselves lack the resources necessary for self-defense.

I

National Honor and Spiritual Ideal

Of these racial possessions which they wish to defend, that which occupies the first place in their esteem is national honor and dignity—all that lofty conception which is bound up in the characteristic word, DIGNIDAD. The Latin American loves the ideal or the spiritual above the material; and, now that they are turning away from their religious faith, national honor becomes their highest conception of the spiritual. Therefore anyone radiating railroads. The Latin American fears lest a similar transition should come over his own culture and idealism.

Finally, South Americans are concerned over the future of their natural resources—oil, copper, coffee, sugar, etc.,—lest these sources of national prosperity with which nature has endowed them should be carted off for the enrichment of other stronger and more efficient peoples, leaving the original owners impoverished and despoiled. And there is a grave danger here, but it is not necessary to enlarge at present upon this familiar subject.

II

At the Mercy of Fate

As the Latin American looks about him for a defense of these priceless possessions he finds millions of people, it is true, but millions divided up into twenty different republics, and what is even more serious, split up horizontally into two or three social strata, shading off rapidly from a small and cultured minority on top, to a great, dense, untamed majority at the bottom—millions of them, who rove in the forests, plough in the fields or dig in the mines, but who can make comparatively little contribution to a racial heritage which in reality is not theirs but has been imposed upon them by their conquerors. What if these submerged millions of people, within their very borders, should become aroused, as aroused they must become sooner or later, and reach up those millions of hands of theirs that have toiled in the fields and mines for others and begin to pull down that fragile culture which others have built above them?

All this must be borne in mind in order to appreciate that feeling of sensitiveness, almost bordering on irritability, with which the Latin American views his relationships to the great outside world. He is conscious of a fatal weakness which places him at the mercy of foreign powers.

III

Monroe Doctrine Suspected

Public opinion in the South has not been slow in seeing that the late war has very materially changed the whole international situation for them, and with the weakening of the European nations, has placed them largely at the mercy of the great country in the north.

The traditional policy of this country touching Latin America was set forth in 1823 in the Monroe Doctrine, and for three generations these republics were glad to live under the sense of security which that pronouncement gave them. But in 1895, upon the occasion of the dispute between Britain and Venezuela, the Secretary of State, Mr. Olney, sent a dispatch to Great Britain setting forth President Cleveland's views in these terms: "Today the United States is practically sovereign on this continent, and its fiat is law upon the subjects to which it confines its interposition." (Sweet, A History of Latin America, p. 264.) Great Britain took heed and consented to arbitrate. But immediately amazement and suspicion were aroused throughout all Latin America, because by the official interpretation of a president of the United States, that great doctrine which up to that time had been a source of protection was in imminent danger of becoming an instrument of foreign domination and control. Since that day every pronouncement and every movement has been scrutinized with increasing concern.

And this is the situation as they view it. They recognize that there two naval stations on the coast of Cuba; our marines are in Haiti and in Santo Domingo; we own Porto Rico and the Danish West Indies; the ten-mile strip through Panama is American territory and covered with American fortifications; we have just leased for ninety-nine years the Big Corn Island and the Little Corn Island off the coast of Nicaragua, with full rights to fortify the same; they hear repeated rumors of our desire to purchase the British possessions in the West Indies and the Gallapagos Islands to the southwest of Panama. One hundred years ago the Gulf of Mexico and the Caribbean Sea were surrounded by Latin possessions. But for the last thirty years we have been stretching our arms around that region.

They See What We Have Done

(3). Furthermore they are worried over the way in which what was once the benevolent protection of the

is in this country a very considerable element, probably the majority, who entertain the kindest of feelings towards their cousins of the Latin blood. But on the other hand they view with misgivings the insistent commercial imperialism of a capitalistic minority which is not as considerate of the possessions and liberties of other nations as it might be. The following are some of the facts which disturb their peace of mind:

Northern Expansion Frightens

(1). They think that there is some significance in the fact that through the acquisition of Louisiana, Florida, Texas, New Mexico, and Alaska we have almost doubled our territory during the 19th century.

(2). Our aggressiveness in the region of the Caribbean Sea is causing them even more alarm. We hold Big N. A. Brother is fast being transformed into a meddling interference. We have interfered in recent years in Cuba, Haiti, Santo Domingo, Panama, Nicaragua and Mexico. Our more recent intervention in the trouble between Panama and Costa Rica serves but to confirm their gravest fears and convictions. It looks to them as though we exercise this power because we possess it.

(4). A further menace seems to lurk in our phenomenal commercial expansion since the year 1914. What might our interest in oil involve for the liberties of Mexico? How far does our interest in sugar influence our policy in Cuba? Before the war there was scarcely a single North American bank doing business in South America. Today there are twenty-two. What the Latin American fears most of all is the fact that we (as he thinks) give to commercial prosperity the first place in our scale of life's values.

These and other factors have bulked so large in the minds of our friends of the south that up to January, 1921, seventeen of the twenty republics had become signatories to the League of Nations—seeking in a League of all the nations a final court of appeal wherein they may preserve their honor, their culture and their natural resources. Twenty-five years ago the South American countries looked to the idealism of this nation to protect them from the ambitions of Europe. Today the situation is reversed. The saner elements of both continents north and south view these more recent tendencies with alarm.

There is danger lest the Rio Grande which has been but the dividing line between two nations, may become the symbol of a deeper and a more serious cleavage, unless all parties concerned resolve that here and now suspicion and aggression shall cease and that in all mutual affairs of the future the nobler impulses of the human heart shall prevail.

Entering the Kingdom of Heaven

Japanese, though proud and patriotic, have human hearts—It takes Courage for one to become a Christian—This one was quick and thorough

BY DOUGLAS G. HARING

"YES, sir, I want to be a Christian. Thank you, sir, for asking me."

If you could be certain of receiving such an answer, how long would it take you to get up the courage to ask someone to become a Christian? If you could be sure of that reply once in every five times, would you face the four refusals for the sake of the one acceptance? How about once in a hundred times? But should it come once in a hundred times, you and I ought to examine ourselves. God so made human beings that whatever our color or race, we cannot resist the Christian message when it is sympathetically and sensibly presented. We are ready to invite people to meetings. We like to preach to people. But it is so hard simply to ask an individual if he is ready to become a Christian!

Like the Easy Jobs

In common with the their American brethren, Japanese Christians find it easier to go to meetings, to speak in meetings, to invite people to meetings, than it is to ask an individual publicly to acknowledge the Master. Folks in the homeland hear about the striking conversions, the unusual faithfulness, the "high spots" of Christian life on mission fields. Being a young missionary I have naturally formed the acquaintance of many other young missionaries of all denominations. Scarcely one has failed to show surprise at the difference between the striking stories of Oriental Christians so common at home, and the reality as expressed in every day life. I suspect that when a young Japanese goes to America and sees the daily lives of the Christians there, he too has an unpleasant surprise.

When you think of missionaries, do not picture us as living on the "mountain tops." The people are not exactly prostrating themselves in the dust and begging us to make them into Christians ere they perish. The Japanese are too proud a race to readily accept a foreign religion. The national self-consciousness makes it difficult for them to see much good in anything foreign, the foreign God included. Once penetrate the wall of spiritual isolation, and you find that the heart of the Japanese is a thoroughly human heart.

The School Catches Them

The story hinted at in the beginning of this article has been long postponed. Here in Yokohama we use a method of work common in Japan; an English evening school, ministering to eager youths who share the general passion for acquiring the language that constitutes the "Open Sesame" to most of the world. Our hundred pupils are working boys for the most part, responsive and eager to learn. In the daily half-hour of chapel they listen to the missionary, learn English hymns and often for the first time hear the story of Jesus. The message of the humble Galilean works in many hearts and scarcely a boy remains in the school a year without a perceptible change in his manner and character.

Even when they know about Christianity and believe it in general, it takes courage for these boys to become Christians. Sometimes the step would endanger their job: again it would upset a home: always it bring ridicule and loss of friends. So the number who openly take the step remains small, but one cannot help feeling that after a period of reaction against Christianity, Japan is again quietly opening her heart to the message. She is spiritually bankrupt, and aware of her condition, although she refuses for the most part to see any hope aside from intenser devotion to nationalism.

After an evangelistic meeting not long ago I spoke to the most promising young man in the school and asked if he were not ready to definitely confess Christ. His answer, eager and joyful, forms the opening sentence of this article: "Yes, sir, I want to be a Christian. Thank you, sir, for asking me." I have heard other boys say yes to the same question, but rarely have I met the joy and fervency which were written on the face of this youth. He has been accepted by the church and will soon be baptized. He is an apprentice, and so cannot call his time his own. His worry was that he could not attend church services. I told him that the fundamental thing was the relation of his own soul to God, and the sort of life he lives: that church attendance is not the sole index to Christian character and attainment. When he heard that he might join the church even if he could not attend regularly, he fairly trembled with happiness.

This Does not Happen Often

He told me his hopes and ideals. He wants to become a farmer and settle down in some farming community and make it Christian. Wherever he goes, I am confident that he will leave a real and lasting impress for good. God has touched the life of that boy, and it can never lose all that God has given it. This is just a plain tale of a typical conversion. It doesn't happen as often as we would like: but I wish I could give you something of his manly bearing since he has decided for Christ; something of the joy in his eyes as he said: "Yes, sir, I want to be a Christian. Thank you, sir, for asking me."

How a Church Did the "Impossible"

Cleveland will have the Greatest Baptist Church building in the country—Dr Bustard crowns twelve years of evangelistic pastoral work with a signal achievement—Two small children with pennies started a fund for a new Church.

BY ALBERT SIDNEY GREGG

Euclid Avenue Baptist Church, Cleveland, has accomplished the "impossible," just when everybody said it couldn't be done because of existing business conditions.

Resident members with the aid of a few friends have subscribed $515,000 toward a new building fund, and this amount, with a million dollars that will be derived from the sale of the old church property, will enable Dr. W. W. Bustard and his people to erect the long desired "Baptist Temple" in Cleveland. They expect to have the largest auditorium, and the best equipped plant for church work in the Baptist denomination, if not in all American Protestantism.

A Snap in Real Estate

By a singular Providence, the trustees were able to lease a most desirable location on the corner of East Eighteenth Street and Euclid Avenue, just across Euclid Avenue north from the present church building. It has a frontage of 132 feet on Euclid Avenue, and is 360 feet deep on East Eighteenth. The Euclid Avenue front consists of stores that have been rented to good advantage. In the rear there is a business college, a hotel, an apartment house, a large double dwelling, and a variety of smaller stores with fronts on Eighteenth Street. The plan is to erect the edifice in the heart of this area and retain the stores on the two streets. An arcade already built into the Euclid Avenue front and used by the business college will become the main entrance to the church. The walls of the business buildings are strong enough to sustain several additional stories, which could be run up at any time. As the business center of the city is steadily creeping eastward toward this corner, upper floors cut for office purposes would rent quickly at desirable rates.

A very important feature of this Baptist transaction in real estate is that the rentals will now carry the property and pay a profit of $5,000 a year. Furthermore, the lease could be sold for an advance of $200,000. And strange as it may seem, it is specified that when the lease expires the church may buy the property at the valuation named when the lease was signed. Any way you look at it, the church has put over a fine business deal in getting control of this admirable site, which is regarded by experts as the best church location in any large American city.

Packed the House, Rain or Shine

For twelve years Dr. Bustard, the pastor, has faced a packed church each Sunday morning and evening, rain or shine. His hearers come from all over the city. Among his most ardent "boosters" are leaders in big financial, business, political and professional affairs who do not have any particular church allegiance. Last winter when Dr. Bustard was invited to become the co-pastor of Dr. Cortland Myers of Tremont Temple, Boston, there was such a popular demand for him to remain in Cleveland that he declined the Boston invitation, increase in salary, bigger crowds and all. And then the officials of Euclid Avenue congregation offered to provide the money for the million-dollar church, which will give him a larger hearing than he would have had in Boston.

Times Were too Hard

Later when the matter of raising the money was discussed, business men in the church declared that the time was inopportune. The effects of the industrial depression were being felt on all sides, and very few showed much interest in the undertaking. But Dr. Bustard went right ahead. He obtained the help of Rev. F. H. Divine formerly with the Home Mission Board, and set out to raise the amount needed. The ten days from April 20, to May 1 were devoted to the campaign. The only organization was a cabinet created by the pastor, which had charge of the activities. Previous to April 20, there had been a series of cottage prayer meetings. Beginning with the 20th an "inspirational conference" was held at the church, each night. These affairs were very informal, the attendance ranging from 100 to 400. Addresses were given on stewardship and consecration.

God Has the Money

The undertaking was put on a high spiritual plane at the very outset. An atmosphere of faith was created that touched and animated every person who attended the meetings. There was no attempt to create a highly organized "machine" to raise money. But a great deal was done to intensify the conviction that "God has money we don't know anything about," and that "the invisible resources of God are available to those who believe." The only slogan was a part of Neh. 2:20: "Then answered I them, and said unto them: The God of heaven, he will prosper us; therefore we his servants will arise and build."

In the very first conference with 150 people present, 50 of the number subscribed $150,540, and then right along each night additional amounts were announced, until the total had grown to $350,000 by May 1. On that Sunday,

Dr. Bustard and Mr. Divine appealed to the congregation and raised enough to bring the grand total up to $515,000.

There was a great deal of specific praying. Members were asked to pray definitely at 9 in the morning and between 12 and 1 daily. Mr. Divine asked for a list of all who could give $1 or more, and those names were made a subject of special prayer. Furthermore he made up an estimate of amounts that should be paid by the week from $1 up to $20 in order to raise the half million and when it was all over there was only $5,000 difference between his total and the amount actually raised.

A New Convert Gave $50,000

A number of things occurred which proved beyond question that a real vital confidence in God will bring tangible results. For instance, a woman whom Dr. Bustard had led to Christ and taken into the church two days before the campaign began, gave $50,000 at the first conference, and later increased the amount to $55,000. She had not been put down even as a possibility, and yet she headed the list. A young man who had been a member only a short time subscribed $17,000. He had not been thought of for such a sum. Later it developed that $150,000 of the total came from men and women who had been members from one to two years. At the outset three leading officials said the money simply could not be raised, and did not subscribe anything. Later these men contributed far beyond what had been expected of them, namely $27,000, $12,000 and $11,000 respectively.

Not only was the money all subscribed without a blare of trumpets, expensive press publicity or an extensive organization, but a most unusual spiritual atmosphere was created. The church is literally packed to the doors morning and night with eager listeners and the people are working as they have never worked before.

In analyzing this very unusual victory it should be stated that during the twelve years that he has been pastor, Dr. Bustard has made evangelism supreme. He is quite sure that the best way to edify the saints is to induce men and women to accept Christ. Evangelism is the keynote of his ministry, and the dynamo that has made Euclid Avenue church a center of wide spreading religious activities.

Two Children With Pennies began It

Five years ago two boys and a girl brought some pennies to Dr. Bustard and said that they wanted him to start a building fund for a new church. He accepted the trust in all seriousness, and put the money in a bank. On May 1 these same children were presented to the congregation by Dr. Bustard who told the story. The original pennies were given in faith, and the undertaking was consummated in faith. The New Baptist Temple will stand as a monument to the faith of a people who have come to know in a very special sense that God hears and answers prayer.

Before High God—Not For Sale

Attacks of Pittsburgh Employers Association on Federal Council of Churches and Y. M. C. A. bring a hot rejoinder—"If you will do as we say, money; if not, no money."—Dr. Fosdick says that means agitation and revolution

The recent attacks of the Pittsburgh Employers' Association upon the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America for their industrial program drew forth a vigorous rejoinder from Reverend Harry Emerson Fosdick in a sermon at the First Presbyterian Church, New York, on May 8. Preaching upon the subject "Progressive Christianity" he said in part:

"One of the most amazing exhibitions of this same spirit (of opposition to new applications of Christian teaching to social conditions) has recently been given us in a letter published and signed by the Employers' Association of Pittsburgh. It was this same group of gentlemen who, a little while ago, attacked the Young Women's Christian Association because that beneficent organization desires, not simply to assure the young women of America a safe entrance into heaven, but to insure them decent conditions of living on earth before they get into heaven. And now this same group has attacked ferociously the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America, the organization that effects the co-operation of thirty great evangelical denominations in this country. Listen to this attack:

Hold Back the Dollars

"The radical and bolshevik elements in the churches seem to be co-operating through the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America, and many of our members are expressing themselves as determined to discontinue financial support of their respective Churches unless they withdraw all moral and financial support from the Federal Council."

"There's no use wasting time answering a charge like that. You have in your hands today the 'Social Creed of the Churches' of the Federal Council, a cautious statement of some areas in our public life that need fuller application of the principles of Jesus. Moreover, the president of the Federal Council is Dr. Robert E. Speer, and only a hopelessly hysterical mind can picture Bolshevism propaganda going on under his superintendence. But as this attack has been so widely published and so widely commented upon, it is necessary that the Christian pulpit should pay attention to it.

"For one thing, the persons who have launched this attack apparently propose to settle the matter of the social application of the principles of Jesus by money. 'Determined to discontinue financial support' is their proposition. 'We will buy you,' they say to the churches and, in particular, to the ministers of the churches. 'If you will do as we say, money; if not, no money.' May I be permitted to suggest that these gentlemen have somewhat seriously misapprehended the temper of the Christian ministry of America? I am speaking for multitudes of my brethren when I say, 'Before high God, not for sale!' Indeed, I suspect that there has been a crop of sermons on the social question preached throughout this country that would not have been preached if it had not been for this public attack, so that those of us who are interested in having such sermons preached might almost thank these gentlemen for their unintentional assistance. There would have been, I suppose, no Luther if there had been no Tetzel and if there had been no George the Third, there would have been no George Washington. Action and reaction are generally equal and if anyone wants to make sure that the social teachings of Jesus shall be the centrally absorbing subject of the Christian pulpit in the next year or so, the easiest way is to offer to buy our silence for money.

Look Out for Revolution

"Far deeper however and more important is this serious matter. No thoughtful man can regard without anxiety the disruptive elements that are abroad in our social life today. That phrase 'social revolution' occurs with alarming frequency and carries with it ominous significance. Said one of our leading orators recently in New York City: 'The day of social evolution has passed and the day of social revolution as arrived.' Well, God pity us if that be so! For 'social revolution' now has a very clear and definitive significance. It means that a minority group in the commonwealth, through organization controlling the indispensable necessities of human life, can by concerted action force their will on the majority, break down the fundamental principles and institutions of representative government, by violence seize the power of the state and use it as they will. That thing has already been done in Russia and upon the witness of a man like Bertrand Russell, a communist himself, has been attended by such incidental circumstances as loss of all free speech, all free assembly, all free publication, all free representation, all free transportation. Again and again, in Britain, with every great strike, the pendulum swings more dangerously near that fateful hour. But here in America we yet have the best chance left on earth to achieve, as the Social Creed of the Federal Council says, 'by orderly and progressive social reconstruction instead of revolution by violence' the ends we seek. Everybody who really cares for the institutions of America must pray for that. Every responsible organization from the Federation of Labor to the Chambers of Commerce really wants that. My friends, social revolution is too costly a way to get progress. For while it sometimes does mean the demolition of old evils it means the demolition of old gains too, that take long generations to build back again.

Better not Start Anything

"Just because this is the case, one looks with fear upon an announcement like this from Pittsburgh, for this letter indicates the surest and swiftest way to land this country in violent social revolution. Repress the endeavor to apply the principles of Jesus to the social order; repress the Young Women's Christian Associations in their interest concerning the life and labor of the young women of America; repress agencies that seek the amelioration of human relations in industry; try to keep the economic situation static in a dynamic world; and when you have long enough repressed the possibilities of orderly social progress you will get the inevitable consequence, disorderly social revolution. You cannot keep anything static in a dynamic world and when we forward-looking, liberal Christians pray and work for the application of Jesus' ideals to our social, economic, and international life, we are not disruptive; we are salutary. The application in a thoroughgoing fashion of those social ideals of the Federal Council to American life today would be the best insurance we could have against social revolution."

Let There Be No Shilly-Shallying

The Church must fully and with all cheerfulness grant the right of any man or men to object to its words and acts, to criticize them with utmost freedom, to give or withhold support to join the Church or leave it, to attack or defend, as one may deem best, but dangerous and wrong are those who attempt to determine, by their financial power, the limits to which the Church shall go in its declaration of moral and religious ideals, and of their clear application to present conditions; who would confine the Church to the functions defined in a recent statement: "Religion may properly act as a councillor to the individual conscience, and as a stretcher bearer for the wounded."

It must not be forgotten that in social reconstruction we are dealing with matters that vitally affect the welfare and happiness of millions of human beings, and that we have come upon times when people are not submissive to injustice or to unnecessary privation and suffering. They are deeply and justly in earnest. . . . If those who are the actual industrial, political and social leaders of the nation will not act upon the principle that the greatest shall be the servant of all, then the people themselves, with indignation and bitterness, are sure to take the destiny of the world into their own hands. The social question cannot be dealt with casually. People who are born with unusual ability, of whatever kind, or who receive special advantages, are given them for unselfish service. Large holdings of property can be justified only by devotion to the common good. We are entering upon an era in which the absorbing concern of the world will be for social justice and the greatest well-being of the greatest number. This will animate the religious spirit of the future—a spirit which has found its supreme expression and example in Jesus Christ.—Federal Council Report.

The High-Pressure School of Missions

BY H. G. WESTON SMITH

I

MORE and more missionary education will have to be emphasized in our churches or the new standards we have been setting in the kingdom work in other nations will not be supported by the great run of Baptist workers. Many of those who put a very small proportion of their weekly offering into the missionary enterprise in past years did it not because they believed in it or even took it quite seriously, but rather because they knew that there were some saintly people who did seem to believe in it; and because the amount that they gave was, anyway, not big enough to worry about much. They would take a chance, and if it was lost—who cared for a dime?

With the slogan, "As much for missions as for home support," gaining ground, this has all changed. The man who gave a dime without thinking as to where it went or what it did, will not do the same when it is a dollar or five dollars. This is enough to make him investigate if his enthusiasm is to be kept strong.

II

The "School of Missions" in some form is, without doubt, a coming institution in the yearly life of all energetic Baptist churches; for this is the means of informing those who are to be the guarantors of the kingdom unto the uttermost parts of the earth.

There are several types of "Schools of Missions." The more common extend over a period of weeks with one session each week. The type which I have designated "High-Pressure" is one which is pushed together into a week or ten days, with one session each night.

III

A school of this type was put on in the Greenville Church (Pa.) and it has proved to be of such great benefit to the church, and so many inquiries have come as to the school, that an outline of the facts is given here:

Church—420 members in community of 8,000 "well churchied"; community isolated from city centres where good speakers could be easily secured; a church largely of working people; practically all conditions normal except that the church has been believing in missionary education somewhat in the past.

Purpose of School of Missions—To educate the people of the church locally; create in general a better knowledge foundation for the interest in missions; to keep before the young people the calls of the kingdom at home and abroad that they may be influenced to consider Christian service as they are selecting a life work; to give the same opportunities to any who wish to come in for the school either from the other denominations in town or from other Baptist churches nearby.

Sample Evening Session—7:30 to 8 p. m.: Assembly of all ages with stereopticon lecture (We spent practically all of the time in and around Burma and India for the stereopticon material). Prof. Raymond N. Crawford of Burma took charge of this period. 8 to 8:30 p. m.: two groups (1) The "Curio Class"—boys and girls in charge of selected story-tellers who used important curios from sets on China, Africa, and Japan (sets secured from Board of Promotion) to build a story that would present some important aspect of the missionary enterprise; (2) The adults and young people remaining in the auditorium listening to an address on China by C. B. Leshar, M.D., of South China. 8:30 to 9 (The Curio Class have many of them gone home at about 8:40 after the close of their class) The young people meet in a "Life Work Class," and the adults meet for the study of text "The Kingdom and the Nations."

IV

By all usual laws of psychology the general address should come first instead of second, and the stereopticon should come last when the people are most tired. The program is arranged as above solely on account of the boys and girls. Seven o'clock was too early to start the school and 8:40 was as late as most of them should be kept up at night.

The great advantage of the "High-Pressure" school is that it gives the local church a chance to bring in one or more real live missionaries and get a consecutive presentation of the situation with which they are acquainted.

The text book must of course remain the general method; but it was our experience that the people got more real vision from these few presentations of the men themselves than from many a text-book study.

The mission field is a story-land at most no more than half real until someone comes to tell about the common experiences of one in the land. The tempers and habits; the loves and hates of the people; how many babies they have and how they take care of them; what the folks say to each other and to the missionary when they come to his house, hospital or church; what kinds of smell inhabit the lands; how the people make money; how they travel—these all determine one's picture of the life. No one can do this quite as the missionary can.

V

A word more should be said concerning the "Life Work Class." The purpose of this class was to present to the young people the various opportunities of service in all fields. In this particular class we had for two and one-half days Dr. Raymond M. West, life work secretary of the G. B. P. The influence on the young people both by him and by the missionaries was profound. Since the school opened the decisions of two more young people have been crystallized and they have begun on their program of preparation for real Christian service.

The average attendance at the school, by carefully kept records, was 174. The interest was intense. It was a great event in the whole life of the church. Cost in carfare, books, etc., just about $70. Offerings were $41. Net cost $29.

Rochester Theological Seminary German Department

The annual sermon before the German Department was preached on Sunday morning, May 22, by Rev. Gottlob Fetzner, of Cleveland, O., editor of "Der Sendbote." His theme was "The Essential Presence of the Holy Spirit." At the special request of the German Executive Committee the older custom of having at least one public examination during commencement time was resurrected. Professor Meyer presenting the senior class which was examined in the doctrine of the Atonement. The committee of examination was unusually large, the subject one of the most fundamental of our Christian faith and the interest, and discussions as well, throughout the examination hours very keen. This interest may lead to a reintroduction of this older custom.

The year at the German department was the most encouraging one since 1915. The total enrollment was 46 of which number 16 entered as new students last September, which is a sure indication that normal, per-war conditions have again set in.

A class of eight men was graduated on Wednesday evening, president Barbour presiding and giving the address to the graduates. Of the eight men five have already accepted pastorates; the remaining three intend to return for further study at the English department and at the college.

The demand for the services of the undergraduates is far greater than the ability to meet the demand. Every man in the three seminary classes, twenty-three in number, will be engaged for the summer vacation either in missionary work on the frontier in the new German settlements in Saskatchewan and Alberta or in supplying pastorless churches, which shows that this German department still has a great mission to perform. The prospects for another large entering class in the fall are very good.

O LOVE DIVINE.

O love supreme, divine!
My heart I yield to Thee;
Make it Thy hallowed shrine,
And dwell in me.

I cannot leave Thy sky,
I cannot leave Thy care,
For Thou art always nigh,
And hear'st my prayer.

Thy sun lights up my days,
Thy moon and stars my nights;
And ever on life's ways
Are new delights.

Kind is Thy will, and sweet,
My own I dare not ask;
My heaven is at Thy feet,
Or at Thy task.

O Love, supreme, divine!
Possess and rule my heart;
And all Thou hast is mine,
And all Thou art.

In Thee are joy and strength,
And peace amid the throng;
And through Thy love at length
The glad, new song.

—The British Weekly.

A Voice from Jugo-Slavia

BY V. WATSICH

Note—The Home Mission Society and the Detroit Baptist Union have been supporting a missionary among the Serbians and Croats (Jugo-Slavs) all of these, for several years. About two years ago fifteen members returned to Serbia and at once began to tell of the new-found Savior. Missions sprang up in many places. The Serbo-Croatian people of Detroit gathered enough money to have Bro. Marko, a missionary of the northern Slavs (Czecho-Slavs) visit these new mission stations. The accompanying letter and photograph tell graphically of how far the work has been advanced in the two years.—H. C. Gleiss.

(The interest in the following story is enhanced by the quaint composition of a foreigner in the course of learning the English language.)

"Then saith he unto his disciples, the harvest is truly plenteous, but the labourers are few,—Pray ye, therefore the Lord of the harvest, that he will send forth labourers into his harvest." These words Christ spoke to his disciples, showing them the harvest, and telling them to pray so God would send forth His labourers into his harvest.

Today the Lord is coming forth with the same words and is showing us the great work in Jugo-Slavia, where it was full of darkness, Romans, Greeks, Catholics until now, where the nation was bound to the other nations, have been a slave, as lifely also souly, God gave them freedom there now, for his work. In this free country there grew a kingdom first of God like the mustard seed, Luke 13:19.

This picture shows their ambition, our brethren in Jugo-Slavia. These brothers and sisters were at this conference at Daruvar, Slavonye, Mar. 27, 28. This is the first Serbo-Croatian and Slovak Baptist conference, that we know about.

Chairman of this conference was Michael Marko, from Czecho-Slovakia, great and wonderful work he has done there. On the call from the Serbo-Croatian Baptist Church, Detroit, Mich., Rev. M. Marko, twice made the trip to the Jugo-Slavia from Czecho-Slovakia. First when he came he looked for different brothers scattered around different cities, about which we even didn't know, nor they us.

Second time when he came there, they all met at a conference and decided to work together like one body, as much as they can. Elected for the older brother, the old man, white like a lamb, Ivana Zrinskiak from Zagreb. They have decided to pay him so he could spend all his time as a labourer in the harvest. Br. I. Zrinskiak is converted many years—business as a tailor—lived in Zagreb, the main city in Croatia. Beginning years under the period as slaves for Rome, Greece and Catholics, wasn't allowed to speak the word of God, his family and a few met around houses. Now is elected from the brethren as elder to preach the gospel to sinners that they're saved through the blood of Christ. This is the only brother that is working in Jugo-Slavia between Serbians and Croats. He is not only supposed to work in his city, but all the other cities several miles away, visit the younger brethren.

God bless Brother M. Marko for what he has done to our brethren and also for the non-tiring work. Christ said, "Whatsoever he has done to younger brothers he has done to Him." Matt. 25:40.

called Paul. Come and help us. Acts 16:19.

On the picture you see a bride, it is a sister who was baptized this spring in

SERBO-CROATIAN AND SLOVAK CONFERENCE

Let God strengthen Bro. I. Zrinskiak for the great work he has in front of himself there, who calls the American brothers to help him, like the Macedonia man the name of the God, and now on the conference she was married and with the love of Christ united with Bro. Tomeslav Vincetio. Thank God for everything.

Lightning Took a Hand in The Argument

Translation of the report of an evangelist of the Siberian Baptist Union, published in an issue of the periodical "Blagovestnik"

I worked for Christ fifteen months, excluding fifty-seven days when I was sick in bed. The first time I worked in a district surrounding the City of Omsk, visiting many villages where I had good success. In one village I worked fourteen days. There were converted and baptized one hundred seventeen people. In other villages forty to fifty people.

After this I worked in the district surrounding Slawgorod. Before I came there were about three hundred converts in that district. During my visit more than one thousand people were converted and baptized. Since my visit I hear of great progress in this district.

I visited one village where I stayed five days. There were five members of the Church. While I was there the whole population of the village with the exception of ten people were converted and baptized. In this village a deacon of the Orthodox Church came to me and said: "I like very much ikon of Jesus Christ. Can you show me his picture?" I asked him: "What picture of Jesus do you want to see, the one before or after his resurrection?" He said: "After the resurrection." I opened my New Testament and read Luke 24: and John 21: Afterward we both worshiped and he was converted.

In the village of Tickanchevka, not far from Omsk, sixty-seven people were converted and baptized; among them a boy of military age named Vasilencko, who decided he ought not to serve in the army, but the recruiting officer told him he must enlist or be shot. He said to them: "You can shoot my body, but not my soul" and the officer and a group of soldiers laughed him and his God and his Bible to scorn. They said: "Your faith is foolish." It was a very stormy day when this interview took place, and in the midst of it thunder rolled and lightning flashed and a stroke of lightning killed the officer and stunned seventeen soldiers. Vasilencko fell upon his face and thanked God for this witness. Afterward the soldiers ceased from their persecution of Vasilencko and other Christians.

In Paulvgorod, in the same neighborhood, after two years work in the little church which met in one of the large dwelling house it was found that ninety evangelists had been sent out who were giving all their time to preach the Gospel. The members of this church furnished horses by which evangelists might travel from village to village over a radius of one hundred miles.

In the city of Slawgorod I found only six members. Within two weeks a house where three hundred people could be seated was found to be too small for the meeting. Such is the progress of the Gospel in our country now.

The Bulletin Board

The Guide Book

The 1921-22 edition of The Guide Book of the Foreign Mission Society has just come from the press. It is intended to be a comprehensive illustrated survey of the work of Northern Baptists on the foreign field and contains a mass of information of the highest value concerning types of work, fields and workers. A copy should certainly be in the hands of every pastor and Sunday-school teacher and of all the friends of missions. Rev. W. B. Lippard is the editor and he has produced an exceedingly attractive book, which may be had for 25 cents from the Foreign Mission Society, 276 Fifth Avenue, New York City.

Cemetery Huts in France to Open

With the beginning of the tourist season the American Y. W. C. A. in France is to reopen its hostess huts at the American cemeteries in which our boys lie at rest. Through these shelters, visiting relatives are given hospitality and assistance. Many bereaved relatives alone in France during previous summers have already expressed their heartfelt appreciation of the helpful and sympathetic services of these Y. W. C. A. representatives. Many mothers unable to make the journey have received much comfort from the location of their son's graves and personal services in their name. This summer the cemetery huts are to be located at Romagne, Bony, Belleau Wood and Ferre-en-Tardenois.

Southern Campaign Cash Now Totals $25,000,000

Despite the depressed economic conditions that have prevailed throughout the South during much of the past year, the total cash collections on the 75-Million Campaign for that period amounted to $12,924,943.60, according to a report of the Conservation Commission. This sum, together with the collections reported a year ago, brings the total cash receipts for campaign purposes since that movement was launched to $25,103,424.68. Such collections under prevailing conditions, indicate that by the time the campaign period expires at least $75,000,000 in cash will have been realized, in the opinion of Dr. L. R. Scarborough, general director of the campaign, and other leaders.

Rare Pictures to be Shown at Des Moines

The missionary societies have prepared stereopticon addresses for use at the Des Moines convention, which are devoted almost exclusively to our own Baptist work. The stereopticon department of the Board of Promotion, in co-operation with the Foreign Mission Society, has prepared 100 slides illustrating Baptist progress in Northern Europe and France. This rare collection of pictures will be exhibited on Sunday evening when Commissioners C. A. Brooks and J. H. Rushbrooke are expected to speak. These slides will illustrate the work among the deep sea fishermen of Norway, the splendid achievements of Swedish Baptists, the relief work in France and Poland, and general efforts in other countries.

Buddhism in the United States

There were in 1916 twelve Japanese Buddhist temples reported in continental United States with 5,639 members, in buildings valued at $73,050. Amount reported for current expenses, repairs, benevolence, etc., was $24,252. The number of priests reported was thirty-four, of whom thirteen indicated an average salary of $831. The number of members under thirteen years was 223. Sunday-schools reported were seven as against nineteen ten years earlier, and Sunday-school attendance 209 compared to 913 in 1906.

The influence of Buddhism on white Americans is negligible, interest in the philosophy and the services being merely the fad of a very few. Japanese Buddhism for Japanese in America is, however, active and aggressive, able to command large resources from its adherents here and in Japan. Its general influence is un-American if not anti-American, tending to prevent education, assimilation and Americanization and to conserve loyalty to Japanese traditions of society and to the Japanese government.

A Study Outline on Latin America

"Latin America and Her Peoples," is the title of the study outline written by S. G. Inman and Frank K. Sanders and just published. It is designed for the use of classes in summer conferences and other mission study groups, and has already been adopted for such purposes by a number of the boards. It is not so much intended to give the student complete information concerning Latin America as it is to tell him what he should know and where to find it. Generous bibliographies are a feature, making it valuable for individual study as well as class work. Orders will be filled by the Committee on Cooperation in Latin America at the following prices: Paper covers, 32 pp., Single copies, postpaid, per copy 30 cents; ten or more to one address, postpaid, 25 cents; fifty or more to one address, not prepaid, 22 cents.

Dry Campaign in Mexico

The State of Chihuahua, in Mexico, was to have voted this month on a prohibition referendum. This has now been postponed until fall. The Protestant forces in Mexico are taking a prominent part in the campaign under the leadership of the Mexican Anti-Alcoholic League, with Rev. J. N. Pascoe, of Chihuahua City, leading the local temperance forces. Financial and other assistance is being rendered them by the church temperance boards through the Committee on Cooperation.

That "Broad Program" Booklet.

The present broad program of the American Baptist Home Mission Society is set forth in a booklet of which Dr. C. L. White is the author and which will soon be off the press. In this statement is presented with admirable clarity and brevity the relationship, after the recent historic adjustments, of the American Baptist Home Mission Society with State Conventions, City Mission Societies and all other organizations functioning as home missionary agencies. All desiring the latest information concerning the present work of the parent Home Mission Society may obtain this booklet free of charge by addressing Home Mission Rooms, 23 East 26th Street, New York City.

Drum's Dialogue.

Evangelist Charles R. Drum has the following ten commandments for evangelists.

"Thou shalt eliminate extraneous theological hobbies. They send people off on tangents.

"Thou shalt refrain from extreme emotional appeals. Evaporation follows.

"Thou shalt avoid destructive criticism of ministers. Strengthen the position of leaders.

"Thou shalt permit no promiscuous personal work in the audience. It is often cheap and harmful.

"Thou shalt keep greed from making a strenuous public pull for an offering. It takes attention from the main issue, gives a bad impression and weakens your spiritual power.

"Thou shalt be square. Plan no traps or schemes of coercion to secure results.

"Thou shalt develop laymen for definite service. This is very important.

"Thou shalt tell the truth. Statistics in the spiritual realm are deceptive. Therefore, publish none.

"Thou shalt not urge the Lord thy God to save sinners, but must inform sinners of a salvation already provided. Make clear that God loves and is now reconciled. The responsibility is on the evangelist and the sinner—the one to deliver, the other to believe the message.

"Thou shalt promote a strong conservation program and prevent a slump."

Philadelphia's "Foremost Citizen."

At the suggestion of the mayor of the city, Philadelphia recently paid a tribute to her foremost citizen, Hon. John Wanamaker, which deserves to be recorded as a triumphant chapter in a typically American biography. That this unique honor was conferred upon one of the world's foremost Christian laymen imparts a religious significance to an occasion that should illustrate many a sermon and Sunday School Lesson. Eight hundred representative Philadelphians, including the most distinguished citizens in commercial and professional life, gathered for an elaborate testimonial luncheon, on April twenty-six, in the Bellevue-Stratford Hotel. The mayor of Philadelphia presided, with the mayor of New York at his side; the Supreme Court of the State adjourned in order that the justices might be present; Cardinal Dougherty and Bishop Joseph F. Berry, of the Methodist Episcopal Church, were seated at the speakers' table.

International Uniform Lesson for July 10

SAUL THE PHARISEE

Acts. 7:54-8:3., 22:3-4., 26:4-10. Golden

Text: I Timothy, 1:15

By JOHN A. EARL

The Lesson Text

The lesson text is a selection of passages from the Acts of the Apostles designed to introduce the pupil to the motives and activities of Saul before his conversion. In the account of the martyrdom of Stephen we are introduced to Saul as a young man sympathetically looking on but not taking an active part in the death of Stephen. Evidently the blood of the martyr gave the young man, Saul a taste for more blood, and thereafter until his conversion we find him persecuting the followers of Jesus with an abandon worthy of a better cause.

The Lesson Taught

Saul, the Pharisee explains Saul, the persecutor. These are the two lines of thought running through the lesson.

Saul the Pharisee

The sect of the Pharisees was the orthodox, conservative, legalistic wing of the Jewish church. Religion with the Pharisees consisted in rendering strictest obedience to the written laws of God as supernaturally revealed in the Old Testament and in the commentaries written by the scribes. It was a conviction with them that the sect of the Pharisees was God's chosen instrument for the conservation of the true faith, and the true faith consisted in regarding the Jews as God's favored children and all pagans as outcasts; that the kingdom of God would be a Jewish state with Jerusalem as its capital and the Hebrew Messiah its king. To this faith the Pharisees were fanatically devoted. Hence when Jesus came contradicting the faith they put him to death. But shortly after his death a new sect arose claiming that Jesus was the rightful Messiah and that he had risen from the dead. Thousands were converted to the new faith and became active propagandists. The Pharisees were alarmed and infuriated. They did not share the judgment of Gamaliel who seemed to believe in an easy toleration. The preaching of Jesus as the Christ was blasphemy, and must be stamped out by the most relentless methods.

At this point Saul appears as the prime leader of the sect of the Pharisees in defending the faith against the disintegrating power of the new sect which accepted Jesus of Nazareth as the Son of God and the rightful Messiah. We must never lose sight of the fact that Saul's motive was religious and constructive from his point of view. As he testifies, he was zealous for God and verily thought he was doing God's service. He was sincerely conscientious but dead wrong. Saul is only one of many leaders who have appeared from age to age with the pharisaic spirit. We find the same spirit today in men of fine ability who become unfraternal in promoting the interests of brotherhood, or intemperate in advancing the cause of temperance, or belligerent in defending the principles of peace, or anti-Christian in extending the kingdom of Christ. There is a world of difference between the spirit of Stephen and the spirit of Saul. Stephen was just as zealous as Saul, but Stephen's zeal was gracious, brotherly, evangelistic. Christian. Saul's zeal on the contrary was fiery, intolerant, merciless, Pharisaic. Stephen was spiritual, Saul was legal; Stephen was a Christian, Saul was a Pharisee.

Saul the Persecutor

To the day of his death Paul never ceased to mourn over the fact that he had persecuted the church of God and wasted it. The golden text of our lesson is a part of Paul's reminiscences when he reviewed his early manhood as a persecutor, blasphemer and injurious. He made all the explanations of it possible saying he did it ignorantly in unbelief with all good conscience; but in spite of all the explanations it wounded Paul to the quick to think that he had ever so far misinterpreted God as to believe that he could be pleased with a spirit and service expressed in bigotry and cruelty and murder. One in reading the brief but vivid accounts of Saul the persecutor is pained to think that a man of his powers would ever so far lose himself in a religious mania as to hunt down innocent and defenceless people and deliver them to prison and to death. But the edge is somewhat taken off the pain by remembering the times in which Saul lived, the intolerant sect in which he had been brought up, and the temperament of the man himself. Religious liberty was a thing unknown in the days of Saul of Tarsus. In fact religious liberty is a very recent fact of history, and there are portions of the world today where religious liberty is a very feeble and struggling thing. And in countries like our own there are some people who seem to think that religious liberty is a thing of very doubtful value. There are still intolerant sects like the Pharisees who if they could, would destroy all other sects; and there are men with the temperament of Saul who if unrestrained by law and society would make life a burden for all who did not agree with them.

Persecution is never right. It has been tried repeatedly and failed as a method in advancing the cause which it sought to defend. The method of Jesus is the only way. When the disciples wanted to bring fire from heaven to consume the inhospitable village of the Samaritans, Jesus said, "Ye know not what spirit ye are of; for the Son of Man came to save men's lives, not to destroy them." Saul persecuted, but Paul never persecuted. Only twice in his writings the old spirit seems to revive; once in Galatians, 5:12 and once in II Timothy, 4:14. On the whole Paul lived in the spirit of Romans, 12:17-21.

The Worth of Friendliness

By CHARLES L. WHITE

The cultivation of friendliness is imperatively needed. One sees occasionally what should be avoided when a conductor on an eastern railroad treats the immigrants rudely. They have paid their fare, and the only word in English they know is the name of the city to which they are journeying. Kindness to workmen and to strangers, and the gentle courtesies of life shown in cars and on the streets, in elevators, offices, and schools, create an atmosphere that corrects a man's selfish tendencies and gives a sense of justice to all human relations.

The Christian who always has the milk of human kindness in his soul will cultivate a true friendliness with all whom he meets. He need not speak to strangers to make them feel its presence in his life. Real friendliness radiates invisibly from him, and its heat rays melt cold hearts and warm the benumbed and helpless hands of discouraged souls. To meet anger with calmness and unjust words with a smile, to befriend the helpless, to be gentle with the aged, to be thoughtful of the infirm and unfortunate people, to be attentive to little children, to be a strong defender of the depressed, and to be sympathetic with defective, delinquent and dependent people are some of the secrets of a far-reaching life.

Responsible to the Unseen

"EVERY Christian man is responsible for every other man. But he is responsible most of all for those he sees most of all." Hubert Carlton preached a strong sermon in these two dozen words. Most Christians endorse the principle suggested, but destroy it by inaction. Why not make the principle dynamic by trying to act upon it? It will become charged with meaning when it is connected up with actual persons. Today Jesus needs friends who are so passionately in love with him that they count it a great privilege to introduce others to the circle of His friendship. Before a man can have a Christian message he must have a Christian experience. But he must venture out and witness to the experience he has before it can become richer and more productive.

—Fred S. Goodman.

A Summer Christmas Tree A MIDSUMMER NIGHT'S DREAM

Try this pageant.

Needs only somebody's lawn, a pine tree, and an invited audience.

(Scene opens on a lawn, audience facing a pine tree, as yet undecorated. Enter Miss Mary Smith and Mr. Nicholas Jones, carrying boxes of Christmas tree trimmings.)

NICHOLAS (Sets down boxes, takes off straw hat and mops brow)—Phew!

MARY (Linking her arm in his)—Now that you've seen it, Nicholas Jones, isn't it a perfectly adorable little tree? Imagine me, wondering and wondering what kind of a birthday party to give my sister's blasé little twins, when all of a sudden every blessed needle on my little pine tree reared itself up on end and shouted: "Consider me, madam, don't I suggest anything?" "Ah ha!" said I to myself, "a summer Christmas tree, the very thing!" So I sent out little red stockings for invitations, and I feel in my bones it will be a very novel party. Nick, you brought a red suit and all the fixings to be Santa Claus, didn't you, dear?

NICHOLAS (Mops his brow again)—Yes, darling child, but I'm not a bit keen for the part—too hot! And I'll be mighty awkward! You'll be afraid to marry me after this, Miss Smith.

MARY (laughing)—Oh no, I won't! You'll be simply ravishing done up in cotton wool whiskers. Run along in the house this minute and rig up, while I trim the tree. Here comes Celeste to help me. Hurry, Nick! (He returns to the house to dress as Santa Claus.) Celeste, there isn't a moment to lose in getting this tree decorated.

CELESTE (in maid's uniform)—Yes, mademoiselle, ze children in ze neighborhood have so leetle a walk to ze party! Zey will come queeck, I fear! (Both trim tree hastily with tinsel, balls, strings of pop corn, etc. Candle holders should have been placed on tree before audience arrives.)

MARY (while trimming)—I love every one of my neighbors' children, I'm so glad they're all such nice families near us. I didn't have to leave out a single neighbor!

CELESTE—Ze very best neighborhood in town, mademoiselle, es it not so? (MARY and CELESTE—Chatter together as they trim tree. Then CELESTE hurries back to house.)

MARY (Stands looking at tree, hands clasped in delight)—Oh, I love you, little summer Christmas tree! And all my little neighbors will love you, too. But I'm dreadfully tired. (Looks at wrist watch) I'll have just time to flop down and rest five minutes! (Flings herself into a wicker chair nearby; before settling comfortably looks over shoulder at the tree)—You dear little Christmassy pine tree! I can almost hear the Christmas angels singing (yawns), almost—but not quite—(Settles in chair and sleeps).

This department is conducted by Miss Margaret T. Applegarth. Communications to her may be addressed in care of THE BAPTIST.

ANGEL CHORUS (At least six in chorus; each angel draped in two white sheets, also white tarlatan wings, tinsel fillet in hair, starts from house singing to tune, "Vox Angelica")

1. Hark, hark, my soul! Angelic songs are swelling
O'er earth's green fields, and ocean's wave-beat shore;
How sweet the truth those blessed strains are telling
Of that new life when sin shall be no more.

(Chorus) Angels of Jesus, Angels of light,
Singing to welcome the pilgrims of the night!

Singing to welcome the pilgrims, the pilgrims of the night.

PILGRIMS OF THE NIGHT (Start from behind audience and march very, very slowly forward to meet the angel chorus which stands before Christmas tree, singing second and third stanzas. All in this group of sixteen pilgrims should have black material arranged, shawl-fashion, over their heads and shoulders to cover as far as possible their costumes which are appropriate to the race each represents: China and Japan, India and Burma, Africa and Mexico, American Indians and Alaskans. For each country listed there should be both a mother and a child about eight years old.)

ANGEL CHORUS (sings)—

2. Onward we go, for still we hear them singing,
"Come weary souls, for Jesus bids you come;"

And through the dark, its echoes sweetly ringing,

The music of the gospel leads us home. (Chorus)

3. Far, far away, like bells at evening pealing

The voice of Jesus sounds o'er land and sea,

And weary souls by thousands meekly stealing

King Shepherd turn their weary steps to Thee. (Chorus)

PILGRIMS (Have now reached ANGEL CHORUS, who separate and while singing fourth stanza one angel should lead Chinese and Japanese pilgrims off to the west corner of the lawn; a second angel should lead Indian and Burman pilgrims to the east corner of lawn; third angel escorts Africans and Mexicans, south; fourth angel escorts American Indians and Alaskans, north; the pilgrims joining in singing)—

4. Angels, sing on! your faithful watches keeping;

Sing us sweet fragments of the songs above;

Till morning's joy shall end the night of weeping

And life's long shadows ends in cloudless love. (Chorus)

(One of the two ANGELS now remaining by the tree walks over to Mary's chair and leaning over sings—or repeats—one stanza of "Joy to the World, the Lord Has Come.")

SECOND ANGEL—Ah, that's it, joy to the world! But Mary Smith plans only for her own neighborhood.

FIRST ANGEL, (nodding)—But she is even now having a midsummer night's dream! (Broods over her throughout the next scene.)

SANTA CLAUS—Well, I see Mary has engaged a Christmas angel for her party, too.

ANGEL—She did not really ask me to come, Nicholas Jones, but can there be a Christmas party without the true Spirit of Christmas? So here I am.

SANTA CLAUS (slapping his hands cheerfully)—Just so, there you are! And I hope you'll see me through this business. What's my most important duty, anyhow? (Begins unpacking his toys, placing them around Christmas tree.)

ANGEL—To bring joy to the world.

SANTA CLAUS—Yes; ye-es, of course. But what else?

ANGEL—Well, it's never seemed to me you ought to skip a single child. Yet you generally do, you skip millions of children who need Christmas the most.

SANTA CLAUS (standing up and pointing his finger at her)—See here, don't you go blaming me! I'm only a Santa Claus pro tem. I'm not the real thing, you know.

ANGEL (shaking her head)—Oh yes, you are! Every man with two hands and a heart and a pocketbook ought to be a Santa Claus. Only, some of them never realize this, owing to sleeping wives and sweethearts (Points to MARY.)

SANTA CLAUS (Goes over to look at MARY)—Poor girl, she's all tired out getting things ready for her small neighbors. (Walks back to angel, finger on lip, and they both unpack toys from his pack.)

CHILDREN (Enter in party dresses, dancing across the lawn)—There's Santa Claus! Hello, Santa Claus! (All of them at once)—What have you got in your pack for us? (Hold out hands.)

SANTA CLAUS, (turning, shakes hands with them)—Want a present, do you? Well, here's a doll for you, Geraldine.

GERALDINE (Takes doll and examines it)—But Santa Claus, it's got a sawdust body and a cotton dress. I've got a lots better doll than this at home! You take it, Martha.

MARTHA (shaking her head over doll)—I've got a doll with real hair, Santa Claus, a great big doll that opens and shuts its eyes.

SANTA CLAUS (Takes back the doll and says to angel)—Well, what do you know about that? How about toy dishes, Geraldine and Martha? Here are some pretty oens!

GERALDINE and MARTHA (clasping their hands behind them)—But we've got lots of toy dishes already.

SANTA CLAUS: You've got everything there is to have, you spoiled darlings. Well, let's try the boys.

SANTA and ANGEL (Hand out trains of cars, horns, toy furniture, etc., but each boy and each girl takes a present listlessly.)

BOYS and GIRLS (Each saying in various ways)—I've got one just like that at home already.

SANTA CLAUS (exasperated)—Well, this is a pretty fix! What on earth shall I do, good angel?

ANGEL—Oh, there's plenty to be done on earth, poor Santa Claus. Why don't you call your reindeer and bring joy to the world?

SANTA CLAUS (Claps his hand to his forehead)—My reindeer! What do you mean—rein-deer?

ANGEL—Ah! (Thinks a moment, then says to children standing around her)—Of course in summer he has to have a very different kind of reindeer, doesn't he? (Children nod) And so I'm going to choose four of you to be his summer helpers,—you, and you, and you, (Reaches in Santa Claus' pack and takes out four mackintoshes, the kind with little hoods, which the four children put on. Then she brings out of the pack four small umbrellas, with small bells fastened to their points. On one umbrella is a large white "E," on another "W," a third "S," a fourth "N." Opening each umbrella, she says)—Who will go north? Who south? Who east? Who west? Then here is your equipment. You are now Santa Claus' Rain-Dears, spelled differently in summer, of course—R-A-I-N - D-E-A-R-S!

GERALDINE—But is there going to be a shower?

SANTA CLAUS—Of course! A Christmas shower!

ALL THE CHILDREN (hopping up and down, clapping hands)—Oh goody! Goody! Isn't this the nicest party? What do we do next?

ANGEL—Rain-Dears, and you other dears, too, it's high time you learned that there are thousands upon thousands of children all over the world who have never had a single Christmas present, or heard a single Christmas carol, or lighted a single Christmas candle, or seen a single Christmas tree. So we're sending you out to bring joy to the world that is waiting in darkness—east, west, north, south. For surely a Christmas tree isn't only for your own small neighborhood, is it?

CHILDREN (Wag heads energetically)—No! Oh, no! Of course not!

ANGEL—Then before you go let's form a friendship circle around our little tree and tell it how we feel.

CHILDREN (Laying Rain-Deer umbrellas on grass, open, stand with ANGEL and SANTA CLAUS in a circle around tree, sing this motion song to the time of "Maryland, My Maryland")—

Are all your presents meant for me,
(point to presents . . . then to self)
Christmas tree? O Christmas tree?

Ah no, I hear you now suggest:
(shake head . . . hold ear, to listen)
Search for children east and west,

(point left, right)
And north and south, where'er they live, (point front, back)
To them these presents you shall give!

(point to presents)
Black, brown, and yellow, white and red (rub cheeks)
On them my candlelight be shed!

(flicker fingers up and down)
THE FOUR RAIN-DEARS (Are now sent out by the ANGEL and SANTA CLAUS to the four point of the compass around the lawn, where the PILGRIMS of the night are waiting, wrapped in darkness.)

RAIN-DEAR WITH "E" UMBRELLA (Assisted by the ANGEL waiting with the east group, removes black covering from Hindu and Burman children—not from mothers, however—and leads them across lawn to the tree, where the remaining "party" children stand beside SANTA CLAUS, each laden with gifts to hand the approaching foreigners, whom the CHRISTMAS TREE ANGEL goes forward to meet in order that she may help them sing to the tune of "Marching Through Georgia")

FOREIGNERS—
From India comes the dear brown child,
From Burma and Assam,
The Christmas spirit they will greet
As every small child can;
We beg you give your gifts complete
To them, in Jesus' name,
While we are marching to meet you.

(Those carrying gifts hand them to the foreigners who bow profusely, while all sing the chorus)—

Oh give, oh give!
Yes, give in Jesus name,
Oh give, oh give!

And start the candle flame
To light the Christmas trees around
The whole, wide, waiting earth—
While we are marching to meet you.

RAIN-DEAR WITH "W" UMBRELLA (Assisted by ANGEL with west Pilgrims, removes black covering from Chinese and Japanese children, who next march toward tree, to be met by CHRISTMAS TREE ANGEL as they sing)—

From China comes the yellow child,
And also from Japan,
The Christmas spirit they will greet
As every small child can,
We beg you give your gifts complete
To them, in Jesus' name,
While we are marching to greet you.

SANTA CLAUS and "PARTY" CHILDREN (Hand out gifts to foreigners, who bow profusely, as all sing chorus: "oh give! Oh give!" as above.)

RAIN-DEAR WITH "S" UMBRELLA (Does same as other Rain-Dears have done, and brings forward Southern CHILDREN,—African and Mexican, to meet angel and sing)—

This black child is an African,
This brown one, Mexican,
The Christmas spirit they will greet,"
(etc., etc., as in former stanzas.)

SANTA CLAUS and CHILDREN (Present toys, they bow, all singing chorus as given above.)

RAIN-DEAR WITH "N" UMBRELLA (In like fashion brings forward north group of American Indian and Alaskan CHILDREN singing)—

The red child is an Indian,
Also an Alaskan,
The Christmas spirit they will greet, (etc., etc.)

SANTA CLAUS and CHILDREN (Present toys to them, they bow, all singing chorus as given above.)

THE FOUR ANGELS (East, West, North, South, now lead forward the MOTHERS of the nations, still "groping in darkness."

Whereupon the CHILDREN belonging to each group run to meet their MOTHERS holding out the toys they have received, calling: "Oh look, mother! See, a Christmas present!" This is to happen simultaneously. In order to look, each MOTHER must lift her black shroud, and the ANGELS instantly draw them softly off their shoulders dropping them on the ground, while the MOTHERS and CHILDREN draw near the tree. When all are grouped in place, THE ANGEL who has been quietly guarding MARY'S dream now comes over and holds up a candle, speaks)—

ANGEL—And Jesus said, I am the light of the world. (Lights her candle and places it in a holder already in place on an accessible branch of tree.)

HINDU MOTHER (Walks over and lights her unlighted candle by that first candle, as she says)—"That was the true light that lighteth every man that cometh into the world." (Places candle in a holder on tree.)

BURMAN MOTHER (Lighting her candle, says)—"But men loved darkness rather than light because their deeds were evil." (Places candle on tree.)

AFRICAN MOTHER (Lighting her candle)—"The people that sit in darkness have seen a great light." (Places candle on tree.)

MEXICAN MOTHER—"Neither do men light a candle and put it under a bushel, but on a lampstand, and it giveth light unto all that are in the house." (Candle on tree.)

CHINESE MOTHER—"The entrance of thy word giveth light, it giveth understanding unto the simple." (Candle on tree.)

JAPANESE MOTHER—"Thy word is a lamp unto my feet, and a light unto my path." (Puts lighted candle in holder on tree.)

INDIAN MOTHER—"The spirit of man is the candle of the Lord." (Puts candle on tree.)

ALASKAN MOTHER—"For God, who commanded the light to shine out of darkness, hath shined in our hearts, to give the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ." (Places candle on tree.)

Young People's Work

Topic, for July 10.

WHAT IS "OUR REASONABLE SERVICE?"
Romans 12:1-8.

"I plead with you therefore, brethren, by the compassions of God, to present all your faculties to Him as a living and holy sacrifice, acceptable to Him. This with you will be an act of reasonable worship."

1. A measure of respectability. In other words, there are a lot of folks in the world who take their Christianity just seriously enough to be respectable. It is not how much they can do for the church and the kingdom, but how little they can do and hold their social standards. Such individuals should read again and again Romans 12:1 which, according to Paul, should be the minimum program for a life that is Christian.

2. A complete presentation. Your life! Not just a part of it! Away with the old idea of dividing the life of the Christian into the sacred and the secular. Such a division has a disastrous effect on morals. If a man is a Christian, he should be one through and through, in season, out of season, on Monday as well as on Sunday. A "parlor" religion only will not get one very far. Religion must reach out into every relationship of life, and sanctify those relationships. If one is a Christian, his whole life belongs to the Lord.

3. The positive thing. There is something more in religion than the keeping of the ten commandments. To be sure, we must keep them. But, they are principally don'ts. Christianity is more than a negative thing. It has the positive "do." The pious sort of a Christian these days who sits around and sings, doing but little work for fear that it will interfere with his consecration, will soon find himself out of sight in the great kingdom procession.

4. Progressive living. We hesitate to launch out for fear of making mistakes. Well, the world is rather afraid of the fellow who never makes mistakes. Even though mistakes are made, it is well worth the try. Failing to pass a medical examination for something on which he felt his life depended, Huxley turned to the next thing and became the great scientist. He wrote: "It does not matter how many tumbles you have in life, so long as you do not get dirty when you tumble. It is only the people who have to stop and be washed who must lose the race."

5. The big world outside. Paul was seeking in his day to meet the needs of humanity. Religiously, one's first task is to give himself. That's just what Paul is pleading for in this wonderful chapter. "I plead with you, therefore, . . . to present all your faculties," the faculty to smile, to study, to earn money, to work, to lead—all of them. For in the words of Annie Johnson Flint:

"Christ has no hands but our hands
To do His work today;
He has no feet but our feet,
To lead men in His way;
He has no tongues but our tongues,
To tell men how He died;
He has no help but our help,
To bring them to His side.
We are the only Bible
The careless world will read,
We are the sinner's gospel,
We are the scoffer's creed;
We are the Lord's last message,
Given in deed and word;
What if the type is crooked?
What if the print is blurred?
What if our hands are busy
With other works than His?
What if our tongues are speaking
Where sin's allurements is?
Of things His lips would spurn?
How can we hope to help Him
And hasten His return?"

Young People in Action

Get Forty-four in Membership Campaign—Raise Money for Piano—Four Enlist for Life Service—See What Pipestone Carried Home.

Claim Street, Aurora, Ill., installs two Duck Ponds.

The Claim Street B. Y. P. U. of Aurora, Ill., has just finished a six weeks campaign in the form of a contest with results that were far above our expectations. This campaign was put forth to enlarge our membership and also to instill in the hearts of the young people who attended the meetings, the real necessity of Christianity to youth.

The winning team was given a banquet April 11. About eighty young people were present at the banquet, which was in the form of a park picnic. The church parlors were decorated to represent a park. It was a perfect substitute for a park with its trees, teeter-totters, benches. Two duck ponds were the interest of the evening.

The results of the campaign were forty-four new members, bringing our membership up to about ninety, an average in attendance of sixty, formerly twenty-five, and on the last evening of the campaign we realized over twenty dollars in collection and dues, making a total for the contest of $66. Twenty-five of this was paid to the church for repairs on the roof. This campaign also started the young people in the habit of attending the different meetings of the church, and taking an active part in general.

Our new pastor, Rev. J. R. Humphries, is much enthused by the good results, and expects the church to benefit greatly by it.

Lester Stearnes, the B. Y. P. U. president, had charge of the campaign and is well pleased with the results, and hopes to continue the good work.

Madera, Cal., is Working the Group System

The Madera B. Y. P. U. recently voted to revise its constitution and to organize, in addition to the original senior society, high school and junior branches.

A rousing social was enjoyed one evening during the following week, and others will be planned from time to time. The Standard of Excellence has been adopted, and a box social is contemplated at some date in the near future, the proceeds to be applied on the church piano fund. It is earnestly hoped that several of the young people will be able to attend the Asilomar summer assembly.

The group system is being worked out in the devotional meetings, and the pastor, Rev. E. R. Clevenger, visits the young people for a few minutes each Sunday evening with a message along the line of the lesson.

Central (Minn.) Association Held a Rousing Affair

One of the most inspiring, helpful and well attended conventions in the history of the Central Association B. Y. P. U. of Minnesota was held recently at Owatonna. It was a success from start to finish, the young people being especially treated with the addresses by Dr. F. A. Agar of New York and further enlightening on missionary affairs by Rev. R. N. Crawford, missionary to Burma, and Miss Lucy Mattson, missionary to Alaska. On the last day four young people responded to the call for definite life service.

The association was also rewarded by having with us during the entire sessions, Rev. A. J. Hansen, the new state director of religious education for Minnesota, who expressed his desire for cooperation with the B. Y. P. U. in Minnesota.

Fred Ebersole, Secretary.

Minnesota Valley Association Rallies at Mankato

The fourth annual rally of the Minnesota Valley B. Y. P. U. met at the First Baptist Church of Mankato.

Our rally was short but just crowded full of good things. Rev. E. H. Rasmussen, Dr. Hagstrom of Bethel Academy, Robert Thompson, transportation manager of Minnesota, and the president of Central Association were among our visitors.

Eight of the societies in this Association were represented. Pipestone carried home the banner for best attendance at the rally and Worthington received the standard of excellence banner.

Next year we are invited to Pipestone the second week in June, when we expect to have a bigger, better and longer rally.

Mrs. Chas. H. Stanton, Secretary.

Newton Features

The chief feature of the Newton Anniversaries was the weather. It was the June article at its best, accompanied by all the seasonal beauties. Another feature was the unusual success of Alumni Day. It was a happy thought to extend the dinner so as to include the entire membership of the Boston Ministers' Conference. Consequently a very strong company of leaders faced Dr. W. W. Bustard when he discoursed so ably on the "Deity of Our Lord." You might say that this note, with its inevitable practical implications, became the theme of the entire commencement. It gave a rich variety to all the utterances both of stated speakers and of graduates. One more outstanding feature of the week was the constantly expressed and unqualified confidence in the Christian and Baptist solidarity of the Seminary. No room was left for doubt on that point. Uncalled for suspicion against some of our seminaries has had one happy result: it has done more to kindle interest in them, and to rally alumni and friends to their side, than anything that has happened within the writer's recollection. It really looks as if Baptist schools would continue to train Baptist leaders. "And why not?" said Cebes.

A Culminating Conference

That was the nature of the closing meeting for the season of our Ministers' Conference. In attendance and in denominational interest and enthusiasm, we have had nothing better. In the necessary and regretted absence of Dr. Franklin, Secretary W. B. Lippard was present, very happily to feature present accomplishments and prospects in our foreign mission work, and to present the three speakers of the morning. They were Dr. J. H. Rushbrooke of London, Rev. J. A. Ohrn, and Professor Arnold T. Ohrn, father and son, both of Norway. Dr. Rushbrooke as Baptist Commissioner for Europe really represented the Baptists of the world, and made us feel our kinship especially with the suffering Baptists in the widespread war devastation that spread over central and southern Europe. We realized the want and wretchedness that war has entailed upon our Baptist people, and that in the general distress it has whetted the edge of an age-long intolerance. It was a welcome assurance that American and English Baptists were mightily helping to relieve distress, promote tolerance, and abolish persecution.

The Norwegian Baptists

It was good to hear from Baptist Norway. Though numerically weak, they are a lusty folk. Professor Ohrn told us how they are choosing and training their own leaders, and afforded us a fine specimen in himself. Though disclaiming adequate facility in English utterance, he charmed us with his chaste and sincere speech.

Rev. J. A. Ohrn, the father, ranged over the wider field of Norway evangelization, being the secretary for Baptist missions in the whole country. We were proud of these hearty, wholesome, and apostolical messengers. They seem definite and undiluted, fired by a great task, and bent upon accomplishing it.

The meeting was a befitting close to a succession of strong and inspiring gatherings. The ministers have come to look, as they gather, as if they expected something good. And they get it.

A Farewell

Just after the above meeting, there was a gathering at the City Club to give Dr. A. A. Hobson a good send-off to Milwaukee. President Dyas of the conference was toastmaster. It was all in fine spirit, full of brotherly appreciation and confidence. Drs. Watson, Greul, English, Arbuckle, and Rosselle, were the speakers, and with kindly eyes they looked over the aforetime shepherd, and fitted him into the First Church, Milwaukee. Dr. Hobson's answer to our "arguments" was modest, grateful, hopeful, and sincere. Boston is great on contributions to the rest of the world.

Cutting a Swath

We have a brand of young minister, who after he carries a big church and leads it to all of its legitimate achievements seems to cry, "More!" He finds the big universities that are so near at hand so enticing that he gets on the trail of a degree, and gives the mornings and much of the nights to hunt it down. Some of these young ministerial bloods go to Harvard, some to Boston University, and some to Newton. For example, Rev. Chellis V. Smith of First Church, Somerville, while doing about everything for his church and people that they could want done, has handsomely won the degree of Master of Religious Education at Boston University, with high commendation. Having struck the pace, already he sniffs a Ph.D. in the distance. He will arrive; and others also, whose success will compel mention.

Dr. Myers' Farewell

Sunday, June 12, was a great day at Tremont Temple, and a sad one also. It closed a pastorate that was notable, and nothing short of it. Unmistakably Dr. Myers has bound to himself a host of people who much regret his leaving the Temple pulpit and who will keenly regret their loss of his leadership in the activities of the great church. Everything was prosperous and pleasant. He seemed completely to meet every demand and every expectation. Always has the Temple been a unique and attractive center to throngs of people from everywhere about the city. After so successful a leadership the problem of change will not be easy. But, are there any indispensable men? Does not the last one seem the best? And is there not still another in the making and ready to come? Meanwhile Associate Pastors Handel and Lockrow, with their pastoral hearts, will keep the great flock rounded up, while the scrutineers of the great church are out after a chief shepherd.

Sunny Southern California

BY FRANK DURHAM

Put an extra touch of freshness in the air; put a beautiful meeting-house shipshape; set some hundreds of hearts beating to one high purpose; set before them a four-days' program fitted to inform and cheer and challenge; let all move forward under the direction of those who themselves know how to be directed,—these are the parts which, combined in one picture, might represent the almost ideal state convention of Southern California Baptists, held recently with the First Church of Riverside. Of course we shall yet have better conventions; but if a thing is successful when it accomplishes what it was intended to accomplish, then this was a successful convention.

The Riverside Church, Rev. Richard E. Day, pastor, had anticipated our every need in gracious ways we shall not easily forget. It is a church with a fine record, and never had a better outlook for splendid work than today. The convention met with this church in 1910, and at that time the Baptists of Southern California numbered 14,000; today they number 27,000. In that year there were 845 baptisms. This year there have been 2,125 baptisms, and 4,225 received by letter, a total of 6,350 received during the year. Ten years ago the churches gave for all purposes $325,000; this year the total is $1,054,047, the items being as follows: Church expenses, $399,269; benevolence, $440,677; improvements, $214,100. Promotion Director Davies reports that there has passed through his office a total of $453,829.00 this year as compared with $165,007.00 last year, an increase of nearly 300 per cent.

A recent letter contained a report of baptisms from a number of our churches for a part of the year, but the following statement may be of interest (The first figure indicates the number of baptisms during the year, the second figure the number received by letter): Santa Barbara, 78; 56. San Diego First, 48; 134. Logan Heights (San Diego), 51; 25. Riverside, 52; 48. Santa Ana, 62; 123. San Bernardino, 54; 57. Covina, 42; 101. Bakersfield, 30; 66. Pomona, 46; 57. Redlands, 36; 121. San Pedro, 65; 38. Long Beach, 38; 217. Hollywood, 26; 64. South Park (Los Angeles), 54; 113. Lincoln Heights (L. A.), 47; 51. First (L. A.), 100; 488. Temple (L. A.), 169; 511. Many other churches have good reports, but they cannot be given here.

There was a persistent note of gladness and hopefulness in the convention, yet there was no evidence that we have become satisfied with our deeds. Again and again there were panoramic views of the great things that call. It was not conducive to self-complacency when each little window which the program opened enabled one to see the beckonings on the horizon. Yonder is the "Lure of the Desert", and real men are wanted. Here is the "Urge of the Oil Fields", and where five hundred millions of dollars have been invested in oil, there must be the investment of lives as well. The "Call of the City" is heard, and it is the call of 51 per cent of our population. Our 20,000 men in the navy and training camps may not be forgotten since the war is over, but, so far, we have sent but one man among them. Then our encouraging, but altogether inadequate force among the Spanish-speaking people, the Russians, the Italians, Japanese and others is an appeal that must be met here at home. On another afternoon we had a broad view of the educational work which comprehends the whole period of human life from the cradle to the university and beyond, and undertakes to pour the white light of Christ's teaching along the path of every individual, while it lights up the road in which the now discordant social groups must finally learn to walk together in peace. There was an urge in this educational review, and a hundred churches could all but hear a low voice calling, "Come up higher, come up higher." When, beyond all this, the convention faced the world task—a world that awaits a Christian reconstruction—there was a little disposition to settle down in smug content because we had raised over $1,000,000 and seen over 2,000 baptisms in a year. The fact is that if one had been able accurately to gauge these Christian men and women when they were thus fully awake (not excited, but awake), one would have found that they are most deeply concerned for the things that are deepest in the heart of Christ. The convention was pretty well beyond the question of policies as such, or particular interpretations as an issue. These have their place, but they seemed comparatively irrelevant, and were recognized as not even of secondary importance. Our churches have several shades of belief, but they move easily and harmoniously together in the great things. Their deeper convictions are that missions is the work of the church, that disbelief in missions is equal to disbelief in Christ, that Christ's message is easily translatable into life, and that it is of more importance to live his message than to be able to state it in doctrinal terms. Our people would probably agree that our Christianity needs Christianizing, both in doctrine and in life, and that the best way to unify any divergent views is to be busy about the great things that Christ left to be done.

The special speaker this year was Dr. O. P. Gifford who brought an illuminating series of addresses.

Our convention is hopefully facing the next year under the leadership of Dr. W. F. Harper, executive secretary and director of evangelism, Dr. J. D. Springston, educational director, and Dr. F. G. Davies, promotion director. The newly-elected president of the convention is Mr. J. H. Miller of Los Angeles.

Young People's Encampment

The young people of Southern California are to have two encampments. One will be held at Switzer's Camp, north of Pasadena, July 8-18; the other will be held near San Diego.

Summer School of Missions

The thirteenth annual session of the Summer School of Missions was held in Los Angeles, May 29-June 3. This is interdenominational but the Baptists share largely in it, as is indicated by the fact that in an enrollment of 1500 there were 425 from our Baptist churches. Mrs. A. W. Rider, was president and had much to do in making it a marked success. Among the outside speakers and teachers was Mrs. Helen Barrett Montgomery. By this intensive course of five days training these women will be fitted to go to their several churches and conduct the courses in our study books on missions. The volume of missionary information through the circulation of missionary books and leaflets this year reached high water mark. Those who know best call the school a great success. Los Angeles.

Baptists at the C. E. World Convention

Baptist Young People at the C. E. Convention in New York will have a chance to hear some of their denominational leaders and know the Baptist program for young people. The program committee of the convention has assigned a place on the program for denominational conferences. The Baptists will have their conference in the Madison Avenue Baptist Church on Friday July 8th at 9 A. M. It will be in charge of Milton M. McGorrell, director of young people's work for the American Baptist Publication Society. Attendance at the denominational conference is requested of delegates who are to obtain the convention certificate.

In addition to the conference the Baptist young people are to have a fellowship luncheon at noon on Friday in the Madison Avenue Baptist Church. This will be a meeting of good fellowship and inspiration. Dr. C. Wallace Petty, Pastor of the Mt. Morris Baptist Church of New York City will give the address. Dr. Petty is known throughout the country as one of our leading Baptist speakers. He will have a real message for the young people. Attendance at the luncheon is limited to the capacity of the church so that those who are sure of attending should write for ticket reservation to Milton M. McGorrell, 1701 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

Baptist Speakers at Northfield.

The Northfield gatherings have always been interdenominational in character. Most of the Protestant communions have been represented in years past by their strongest men. Many will be represented so this coming season.

Among the Baptist preachers are many widely known names. Rev. J. East Harrison, head of the department of English Bible at Mount Hermon School, although holding no pastorate since he came from Australia, will be heard during the summer at The Northfield Hotel and on the conference platform. Dr. G. Campbell Morgan will conduct a daily Bible class at the young women's conference, June 24-July 1, on the study of the four gospels under the title, "The Christ of History." At the interdenominational women's home mission summer school, July 5-11, our communion will have a large share, represented by leaders and missionaries of our board. Mrs. Helen Barrett Montgomery will teach the text-book for the year, "The Kingdom and the Nations," at the summer school for women's foreign missionary societies, July 12-19. Mrs. E. C. Applegate, whose address is 575 Blue Hill Ave., Boston, Mass. is making plans for the accommodation of a large number of Baptist girls in Camp Salaam for the Foreign Missionary, but as membership in the camp is limited, those who desire to join the camp should make applications at once. Camp Sagacawea, the Baptist camp of the home mission summer school is under the leadership of Miss Edith E. Wing, 72 Barnett St., New Haven, Conn.

At the general conference, July 30-August 14, our pulpit contributes Dr. Cornelius Woelfkin, Pastor of the Fifth Avenue Church, New York City, and Dr. Len G. Broughton, of Richmond, Va. After a much regretted absence of some years, Dr. F. B. Meyer of London returns to the Northfield platform this year.

The other gatherings meeting at Northfield are the summer school of religious education, July 21-28, and the Massachusetts C. E. institute, which convenes for one week at the close of the general conference.

This summer also sees the celebration of the fortieth anniversary of the founding of Mount Hermon School for boys, at which Rev. Charles A. Brooks, Hermon '93, secretary of the Baptist Home Mission Society, will deliver the anniversary sermon. Dr. Wilfred W. Fry, a Mount Hermon alumnus prominent in Baptist activities in Philadelphia, is to speak at this time. Mr. Wm. Ayer McKinney of Chicago, president of the alumni association, will preside.

Blessings Come from Campaign In Wisconsin

That the New World Movement campaign, like the quality of mercy in Shakespeare's famous lines, is "twice blessed," bringing as much good to those who are giving in it as to those who are receiving, is being proved once more in the state of Wisconsin, according to a recent letter received by Miss Elsie P. Kappen of Milwaukee. Those who are still faint-hearted may gain courage from some of the instances of rich reward that she cites.

"The Delavan church has received great spiritual blessings," she says. "Prayer meeting attendance is no problem at all. The midweek meetings are an inspiration. Forty-eight have been received by baptism. This pastor has also in mind a plan of country school evangelism through the country, in addition to the large activity of his own church. The church supports Dr. Topping as its foreign pastor. In the budget of the church is included the expenses of the pastor and wife to the Northern Baptist convention. It has several young people planning for mission service.

"In this church also there are two women who support themselves by taking in washings and who are giving a dollar per week to the New World Movement, and matching it by a like gift for current expenses.

"Two weeks ago the church at Lake Geneva held its half-yearly business meeting, and reported the finest financial standing in its history. Spiritual blessings have attended also, for there have been many baptisms, and two of the young members are decided on missionary life service. This was the first church to go over the top. The pastor's salary is increased $200.

"The church in Darien, in the same association, with a total membership (including non-resident) of forty-eight, reported that, largely owing to the new spirit growing out of the New World

Movement, it has less trouble now raising the entire budget than it used to have in raising $500 or $600. Pledges on the quota of the church amounted to $3100. The current expense budget is $1365. In addition a fund of $700 has been raised for improvement, which before the campaign was deemed impossible. A new roof, new steps, furnace repaired, entire church redecorated, and the outside painted are the improvements now in progress. The church now has a real finance committee that is looking toward the future. It had no evening service, but now has one which has trebled in a years time; the morning service has almost doubled. There was no B. Y. P. U. The organization now has an average attendance of 25 to 30. The men's Bible class has grown from four to fourteen. A newly organized boy's class has grown from eight to twenty-one. The church has a fine workers' conference meeting regularly, a course of study lasting up to decision day, and a weekly instruction class for new converts.

tions amounting to $31,508.63 have been secured and other credits make the total on the allotment, $85,874.91. The benevolences of the churches has risen from $151 per resident member in 1916 to $8.06 in 1921. 95.5 per cent of the pledges due May 1, 1921 have been paid. The total contributions of the year include $7,680.27 for the children of Europe, $3,209.63 for China relief. Other relief funds and Easter offering make a total contribution for the year of $184,576.46. This is practically three times as much as ever was contributed for the objects in the budget in a single year before. The expenses of the promotion department have been only 2.5 per cent of the amount collected. The colleges and schools have received from the New World Movement up to May 1, $90,959.72, and a considerable sum has been received since that date.

Church News by States

IN each state the director of promotion is an agent of THE BAPTIST. Unless some other person has been designated, as in a number of states, news items intended for publication should be sent to him. This does not deny the privilege always belonging to churches of sending matter direct to the office. In either case condense your material. Unless reporting some unusual event, make no item longer than six or seven printed lines. You can save our blue pencil.

Atlantic Coast

MAINE

COLBY COLLEGE COMMENCEMENT opened June 18 with a junior exhibition. Sunday brought a baccalaureate sermon by Rev. Cornelius Woelfkin, a service in memory of Hon. Richard Cutts Shannon ('62) and a Phi Beta Kappa address by Samuel McChord Crothers of Cambridge, Mass. Monday was enlivened by junior class exercises, a business meeting of the Phi Beta Kappa, a college sing, the president's reception and a senior hop. Tuesday's more serious program included a trustees' meeting, class day exercises, luncheons of alumni and alumnae, dramatics, class and fraternity reunions, and an address for the woman's Jubilee by Prof. Romiett Stevens of Columbia University. Prof. Franklin W. Johnson of Columbia University was the commencement speaker, and after his address on Wednesday morning, the festival closed with a commencement dinner at the Gymnasium.

United Baptist Convention

Camden is one of the most beautiful places in Maine. Man has built his palaces on the slopes of the hills and along the shore but God has planted the mountains, dotted the broad bay with islands and opened among them wonderful vistas into the great deep beyond. Camden Church is a child of the convention and in her strength and beauty opened her doors June 7-9, to welcome the mother for a kind of Thanksgiving visit. Aply and wisely led by Pastor T. M. Griffith the church has renovated its building at a cost of over $12,000, has just had a season of refreshing that brought many into the church, and now gladly entertained some 500 Baptists in a becoming and right royal way.

At Rockland on Monday evening, on the invitation of a committee of the Fundamental organization, Dr. Massee of New York gave an address and another at Camden before the opening of the convention.

At 2 p. m. occurred the annual meeting of the Woman's Missionary Federation, Mrs. Florence O. Lorimer, presiding. At the same hour Pres. A. C. Berrie called the ministers association to order. Rev.

C. C. Koch discussed "The Minister as the Pace Setter in Spirituality," Rev. F. S. Bernauer, "The Christocentric Faith of Baptists," and Dr. C. A. Barbour of Rochester, the ultimate purpose of the gospel under the caption, "Why Did Jesus Come?" Dr. Barbour was the speaker of the evening.

Wednesday morning the convention opened in regular session with Pres. Walter A. Danforth, of Bangor, in the chair. Executive Secretary Dr. Irving B. Mower read his eighteenth annual report. There has been great development and progress during these eighteen years but this year has surpassed them all.

Because of the New World Movement the convention is now carrying its work on a basis $10,000 higher than ever before. The salaries of nearly all the pastors have been increased. The missionary force has been enlarged. Rev. William Fletcher has become an expert in encouraging churches toward the settlement of pastors and self-support. Miss Utecht's services are not only in demand but their continuance is soon demanded. Special provision has been made for adequate work at important school centers.

A mission to the Russians and Poles is developing in Waterville and Winslow. Twelve persons have been baptized and a missionary to the Russians in Maine, Rev. Maxym Green, has been engaged. Several new pastors have come to the state. Supt. of Evangelism, Dr. Geo. H. Hamlen, reported. Many evangelistic efforts have been made, most of them successful and there is a rising tide of spiritual life. In some counties special efforts have been made to reach all the churches in the county. The number of baptisms during the year is much larger than usual. The work of the convention evangelists, Harry and Ruth Taylor, has been in marked degree successful. Rev. E. A. Davis has had a successful year. The evangelistic team from Newton Theological Institution has been a great blessing to Hebron Academy and several of our churches. Four pastor-evangelists have begun work—Messrs. Evans, Miller, Roberts and Beatty.

Treas. Graffam reported large increase in the contributions and a gain of $12,008.58 in convention funds which now amount to $379,760.86. The director of promotion, Dr. E. C. Whittemore, made the basis of his report the year of the New World Movement from May 12, 1920 to May 9, 1921. Pledges and subscrip-

Miss Sadie B. Gowen, one of Maine's own daughters who returns to her mission work at Balasore, India, this fall was heard with tender interest. Dr. R. R. Kennan of Portland preached the annual sermon upon the theme "The Pre-eminence of the Personality of Christ." Pres. Roberts gave a significant address on "Manhood and Christian Faith," and Dr. Birney S. Hudson followed with a scholarly and pertinent discussion on "Martin Luther and Soul Liberty" (400th anniversary of the declaration at Worms).

The committee on administrative efficiency made a report which included not only minor changes in method but the elimination of several of the departments through which the work of the convention is now carried on. After considerable discussion it was decided that changes so radical ought not to be made without longer time for consideration, and that if desired they would require amendments to the constitution. The following officers and department heads were then elected on one ballot: Executive secretary, Dr. Irving B. Mower; superintendent of evangelism, Dr. George H. Hamlen; director of promotion, Dr. E. C. Whittemore; director of religious education, Rev. Alexander Henderson. The convention officers are: President, Rev. J. B. Ranger; first vice-president, E. M. Hamlin; second vice-president, Rev. A. E. Lorimer; recording secretary, Dr. C. E. Owen; treasurer, George M. Graffam.

As usual the reports from the colleges and schools were full of interest. 1,012 students are in Colby and Bates and 870 are in the affiliated preparatory schools.

Dr. William E. Sargent, long principal of Hebron Academy, was greatly missed. Several weeks ago he was stricken with paralysis and there is little chance of recovery. Sympathy, love and prayers were in the assurances sent to Dr. and Mrs. Sargent.

Meeting in Camden and in the church that gave James Perry to the loyal service to the world, which meant his martyrdom, loving sympathy and admiring tribute were sent to the family.

In the new department of religious education, Director Henderson was able to report a fine and hopeful beginning and things already accomplished. The school of methods at Ocean Park was fully endorsed.

Dr. Heath of New York and Mr. Peterson of Massachusetts received hearty greeting and interested hearing. The final meeting presented the state workers who with splendid fidelity to Christ and devotion to his kingdom are trying to make his gospel effective in Maine. In his great address on "the yet undiscovered country, the land waiting to be possessed, the truth, to be lived," Dr. Barbour rang out a challenge to all who would seek the kingdom of God.

The convention was a notable one. The year past has been remarkable for its accomplishments and for what it has made possible. Whatever differences of opinion there may be among Maine Baptists, we are persuaded that they are one in their loyalty to Christ, the unity of his Spirit is their bond of peace, and Paul thought that this unity men should "endeavor to keep."

NEW HAMPSHIRE

COLBY ACADEMY COMMENCEMENT ran from June 9 to 13. Interclass track meet, class day, senior "Last Chapel," sophomore prize speaking, junior prize exhibition, baseball between New Hampton and Colby and senior dramatics occupied the first three days. On Sunday, Rev. J. K. Romeyn preached before the graduating class, Colby Honor Roll Memorial Tablet was dedicated and "The Holy City" sung. Monday was marked by graduating exercises, alumni luncheon, meeting of trustees, meeting of the Alumni Association, a baseball game between the alumni and the academy and the anniversary concert by the Temple Quartet of Concord, with Miss Mildred Raymond as reader.

VERMONT

MONTGOMERY CENTER—May 29 closed another blessed month here. Rev. W. F. Rawlins baptized ten making a total of thirty souls saved, twenty baptized and twenty-one taken into the church since April 3.

THE FIRST CHURCH, Montpelier recently gave its pastor and wife a surprise party and presented them with ten new ten-dollar gold pieces besides many other smaller gifts. About sixty people formed in line led by Mrs. A. P. Hibbard, one of the constituent members of the church and a hard worker and generous giver who is known by all the pastors as "Mother" Hibbard because she loves and cares for them all as if they were her own sons. Mrs. Orlando Davis also led with Mrs. Hibbard. Mrs. Ida E. Lane made the presentation speech in the form of an anniversary poem as it was the close of three years of fruitful work by Pastor and Mrs. Piper. The latter were completely surprised but feelingly and fittingly responded.

THE WALLINGFORD CHURCH has extended a very hearty and unanimous call to the Rev. Arthur Stewart Wahl, one of our district workers, and it is expected he will accept taking up the pastorate about Aug. 1.

THE BELLOW FALLS CHURCH has called to the pastorate Rev. John M. Maxwell recently returned from war service across the sea. Mr. Maxwell has already a good hold of the work.

THE NORTH DANVILLE CHURCH, Rev. Christian Peterson, pastor, has recently received six new members by baptism and the work in all departments is moving forward encouragingly.

THE FAIRFAX CHURCH, Rev. Elisha Sanderson, pastor, has recently lost two of its oldest members: Harry S. Ufford, father of our beloved Rev. A. F. Ufford, missionary to China, who is now home on a furlough and was able to be with his father during his last sickness, and Mr. Albert A. Walker, another aged member, who leaves two daughters to mourn his loss. Both Mr. Ufford and Mr. Walker were faithful members of the church.

State Convention

The Vermont State Convention met at Bellows Falls, May 23-25, with the First Church. The attendance was close to the largest on record, there being some 325 delegates and guests present. The weather was a bit cooler than the average but this was more than made up by the warmth of the enthusiasm when it was known that the past year has been one of the best in the history of the state convention.

The sessions opened on Monday evening with a short stereopticon lecture by Rev. Sumner Vinton. This was the opening feature for each evening and the fine pictures and the earnest, clear and suggestive message of the speaker did much to stir up the hearts of the people to the need for Christ in the world and our responsibility. There were two excellent addresses given the first evening, the first by Rev. A. F. Ufford of China who took for his subject "Twelve Years in China." This covered some of the experiences of this man of God in the land of the Mongol. The other was by Dr. Charles A. Brooks of New York who told in a fascinating way of his travels in Europe, the condition of these devastated parts of the world and the possibilities for the kingdom in these lands so injured by the war.

On Tuesday morning the day opened with two meetings going on at the same time; one for the women, held in the Congregational Church, presided over by Mrs. J. A. Greenwood, representing the home mission work and Miss Ada Brigham representing the foreign work. The other was the annual meeting of the Vermont Baptist Historical Society, meeting in the Baptist Church and presided over by its president, Rev. Henry Crocker. The officers for the ensuing year, are Rev. Henry Crocker, Chester, president, and Rev. W. E. Lombard, secretary, Saxton's River.

The annual session of the Vermont Baptist Ministers' and Missionaries' Conference and Aid Society was called to order by Rev. J. H. Blackburn, Newport, president. Dr. Davidson gave an illuminating report and explanation of the pension plan of the ministers' pension system of the Northern Baptist Convention. The report of the nominating committee was adopted, giving to the society the following officers for the coming year: President, Rev. J. H. Blackburn, Newport; vice-president, Rev. J. S. Brown, Manchester; secretary, Rev. Frank S. Tolman, Randolph; treasurer, Mr. A. G. Crane, Burlington.

At 10 o'clock the Convention was called to order by the president, Mr. Elmer B. Bailey. An excellent address was given by Rev. G. W. Toward of Bennington who explained the plan of the vacation Bible school. He was followed by his wife who showed the method of the work and some of the work done.

On Tuesday afternoon the session was given over to the young peoples' work and three excellent addresses were given, the first by Dr. Frederick E. Taylor of Indianapolis who spoke in a very gripping manner on the subject of prayer. Rev. Milton M. McGorrell of Philadelphia then told of the educational aspect of the work of the young people's work and suggested methods by which this could be put into effect. Miss Beulah Bates our own director of missionary work in the Sunday schools gave one of her delightful talks on "Snap Shots." This told of the development of the work in the state the past year which has been very large. The final address was given by Rev. Dr. Frank O. Erb, Philadelphia.

On Tuesday evening Dr. Erb spoke of the "Outreach of a Soul," a fine presentation of the possibilities of spiritual unfoldment. Dr. Taylor then gave another address on "A Program that would double the Membership of every Church in Vermont." This message emphasized the matter of soul-winning.

On Wednesday morning Prof. Raymond McFarland the new principal at Saxton's River told of the work planned for this academy and the excellent prospects now opening. The officers for the coming year are: President, Elmer B. Bailey; first vice-president, W. W. Nichols, Rutland; second vice-president, Mrs. W. E. Lombard, Saxton's River; clerk, Rev. Elbert J. Smith, Fair Haven. Dr. Davidson then introduced the new pastors to the convention.

The session Wednesday afternoon opened with greetings from other denominations and organizations. The first address was given by Mrs. Bertha D. Judd, of Brooklyn, who spoke interestingly of the work done in the home land. She was followed by Mrs. A. F. Ufford of Shaohsing, China, who told of the work among women in this wonderful land. The last address was given by Rev. Charles N. Arbuckle, Newton, Mass., whose subject was "The Method and Aims of Religious Education." This was a fine presentation of the real purpose of the higher education from the religious side.

The last session of the convention came on Wednesday evening and was one of profound interest. The first address of the evening was given by Pres. Ernest M. Hopkins, of Dartmouth College, on "New Problems of the Higher Education." The second address was given by Dr. Arbuckle of Newton. His subject was "The Man for the Present Critical Hour." The concluding moments were occupied by Dr. Davidson our state secretary.—Frank S. Tolman.

Commencement at Newton

The anniversaries began with public examinations of the three classes by Professors Rowe, Berkeley and Bradbury; but in the general mind the real beginning was the remarkable baccalaureate sermon by President Horr on "The Moralization of Power," Matt. 4:3.

Monday was Alumni Day and the members of the Baptist Ministers' Conference were guests. Dr. W. W. Bustard, Class of 1898, of Cleveland, O., was the orator of the occasion, and the audience filled the church.

At the alumni dinner Pres. Horr who expressed his pleasure at the fundamental character of the morning oration and said we could never define the word until we asked, Fundamental to what? The Newton faculty, in whose selection as trustee and as president he had had a controlling voice, was absolutely loyal to the fundamentals. The correspondence between the seminary and committee on denomination schools of the Northern Baptist Convention had been printed and could be studied by anyone. Everett A. Greene, the treasurer of the seminary, spoke of the new affiliation between the church and seminary, especially in Sunday school work, and the larger scope of the work for next year, with the aid of Prof.

Berkeley and three of the students. He affirmed his loyalty to the Newton of the future. Dr. Bustard said that he had taken the Newton booklet, "Christian Certainties," and preached a series of evening sermons which had not only attracted large congregations but had resulted in many conversions. Rev. S. M. Lindsay, '13, of Brooklyn, the last speaker, said that he learned two lessons at Newton, to state truth exactly and to be loyal to it at all costs. Dr. Charles H. Spalding, '68 presided with wit and bonhomie.

At the business meeting, the election of officers resulted as follows: pres., A. E. Harriman, '95, vice-pres., Sylvester Burnham, '73, clerk, W. N. Donovan, '98, treas. E. F. Merriam, '79, orator, Dr. Charles L. White, '90, alternate, Rev. Joseph C. Robbins, '02. The following were elected to the board of trustees: Thomas D. Anderson, '77, William A. Hill, '04, and Benj. T. Livingston, '00. A committee on general helpfulness was appointed, consisting of A. A. Forshee, '02, D. M. Lockrow, '95 and R. L. Webb, '93. The necrology list of seventeen names included such men of distinction as Prof. George H. Whittemore, '68, William A. Newcombe, '75 and Ira M. Baird, '09.

On Monday evening the faculty and senior class were guests of the Social Union. Mr. John H. Balfour made a pleasing impression as the representative of the graduating class. Prof. H. K. Rowe the representative of the faculty speaking on "Church Engineering," held the closest attention of his audience. The building of the church is the most important task of our day, and the seminary is the school of the church engineer. The principal speaker, the veteran Dr. R. S. MacArthur, declared that the ministry today was on a higher intellectual and spiritual plane than fifty years ago and was more consecrated to its great task than ever. "I honor Newton. It is time that this small criticizing of our seminaries cease." The applause was tumultuous.

The commencement speaker was Roger W. Babson, the well-known statistician, who spoke on "The Church and Industrial Relations." This address will appear soon in book form as the last of the five lectures on the Stephen Greene Foundation.

Commencement exercises were held at 3:30 on Tuesday afternoon. There were five speakers from the senior class: Paul E. Alden, Edward A. Bell, George E. Blackwell, Francisco Cali and Leonard L. Campbell. All the young men won praise by their evident familiarity with the subjects they spoke on. After the conferring of degrees on twelve candidates of the graduating class, the president gave the degree of Master of Theology to Rev. Arthur Deming Carpenter, '17, and Eugene Dinsmore Dolloff, '19, in recognition of their researches and theses. Prof. Berkeley then addressed the graduates on "The Minister as a Creative Artist."

Mr. W. E. Blodgett made an admirable toastmaster at the trustees' dinner. Pres. Horr, called on first, said the seminary year had been a very happy one. He congratulated the seminary on the long service of Prof. Donovan who was still a young man; and on the close affiliation with the Newton Center Church in the matter of progressive religious education. He also announced that a new course of two years would be open to young women who are college graduates, and that a fine house, "Chase Hall," had been bought for their dormitory.

Dr. Charles N. Arbuckle showed that religious education was not hostile to conversion but on the contrary developed the Christian idea of evangelism. Pres. Cutten of Acadia University had been present for the first time at a Newton commencement and had admired the Newton sanity. "If our leaders follow this sane, balanced judgment, the denomination is safe." Rev. E. B. Dolan represented the remarkable class of 1896 who were celebrating their twenty-fifth anniversary. The last speech was by Dr. Frank W. Padelford, whose statistics showed the feeble interest of Baptists in education and the rapid rate at which half trained men were supplanting the graduates of seminaries in Baptist pulpits. There are signs that the denomination will recognize this danger before it is too late, will silence unfounded criticisms, and rally to the support of its schools.

Thus ended the ninety-sixth anniversary. Faith in the sufficiency of Jesus was the ruling note.

CONNECTICUT

REV. M. R. FORSHAY, recently called to the First Church, New Haven, occupied the pulpit June 5. Mr. Forshay is a graduate of Acadia University and Newton Theological Seminary. He comes of a race of strong preachers, and has had notable success in all his pastorates. Connecticut rejoices in his coming to the historic old church in our great university center.

CENTRAL, NORWICH, another of our strong churches is very happy in the settlement of her new pastor, Rev. D. A. Pitt. Mr. Pitt came from a successful pastorate in Berkeley. He is sure of a warm welcome in the "land of steady habits."

CALVARY CHURCH, Torrington, Rev. Walter T. Aiken, dedicated its enlarged and beautiful new church building June 5, with an invocation by the pastor, greetings on behalf of local churches by Rev. W. C. Judd, and on behalf of the State Convention by Rev. E. E. Gates of Hartford. The sermon was by Rev. O. W. Foye, Dorchester, Mass., a former pastor, and the prayer of dedication was by Rev. A. B. Coats, Hartford, Secretary of the Connecticut State convention. A matter of interest to the local church and congregation was the using of the responsive reading and the hymn of dedication, the former being arranged and the latter composed by Rev. P. S. Evans, the founder of the church. Philip S. Evans, M. D., his son is now a medical missionary in Shantung, China.

THE BAPTIST CHURCH, Danbury, Rev. Ellis Gilbert, pastor, is just closing a year of achievements; forty-five have been received into the membership, thirty-two by baptism and thirteen by letter; five others are to be baptized on June 5. Others are coming during the next few weeks. There has been a large increase in the Bible School of which Mr. Le Roy Andrews is the efficient superintendent. In addition to a strong older men's class, the pastor has a class of younger men numbering forty-four. One feature of the class program is the conducting of meetings for the "Shut-ins" every two weeks. The church has recently installed a new electric lighting system. The ladies are placing a new carpet on the auditorium floor. The pastor declares that the New World Movement has been a great help in the work of the church year. The church will entertain the state convention in October.

THE DANBURY NEW HOPE was the first of our churches to go over the top and also to pay in 100 per cent collections for 1921. The pastor, Rev. J. E. Harris, is planning a campaign in July for collections on the second year's pledges. This church needs a new house of worship, but it is standing loyally by the program of Jesus as represented in the New World Movement.

REV. MYRON D. FULLER has resigned the pastorate of the Jewett City Church after four fruitful years of labor. The church will consider the resignation at the July meeting.

AT MONTOWESE there is a marked increase of interest on the part of the young people, in the church. Ten have been added to the church recently by baptism. Rev. Ferris J. Stephens, a student in Yale Divinity School, is doing excellent work on this field.

REV. J. CLYDE FORNEY, another student in Yale Divinity School, is doing a strong work at Stepney. There is a revival of interest on this field, and the outlook is most encouraging. Mr. Forney is a strong preacher and has had considerable experience in religious education work.

THE CANTATA "God's Flowerland" was given in connection with the Children's Day exercises in the First Church, Hartford, June 12, under the direction of Mrs. E. E. Gates, wife of the pastor-at-large of the state convention. The entire program was most tastefully arranged and successfully executed.

NEW YORK

NUNDA CHURCH ordained David N. Boswell May 27.

REV. H. N. GEISTWEIT, director of young people's and boys' work at Lake Avenue, Rochester, closed his work May 29, and will do further work in the seminary in preparation for his life work.

Conference of Workers With Chinese

A conference of two days for Christian workers in all the Chinese Sunday schools of New York and Brooklyn was held April 24-25 under the auspices of the religious education department of the City Mission Society and the Publication Society, directed by Rev. Stanley Hazzard and Dr. William J. Sly of Philadelphia. In the conference at the Brooklyn Temple, Supt. Halle presided and addresses were made by Dr. J. C. Masee, Dr. William J. Sly, Rev. W. I. Sutherland, Mr. A. Carter, Miss Vegh and Mrs. F. E. Boyd. On Monday afternoon at Second Ave. Church, Rev. Stanley Hazzard, Rev. Lee To, Miss I. M. Graydon, Miss C. L. Bell and Mrs. Huie Kiu discussed increasing attendance and improving the teaching. Dr. Henry of the Church of All Nations presided in the evening at the Morning Star Chinese Church, addresses being made by Mr. Herman Lui, Mr. Alfred H. Lee, Dr. F. L. Anderson, Stanley Hazzard, Miss Vegh and Dr. William J. Sly. The Christian work for the Chinese in our land is gaining. Of the 103 Chinese institutions sixty-five are on the Pacific Slope and thirty-eight are east of the Mississippi. At present there are ten Baptist Chinese churches with more than 1,000 members and over twenty Baptist Sunday schools with a host of faithful teachers and superintendents. There are eight Sunday schools in New York City and five in Brooklyn, all of which were represented in the conference. The value of a goal and the use of literature were discussed and a strong committee named to take up these matters. An increasing number of churches are providing Sunday schools to reach students, business men and laborers. Many of these schools are well equipped and have faithful teachers, but as a rule these Chinese schools are poorly housed, primitive in methods, needing much sympathetic guidance. It is certain if such guidance were speedily given this work would bring larger returns.

Washington Heights Church, New York City

Union services of the Washington Heights Church, Rev. Harold Pattison, pastor, and the Hamilton Grange Reformed Church will be held every Sunday morning from July 3 through Sept. 18. These churches are only four blocks apart and it has been their custom to hold union services in summer for some years. During July the services are held in the Washington Heights Church and in August and early September in the Hamilton Grange Church. Rev. Curtis Lee Laws, editor of The Watchman-Examiner, will preach during July and Rev. William I. Chamberlain will take the other services. For a number of years also the Washington Heights Church has held an "Altogether Service" at 7 p. m. Sundays in June and late September, in place of the regular Sunday evening services, uniting the older people with the young people's societies. This has been very successful.

At the monthly missionary meetings, Rev. Harry S. Myers, Rev. William J. Sly, Dr. Reginald L. McAll and others have given addresses on the various mission interests and Christian work with which they were connected. Stereopticon slides have been used to illustrate what is being done in different fields. The Woman's Society has always been active in furthering such benevolences. Of late it has been actively interested in the Fair for Disabled Soldiers, recently held in our city and in raising funds for China, the Near East, Fresh Air, The Home for the Aged, and other causes. Mrs. J. W. A. Abell is the president of the Woman's Society and a very efficient leader.

A series of sermons of unusual interest has been given by Dr. Pattison on "The Apostles Creed." The attendance has been large. New members are received at every communion. June 12 the Bible school held its annual exercises in the morning. A large offering was given for Fresh Air Work which is under the direction of the New York Baptist City Mission Society.

International Baptist Seminary

The International Baptist Seminary closed its first year June 17. There have been three departments, namely, Russian, Polish, and Hungarian. The spirit of the school has been satisfactory, and the quality of work done by the students has in the main surpassed the original expectation of the faculty. The beautiful equipment and uplifting environment has had a great deal to do with this result. The average attendance on the part of the students has been in most cases perfect. The faculty has been in closest fellowship with the students; in fact, the life of the school has resembled that of a family rather than that of an institution. The fellowship of faculty and student body has been a decided factor in the educational results on the part of the students.

The school will have a special session this summer for Russians from Europe who are arriving in America the first part of July. These Russians were converted in prison camps and have, as a body, made application for admission to the school. Prof. John Bokmelder, head of the Russian department, Vjcheslav Drashpil, assistant in the Russian department, and Miss Davis, secretary-registrar of the seminary, will be the instructors of this group during the summer.

During the year preparations have been made, and are practically completed, for taking care of a larger student body which will attend the seminary during the coming school year, which will open October 1, 1921. There will be the Roumanian, the Czecho-slovak, and the Italian department of Colgate Theological Seminary in addition to those already named. Each of these departments will have a good number of students. The expectation is that we will have not less than sixty men in attendance this coming year.

The Home Mission Society has purchased a splendid building at 32 South Munn Avenue, 650 feet from the main building and grounds. This property has a frontage of 165 feet with a depth of 400 feet. The building is attractive within and without, located among the beautiful trees in the yard. It will accommodate about forty single students. The securing of this property was decidedly providential in view of the impossibility of erecting a dormitory this summer that would take care of the larger number of students, another house has been bought across the street from the present grounds. This will take care of one of the teachers and his family, and also about a dozen single students. In addition to the buildings named the Home Mission Society has purchased one double house that will accommodate two teachers and their families, and one single house that will accommodate another teacher and family. It should be said that during the year a second building on the main grounds has been remodeled into small apartments for students with families. Already the Home Mission Society has invested nearly $250,000 in buildings and grounds for the International Seminary.

In addition to the President the faculty for the coming year will be as follows: Rev. Antonio Mangano, head of the Italian department of Colgate Theological Seminary; Rev. Stephen Orosz, head of the Hungarian department; Rev. John Bokmelder, head of the Russian department; Mr. Vjcheslav Drashpil assistant in the Russian department, Rev. Louis Adamus, head of the Polish department; Vasile Prodan, in charge of the Roumanian department. The head of the Czecho-Slovak department has not as yet been finally settled, but it is practically certain that the one who is being considered for the position will accept. English, history, American literature and the sciences will be taught by Mrs. Mabelle Grant Meeker and Miss Chrissey Stebbins. Miss Ella Davis, who was secretary-registrar at the Bible Teachers' Training School of New York City, has already entered upon her duties as secretary-registrar.

The majority of the students must receive some financial help during the year in order to meet their necessary expenses. A few education societies have assisted, and no doubt will continue the aid during the coming year. The Home Mission Society has in some instances helped individual students through their students' aid appropriations. Some help will also come from the various foreign speaking conferences. No doubt a number of individuals will interest themselves in aiding students by means of establishing scholarships. This is an opportunity to which, we believe, many men and women will respond. The President will gladly correspond with any who may wish to aid the students in any way.

The next school year will begin October 1, 1921, and close May 31, 1922. The date for the dedication and formal opening of the school has been set for October 12.

The leaders trained in this seminary will through their groups exert an influence not only in America, but also in their own homeland.

FRANK L. ANDERSON, President.

64 South Munn Avenue,
East Orange, N. J.

Dr. Estes Retires

"David Foster Estes, who has been librarian of Colgate University for twenty-three years, has resigned and will retire at the end of this year.

"Dr. Estes became Professor of New Testament Interpretation at Colgate in 1891 and is the author of several books on theology as well as a contributor to theological reviews. In 1898 he was appointed librarian of the University, the collection of books then numbering about 25,000. The library now contains about 100,000 volumes and, under Dr. Estes' administration, its use by the student body has increased in even greater proportion than its size. A man of unusual personality and wide culture, he has been a wise and efficient administrator, liberal in his policies, broad-minded in his selection of books, and devoted and self-sacrificing in his service to the University. It is with the keenest regret that the library staff as well as the faculty and students see Dr. and Mrs. Estes leave for their new home in Southern California."

April 15, 1921.)

Dr. Este's main work has been in the Department of New Testament Interpretation in Colgate Theological Seminary, a chair which he occupied from 1891 to 1920. In this field he prepared his published book, "Outline of New Testament Theology," now issued by the Publication Society, and his papers published in various reviews have been in the same field or in that of theology.

EASTERN PENNSYLVANIA

CENTRAL CHURCH, WAYNE, has justly been named "The Little Church with a Big Heart". Tho there are less than 200 resident members, last year they gave to all objects more than $19,000. They over-subscribed their N. W. M. quota by nearly 50 per cent and then over-paid their subscriptions for the first year by 15 per cent. The Bible school is increasing in numbers and efficiency. More than forty have been received into the church membership this spring.

WESTERN PENNSYLVANIA

BETH EDEN—In the death of Dr. Thomas Campbell Van Kirk, of Pittsburgh, on May 14, the Baptist denomination as well as this church sustained a very great loss. Dr. Van Kirk was one of the North Side's most prominent citizens and a second cousin of President Harding. He was chairman of the Civic Affairs Committee of the North Side Board of Trade and it was mainly through his untiring efforts that the community obtained permission to use the large vacant lots in the district for playgrounds and the city was induced to purchase the old salt works grounds as a city playground. He was an active member and a Director of the Pittsburgh Academy of Science and Art, a member of the Pittsburgh Academy of Dentistry, and one-time president of the North Dental Club.

Rev. W. ANDERSON, of Butler, Pa., has accepted a call to the Monessen church and will begin his work in July.

TWO MEN WERE RECEIVED last Sunday by the Saltsburg church, Rev. W. P. Wheeler, pastor.

Rev. A. J. MEEK, of New Kensington, gave the right hand of fellowship to thirty-six new members, Sunday, June 5. The attendance at communion service was the largest in the history of the church.

Pittsburgh Association, Annual Meeting at McKeesport

Attendance at McKeesport was larger than for several years. Over seventy churches and missions were represented.

The program was of high grade throughout, equal to any state convention. There was not a disappointment in speakers taking the part assigned with the single exception of one report and this was practically covered by the report preceding.

The Moderator, Mr. H. E. Cole, carried through the program on time, and in a tactful, dignified manner.

Miss Edith Town, of the Publication Society, and Rev. Zo. D. Brown, of India, were welcome additions to the program.

Rev. A. P. Mihm, clerk, deserves commendation for his concise and brief presentation of the "digest of church letters," which included all necessary information. His reading, too, was excellent.

The spirit of the meetings was excellent throughout. There was manifest a general pride in the work of the association, with no symptoms of self-satisfaction. Every one seemed to be in a constructive mood.

Probably the only disappointing feature of the meetings was the fact that so many came for one day only. In many cases that was necessary; in many others, no one is able to discover a reason. Both the association and the absentees were the losers in the second case.

The goal of 1500 baptisms in the association for the coming year which was adopted, means a definite goal for every church. Every one will rejoice in the emphasis given Evangelism.

Rev. E. A. Harrar, president of the Permanent Council, was elected chairman of the Executive Committee of the Council, a wise step as to organization.

It was a forward looking convention, not a stand-pat one.

Rev. Rittenhouse Neisser, newly elected associate secretary of the state board of education, gave two fine addresses and received a cordial welcome.

All who listened to the splendid addresses by Dr. C. A. Brooks, Dr. F. W. Padelford and Judge Tensard De Wolf, left with a larger conception as to the value of the work the association is doing.

The new officers are: Rev. James S. Jewell, Mod.; Rev. E. A. Harrar, clerk; Rev. R. M. Safford, assistant clerk

Mississippi Valley

INDIANA

IMMANUEL, FORT WAYNE, B. F. Martin, pastor, has purchased a lot and secured an initial subscription of $50,000 to build a new house.

PRESIDENT C. E. GOODELL of Franklin College announces changes in the faculty as follows: Assoc. Prof. Bertha A. Reuter goes to the University of Iowa as a research fellow. Her place in the department of history will be filled by Prof. Leiland W. Meyer. Prof. R. H. Kent has been elected to the position of associate professor and acting head of the department of philosophy and education. Prof. Chester Roberts of the department of chemistry, absent this year on leave, receiving the degree of Ph. D. from Yale University, will return to his work in the fall.

ILLINOIS

FIRST CHURCH, ROCKFORD, G. A. Sheets, pastor—on the first Sunday in June the hand of fellowship was extended to twelve new members. This makes sixty-five additions since the first of January, forty-three of whom were received by baptism. In the evening the choir of twenty-five voices presented the oratorio "Elijah."

SINGING EVANGELIST WILLIAM S. DIXON, has recovered his health and during the next evangelistic year he will help pastors who will do their own preaching and who will want a song leader and soloist to help them. He may be reached at 201 West Madison Avenue, Wheaton, Illinois.

WILLISVILLE, MORRIS F. GILCHRIST, pastor, held its first services in the new house, June 6. The Sunday-school, numbering more than 200 can now be accommodated with room.

CHAPLAIN ALVA J. BRASTED, of the Fourth Field Artillery, who attended the convention at Buffalo last year urges the Baptists to take a continued and sympathetic interest in the Baptist chaplains in the army and navy.

Frances Shimer School—Mt. Carroll

The commencement sermon was by Prof. Shirley Jackson Case, of the University of Chicago, on "The Law of Struggle."

The reunion of the class of 1871 brought four members of the original ten, and three teachers to Mt. Carroll from Minnesota, Iowa, Illinois and Massachusetts.

The trustees voted to get plans for new kitchen, enlarged dining room and new dormitory to house fifty students and teachers—to be ready for September 1922.

Forty graduates received diplomas, sixteen in the junior college, the others in the academy from Illinois, Iowa, Kansas, Wisconsin, Colorado, Indiana, Oklahoma, Wyoming, Nebraska and Ohio.

The report of Dean Wm. P. McKee showed income larger by $5,000 for the year, than the outgo. Over ninety visitors were present from outside of Mt. Carroll.

The exhibits in home economics and art, the recitals in music and public speaking and the class play drew a large attendance. The artists' recital by Edna Swanson Ver Haar drew a full house.

The commencement address was given by J. Stanley Brown, D.D., president of the Northern Illinois State Normal School at DeKalb, on "Levels of Intelligence."

The alumnae luncheon drew 100 graduates and friends. The reception by Dean and Mrs. McKee was largely attended.

The school has been compelled to refuse approximately one-third of all applicants the past two years for lack of space.

MICHIGAN

REV. JOSIUA ROBERTS, our veteran in state convention work, writes very hopefully of the churches in the Alpena Association. Cheboygan, under the pastoral care of R. O. Thompson, has had a steady growth, and now finds that a new building is imperative to meet its needs. Rev. Robert Morton has received several new members into the Onaway church, where there is a neat and commodious building. Millersburg and Tower cooperate harmoniously under the successful leadership of Cecil J. White. At the former place laborers gave freely of their time and the church was removed to a more desirable location and the property very materially increased. At Tower the church debt has been wiped away; several new members have come into the church, the Sunday school grows and the Baptists are aroused to fulfil their mission in this little burg. The American church at Alpena has Rev. I. M. Compton, who has made his presence in the city felt by his strong aggressive work. Rev. Homer W. Grimes has charge of the work at Tawas City and Hemlock Road and Rev. William Hall is in charge of the Twining, Cedar Valley and Prescott circuit.

REV. HARRY G. KELLOGG inaugurated a new day at Weston—"Automobile Day." They had a big day and everybody was happy, except the "conscientious objectors." Twenty-seven autos and several other conveyances were used. One young man whom the churches had never been able to reach caught the spirit and brought thirteen in his car.

FIRST CHURCH, BAY CITY, Frederick Allen, pastor, received sixty-four into its membership last year. The net membership now is 459. This church carries on its roll only those who are actively in touch with the church work.

MINNESOTA

REV. C. J. BERGSTROM baptized three the first Sunday of June.

MONEY HAS BEEN SUBSCRIBED for the payment of a missionary on the range. It is hoped he may be at work ere long.

REV. D. E. ANDERSON, evangelist, finds his work so pressing in Minnesota that he is not going West as expected. He has recently held meetings at Milaca with excellent results, and about the middle of July he will start a tabernacle campaign at Cambridge.

REV. E. O. ERICKSON baptized three into the membership of the Jesse Lake Church on the first Sunday in June.

REV. E. W. ANNABLE has been prospered in his ministry in Worthington. Seventeen have been baptized and others are joining by letter. All of the services are very well attended.

THE LITTLE FALLS CHURCH has received four for baptism and District Missionary Cody will soon administer the ordinance.

KANSAS

EDWARD N. JONES of Downs, wins Iowa scholarship. He has been appointed to a scholarship in the graduate college of Iowa University at Iowa City. The scholarship entitles him to $300 and exemption from all fees. Mr. Jones is the president of the state Sunday-school and young people's convention and assembly of our denomination, and has been active in religious work.

MISSOURI

REV. ERNEST MAIN, for six years pastor of the Water Tower Church, St. Louis, closed his work June 1. During his pastorate the church has grown from 100 to 500, the Sunday-school from ninety to 500 and all missionary apportionments are paid in advance to the close of the year.

IDAHO

E. Washington and North Idaho Convention

The thirty-ninth annual meeting was held at Lewiston, Ida., June 6-10. Lewiston is a flourishing business center for a wide area, and the seat of the Idaho State Normal School. One of the particularly noteworthy features of the city is the road, built by the city itself at a cost of $200,000, which winds back and forth many times, making it necessary to travel ten miles to get down to the city 2,000 feet below. Above, a wonderful panorama of verdure-clad mountains and hills, rivers and valleys, grain fields and orchards spreads out before one.

A ministerial session opened the meetings on the first night. Rev. F. H. Thompson of the entertaining church and president of the ministers' conference occupied the chair. The annual sermon by Rev. M. E. Bollen was a heart-searching message on the topic, "Men in Whom Jesus Christ was Disappointed." Rev. S. Z. Batten, D.D., gave an impassioned address.

Tuesday morning was a continuation of the ministerial session. Rev. W. H. Bowler spoke on "The Pastor and the New World Movement." His slogan was, "Let's finish the job." The speaker called attention to the fact that this convention is the next in line to go over the top. That it is possible for Baptists to complete their task he argued from the fact that only one-fifth of the churches had pledged one-half of the $100,000,000. Rev. S. Z. Batten appeared a second time with an address on the subject, "Present Day Problems of the Pastor as a Citizen." Rev. Peter C. Wright, in an address explained "The Ministerial Pension Plan." Rev. W. E. Monbeck, president, and Rev. W. H. Gibson were elected officers of the conference for the ensuing year.

The women held a simultaneous business session in another part of the church building. In her report the secretary-director, Mrs. A. H. Bailey, stated that thirty-eight out of sixty-two churches in the convention have women's societies, four new ones being organized during the year and that 1,411 women and girls regularly contribute to the New World Movement. Five young women have volunteered for foreign service. On an allotment of $1,600 for the Women's Jubilee Fund the Columbia River District raised $1,842. Officers were elected as follows: Secretary-director, Mrs. A. H. Bailey; vice-president, Mrs. Flora Aitchison; recording secretary and treasurer, Mrs. Grace M. Alstrom.

The convention proper began with the session of Tuesday afternoon. The reports of the convention treasurer and of the convention board were the most favorable ever made. Beginning with May 1 the convention became self-supporting. During the year thirty-three missionaries have served thirty-seven fields for a part or the whole of their time. For some time losses have been reported, due in large part because of pruning church rolls, but this year there were 501 baptisms, and a net gain of 468 in membership. When the present superintendent of missions took up the work $58,000 was owed to the edifice department of the Home Mission Society. It is about one-tenth of this sum today, and will be soon wiped out entirely. The churches have pledged 69 per cent of the allotment in the New World Movement. Rev. Myron W. Haynes gave an address on Christian education.

Tuesday evening the convention was given the students' viewpoint of McMinnville College as touching its social and its moral life in addresses by two members of the student body, Wm. Scott, and Miss Susie Steele. Miss Lucile A. Withers thrilled the gathering with her stories of heroism on the part of Chinese converts. Promotion Field Director J. R. George made an earnest plea for the completing of our state allotment to the New World Movement. A. C. White presented a resolution calling for the finishing of the task. This was carried by a unanimous rising vote.

Wednesday morning the fact was brought out that more than one-fourth of our churches have Sunday schools with an attendance in excess of the church membership, even as much as 300 per cent more in at least one case. The following officers were elected: President, J. V. McCall; first vice-president, A. C. White; second vice-president, C. D. Hudson; treasurer, J. F. McFadden; recording secretary, Rev. J. M. Nelson. This session was given over largely to a consideration of Sunday-school matters. State Director T. H. Hagen led in a conference on Sunday-school methods and problems. Miss Meme Brockway showed the value of the young in an address on, "The Prophet and the Child."

The Wednesday afternoon session was in charge of the women. Mrs. F. E. R. Linfield spoke on "Our Jubilee, or Fifty Years of Women's Missions." Miss L. L. West gave reminiscences of early Baptist work on this convention field. The Baptists organized the first school above the grades in this territory. Miss Lucile A. Withers told about her dispensary work in China. Miss Meme Brockway spoke about methods of quickening the missionary spirit in the Sunday-school.

Wednesday evening, Rev. W. B. Hinson brought a wonderful uplift in the first of three great inspirational addresses. His first address was on "The Church."

Thursday morning Dr. Hinson gave his second address on "The Bible." Rev. A. L. Wilson, the convention's colporteur-missionary, told how the gospel was carried to neglected fields. Rev. Robert Gray recounted stories of success in his chapel car work with the Messenger of Peace. Mrs. Robert Gray followed with an account of her labors with the children. Rev. J. O. Gould, student-pastor at the University of Idaho, Moscow, spoke about his efforts to influence the religious life of the young people in this institution.

The final address of Dr. Hinson was delivered Thursday afternoon on the subject, "Circles Around the Lord." Fourteen missionary pastors made five minute speeches on the work of their fields. Rev. T. H. Hagen spoke about the summer assembly to be held at Mica Bay on Lake Coeur d'Alene, July 19-29. The sentiment has been growing that a permanent home for the assembly should soon be secured. Mrs. A. W. Gilbert, the wife of an American merchant in China, gave an address on "Everyday Life in China."

The closing session on Thursday night consisted of an address by Rev. G. L. White, in which was brought before the audience the story of redemption among the Mono Indians of California, illustrated by the moving-picture machine.

The sustained interest of the convention to the very last minute was noteworthy. Most of the 130 delegates remained throughout the entire sessions and were faithful in their attendance. The splendid hospitality of the Lewiston people and the high spiritual tone of the meetings made the gathering most delightful and helpful.

WESTERN WASHINGTON

REV. H. S. BLACK has resigned the pastorate of the Bethesda Church, Tacoma, and will close his work July 1.

REV. B. M. GODWIN recently settled as pastor of the church at Brush Prairie.

McMINNVILLE COLLEGE, at its recent commencement, bestowed the degree of doctor of divinity on Rev. W. E. Henry, Pastor at Everett. This is an honor very worthily bestowed. Dr. Henry received his training in the University of Virginia and Crozer Theological Seminary. After a short pastorate of a year in Pennsylvania he spent eight years in West Virginia in two pastorates, that of the Baptist churches at Weston and at Parkersburg. Four years and three months were spent in the pastorate of the church at Twin Falls, Idaho. He is now in the eighth year of his pastorate at Everett, Wash., where the church in every department shows the results of his able and vigorous leadership. Dr. Henry is a member of the state convention board, chairman of the state promotion committee and one of the representatives from the state of Washington on the General Board of Promotion.

Book Review

"The Heroes of Early Israel."

By Irving F. Wood, Professor of Biblical Literature and Comparative Religion in Smith College. MacMillian Company.

We have taken much interest in reading the contents of this volume. They were probably delivered as lectures before the college young ladies. They present Bible history from Abraham to the beginning of the Hebrew monarchy as clustering around great national heroes and leaders. The characters of the pre-mosaic patriarchs are presented and then Moses and Joshua and a number of the judges, closing with Samson. The geographical survey he presents of the countries and places in which men and events are located add much to the educational value of the book. His presumptions as to the authorship and redactions of Bible records are obtrusively gratuitous. The volume entertains and gives much information, but no one in reading it will have his faith in the truthfulness of Bible history clarified and strengthened.

"The Story of Abraham as told by his Son Isaac."

By Edward Leigh Pell. Fleming H. Revell Company.

Another of a series of Bible stories by the same author. We recently reviewed his "Autobiography of Paul." In this booklet the author taxes his imagination sometimes more than is necessary to make the recital interesting and faithful to "what is written." This is especially true of the first chapter. The courtship of Rebecca and the near sacrifice of Isaac, also the death of Abraham are described in a vividly dramatic form, full of oriental humor and pathos.

"Hide and Seek."

By Christopher Morley. George H. Doran and Co.

This brief volume of verse by the versatile New York "columnist," Christopher Morley, is delightful in its diversity of moods and cleverness of wit. The poems included range from well-constructed sonnets, several of them of quite serious content, to frivolous, humorous comments on modern foibles as viewed on the Rialto. A third section of the volume is devoted to pseudo-translations from the Chinese pungent, epigrammatic verse of fable-like simplicity.

"Sonnets and Other Poems."

By Henry Aylett Thompson. George H. Doran Company.

'Tis said that the sonnet is the most difficult form in which to present poetic thoughts and imagery and that few after Shakespeare and Milton have succeeded in doing so. This author comes as near a success in his undertakings as do many of our favorite poets. The lyrics and ballads have the odor of the fields and gardens.

"The Fourth Dimension."

By Horace Annesly Vachell. George H. Doran Co.

Within the covers of this book we have exhibited the personal problem of a talented girl, attractive and ambitious, stagnating in a stodgy English country village, with no relief but that provided by dull, conventional middle-class society. An opening for escape comes with the unexpected success of an amateur play, The Great Actor of his time, present as the guest of the Rector, makes it possible to test out the fresh talent in a Manchester repertory company. Success there leads to the final victory a London success. Then comes the turmoil.

Obituary

EVA E. HOWLETT

On April 18th Miss Howlett, long and lovingly known in Wakefield, Mass., followed the brother whose passing, nine months earlier, had severed the close companionship of a lifetime.

Broad in her understanding of human nature, quick and sympathetic in her perception of its needs, for 48 years she served with rare success as a public school teacher. Men in various walks of life gratefully acknowledge her influence in the Bible School where, as a teacher, firm in her faith, strong in her convictions, and gentle in her judgments, she impressed her fragrant personality upon them and led them to the source of her own strength and courage. From its very beginning until failing health caused her to relinquish the work, she was an enthusiastic and faithful teacher in the Italian Mission. With unselfish devotion she gave herself in school, and church, and home.

A Book of Remembrance is written in the hearts of all those privileged to draw close in friendship to this quiet gentlewoman.

MARY'S GUARDIAN ANGEL (Unrolls a scroll and reads impressively those wonderful verses in Isaiah 60:1-6, 19, 20 which she has written there, but has largely memorized beforehand. As she reads this dramatically, Mary rouses from her sleep and goes over to join the group by the tree. When the reading is over)—

MARY (Comes forward)—I'm sure not one of you has been asleep, as I have been, to the fact that Christmas is a day for all the earth, not just for a selected neighborhood. For I see presents in your hands, dear presents that will call the little children of the world inside our mission walls—dear presents that will cause those happy children to run out and bring the mothers of the world within the light of Him who was mankind's first Christmas candle. Go, RAIN-DEARS! Go, little CHILDREN of the world—collect their presents!"

RAIN-DEARS (Invert their open umbrellas to form scoop-like receptacles. The little CHILDREN of the world go among the audience collecting the gifts and depositing them in the Rain-Dears' umbrellas, while all sing to the tune of "Marching Through Georgia," the chorus)
Oh give, oh give!
Yes, give in Jesus name;
Oh give, oh give!
And start the candle flame
To light the Christmas trees around
The whole wide waiting earth—
While we are marching to meet you.

* * *

NOTE—The presents should be placed by the Rain-Dears around the Christmas tree, after which they may be opened by the audience and admired. Also, Christmas carols may be sung around the tree: "Holy Night! Silent Night!" "It Came Upon a Midnight Clear," etc.

OUR MUSIC CORNER

CONDUCTED BY

ATTENTION MUSICIANS!

Fresh from the press of the publishing firm of Frederick A. Stokes Company, of New York, comes a volume that should be studied by all interested in music. Specifically it is written for violinists by the greatest violin teacher of today—Leopold Auer. But the scope of this remarkable volume is much wider than any class—the illuminating chapter on “Style” well merits the careful consideration of all musicians, whether singers, violinists, or what-not!

When a master mind such as this puts down in understandable print the priceless wisdom drawn from many years of teaching and playing, years of unique and close association with the great personalities of the musical world, knowledge gained from contact with the finest violin talent of the last half century as loyal pupils, truly the result is to be approached with something of reverence. Any man that can point to such a gallery of products as Eddy Brown, Isolde Menges, Mischa Elman, Ruth Ray, Thelma Given, Jascha Heifetz, Toscha Seidel, Max Rosen, Efram Zimbalist, Kathleen Parlow, to enumerate but a few, most surely speaks with authority as to his chosen subject.

For the practical violinist, there is a wealth of technical material, admirably expressed and explained; the chapter devoted to “Harmonics” is fascinating, and the material gathered in the pages titled “Bowing” should be of value to all players of the “Instrument with the Soul.” But of more general value are the pages devoted to an eloquent exposition of the writer’s artistic ideals. I cannot see how any student can read these glowing pages without feeling the contagion of high ideals, and a new determination to win to the high places of music. To quote from the publisher’s announcement:—

In “Violin Playing as I Teach It,” Professor Auer for the first time reveals in print the principles practiced by his famous pupils. Simply and directly he sets forth for every student and lover of the violin these essentials, which hitherto he has imparted only by word of mouth. The legacy of a teaching whose results speak so eloquently for themselves on the present-day concert stage is now within the reach of every player of the violin.

And every student and player of the violin will do well to heed this announcement, for the book is not one that any musician can afford to overlook. The volume is substantial in make-up, well printed, illustrated with handsome half-tones of some ten prominent pupils, as well as with many musical diagrams and quotations, and includes a detailed analysis of the repertoire of his chosen instrument.

A SUCCESSFUL CONCERT

From the First Baptist Church of Everett, Wash., comes a report of an organ concert given Tuesday evening, May 24, by the organist of the church—Arthur E. James—assisted by Mrs. N. C. Gregerson, soprano, Miss Erma G. Greene, Reader, Bert C. Harvey, accompanist, and the Orpheus Quartet—Katharine Reed and Esther Sather, sopranos, Mary Shumaker and Bessie Cooley Albert, altos, with Rosa Zimmerman as accompanist. The large auditorium of the church and the immense balcony were both packed by an enthusiastic audience, which evidently appreciated the excellent and pleasing program provided.

FROM LONG ISLAND

Another fine program comes from the Richmond Hill Baptist Church, Richmond Hill, L. I., announcing the fifth annual spring concert given by the choir, assisted by Mrs. William E. Clark, soprano, Mr. Henry Barreuther, cellist, assisted by Miss Frances Loomis Knight, accompanist, and directed by Mr. H. Miller Munson, director. The date was Thursday evening, May 19, and the success was well earned. Together with a most inspiring issue of the local magazine published by the choir for themselves, Mr. Munson sends a very interesting letter which I am reprinting below for its general interest.

Mr. William Lester: Perhaps it might interest you, in conjunction with the article that appeared in your column on April 23, to know that there is a choir, numbering sixty, located in Richmond Hill, L. I., that it sings three anthems every Sunday in the Richmond Hill Baptist Church, and that the director does not direct, but rather contributes whatever little ability he has in singing tenor. This arrangement is now in its sixth year, and while predictions of disaster were plentiful when the plan was first suggested by the writer, (particularly as the only paid singer is the soprano soloist, and the others volunteers) yet it worked from the start, and is now only commented on by those who attend our services for the first time.

Last evening we gave our fifth annual spring concert, and as our facilities would permit of no better arrangement, the piano was at the back of the choir, with the pianist’s back to the singers, and the numbers on the enclosed program were sung without any direction, and with pleasing results, if we may judge from the compliments heaped upon us at the conclusion of the concert.

Let me add that at the church services the only direction we have from the organist, is a nod of the head to indicate when to rise.

The Choir Bulletin sent herewith is a new venture with us, but one that we believe is to prove a source of much interest to the members and friends.

Let me heartily endorse the sentiments expressed by your correspondent about the antics of Directors detracting from what might otherwise be very enjoyable musical accomplishments.

I should like to add that to secure results by the above mentioned plan, it is absolutely necessary to have the hearty co-operation of a competent organist. Needless to say, in Miss Knight, we have every thing that could be desired.

H. M. Munson

* * *

Every progressive organist will welcome the successive issues of the excellent “American Organ Monthly,” issued by this front-rank publishing company. Under the expert editorship of Mr. Barnes, this venture, now just turned its first year of age, has achieved a definite place for itself in the musical life of this country. The music published therein has been catholic in taste, of high quality, and of great practical value. The special articles have been of keen interest and wide variety. The March issue is no exception to the rule. It is to be hoped that the organist fraternity will flock to the financial support of this monthly—it fills a definite void in its field. It is first class!

The Ministers and Missionaries Benefit Board

Incorporated 1913

WHAT IT IS—The Board consists of twenty-one members appointed by the Northern Baptist Convention.

WHAT IT DOES—"The objects of the corporation shall be to administer its funds for the benefit of worthy Baptist ministers and Baptist missionaries, their wives or widows, and their dependent children."

We enthusiastically acclaim the young missionaries departing for their fields.

We hail the young men entering the ministry.

This Board helps to provide for the returning missionary worn out in the service and for the aged preacher after his long and self-sacrificing career.

HOW YOU CAN HELP US TO HELP THEM

1. A gift to the Permanent Fund, the income to be used perpetually.
  2. A gift to the Current Fund for immediate use.
  3. Annuity Bonds which provide an income for yourself as long as you live and at your decease the income will be used in the work.

Do You Know These Facts?

Every Baptist ought to know these facts in the work of the American Baptist Foreign Mission Society and the Woman's American Baptist Foreign Mission Society

MISSIONS

Ten missions are now maintained in Burma, Assam, South India, Bengal-Orissa, South China, East China, West China, Japan, Belgian Congo and the Philippines. In these fields are 129 stations and 3,300 outstations. Aid is also given to the Baptists in Europe. A large relief work is being undertaken in several countries in Europe.

MISSIONARIES

Eight hundred and thirty-six men and women represent Northern Baptists as missionaries in this great world service. These include ordained ministers, physicians, teachers, industrial and agricultural experts, business managers, printers and several builders. Their salaries depend on your continued gifts. They are assisted by 6,979 native workers. There are also 2,690 workers in Europe.

YOUR OWN REPRESENTATIVE

More than two hundred missionaries are definitely supported by churches or individuals, who thereby consider them as their own foreign representatives. You and your church can also have your representative on the foreign field.

EVANGELISM

In 1919 on all fields 10,145 converts were baptized. In non-Christian lands 194,373 members are enrolled in 1,834 regular Baptist churches, of which 1,027, or 56 per cent., are self-supporting. Preliminary statistical reports for 1920 indicate a continuance of this gratifying progress.

MEDICINE

Twenty-four hospitals and sixty-two dispensaries are maintained and are in charge of fifty-five medical missionaries, assisted by 160 American and native nurses. More than 146,000 patients received treatment during the past year.

EDUCATION

There are 2,737 schools, including 4 colleges, 32 seminaries and training schools, with a total enrollment of over 89,000 pupils. Sunday schools number 2,396, with 101,717 pupils. Each year large numbers of these pupils become followers of Christ. Missionaries have translated the Bible into over thirty dialects and languages. Three printing plants publish Bibles, periodicals and other literature.

INDUSTRY

Along with the necessity of leading men and women to Christ exists the need of providing means of self-support. Several industrial schools teach brickmaking, building, tailoring, farming, bookbinding, carpentering, ironwork, engineering and surveying.

PROPERTY

A work as large and as varied as this needs considerable material equipment to make it effective and to guarantee permanent results. Missionaries must have homes; schools require buildings, equipment and libraries; congregations need preaching halls and chapels; doctors require dispensaries and hospitals. For evangelistic touring there must be provided outfits, consisting of horses, tents, wagons, motorcycles, automobiles, etc.—all needed for carrying the message to the people in the cities and villages, mountains and jungles.

The Outstanding Need on every field
MEN and WOMEN

38 missionaries are needed for evangelistic work in China, Japan, Africa, the Philippines and British India

10 stations are vacant in Burma, 3 in Japan, 7 in Assam and 9 in South India

WHO WILL RESPOND?

THIS IS YOUR WORK

The schools are yours, the hospitals are yours, the encouraging progress is yours—if you are contributing your gifts and offering your prayers to make this enterprise possible. The two foreign mission societies are your agents in this work of bringing the saving gospel of Christ to the non-Christian world. Make your gift this year commensurate with your love, for the results of the work of the missionaries depend on the gifts and the prayers of the Christians at home.

THE MORNING MOON

AT this witching hour, the moon, which has spread its radiance abroad during half the night, still shines in full splendor awaiting the day. How calm the scene! It is the artistic handiwork of nature painted for those of her children who haunt the dawn. He who has reclined under the great trees in the moonlight at daybreak, watching the sheep as they rise from their grassy couches and stroll along the slope, has beheld one of the magnificences of God.

Fresh from the Field

Miss Virginia Hamilton, daughter of a Southern Baptist minister of Atlanta, a student in Richmond, Virginia, has organized a sorority which pledges its members not to dance and to discourage dancing in others. The society has already enrolled more than 1100 Southern Baptist girls and is growing rapidly. Miss Hamilton will spend her summer vacation in the extension of the society.—The United Presbyterian.

The First Baptist church of Ft. Worth, Texas, claims to have the largest Sabbath school in the world, having outstripped the Methodist school of Brazil, Indiana and the Christian school of Canton, Ohio, which have respectively held the palm. The Ft. Worth school meets in three different buildings. The men's class studies in a theater. The young people have a three-story building equipped like a Y. M. C. A. The attendance has risen to 3,337.—The United Presbyterian.

Miss Elizabeth Amy McKinney, daughter of Rev. and Mrs. E. R. McKinney, of Eau Claire, Wisconsin, was united in marriage recently to Mr. Milton B. Lindberg, of Hibbing, Minnesota. Mr. Lindberg is a son of a Baptist minister, Rev. Mr. Lindberg of Los Angeles, who served Swedish churches in Minnesota many years. The fathers of both the bride and groom officiated in the ceremony.

Several prominent clergymen, representing the Committee on Reduction of Armaments of the Church Peace Union, went to Washington to present to President Harding a petition signed by 20,503 Protestant ministers, Catholic priests, and Jewish Rabbis. They had an appointment to see the President at the White House at 12:45 Wednesday, June 22. The petition asks the President and Congress to call an international conference to discuss reduction of armaments. The signatures were gathered by mail by the Church Peace Union from all over the country.

Mr. William A. Phillips who is going as a missionary to the Tura Station in Assam, India, was ordained in the First Baptist church of Wheaton, Ill., on Sunday evening, June 19. The ordination sermon was preached by Dr. J. P. Abbott a professor in the Northern Baptist Theological Seminary. The ordaining prayer was by Rev. C. H. Wareham of Glen Ellyn, charge to the candidate by Rev. J. J. Reeve, formerly professor in the Theological Seminary at Waco, Texas. Dr. S. T. Ford, pastor of the church gave the hand of fellowship. An interesting feature of the service was the baptism by the newly ordained minister of his wife who accompanies him to his missionary field. Mr. Phillips is a recent graduate of the Divinity School of The University of Chicago.

A legacy of several thousand dollars has just been lost to The American Baptist Home Mission Society because the lawyer who was urged by his client to investigate carefully said that if the expression Baptist Home Missions was put in the will it would be sufficient. The woman intended this money to go to "the American Baptist Home Mission Society."

The "Army and Navy Register," Washington, D. C., of this week states that Chaplain Frank C. Rideout, U. S. A., who is stationed at the Army War College at Fort Leavenworth, Kansas, is granted two months leave of absence with permission to leave the United States. After attending the Northern Baptist Convention at Des Moines, Iowa, Chaplain and Mrs. Rideout will take a trip through the Canadian Rockies to the Pacific coast. He will supply the First Church of Vancouver, B. C., Rev. Gabriel Reed McGuire, pastor, the last two Sundays in July.

Evangelistic Conference

The fourth Evangelistic Conference, conducted by Dr. Stilwell, superintendent of the department of Evangelism of the Home Mission Society, was held Sunday and Monday, preceding the convention.

Dr. Carl D. Case, of Oak Park, Ill., sounded the keynote of the conference at the Sunday morning service, when he spoke on "The Message of Evangelism." It is summed up in John 3:16. Each one of us may enter into personal relationship with Jesus Christ, and this produces life in us. This is the message that our evangelism must stress.

Sunday afternoon a quiet hour was held when all sought a deeper realization of the great truths upon which our evangelism is founded. Rev. A. B. Strickland, of Pennsylvania, spoke on "The Dynamic of Evangelism." This is found in the co-operation of the Holy Spirit. "All power shall be given unto you," is Jesus' promise to his disciples.

Rev. York A. King, dwelt upon the necessity of associated prayer. Out of the experiences of his own ministry, he showed how united prayer had been the means of winning souls for Christ.

Sunday evening, Dr. E. A. Hanley, of Rochester, showed how Jesus Christ himself must be the Interpreter of the evangelistic message. It is only as we make Christ live in the hearts and lives of men that we have the real interpretation of our message.

This address was followed by a stirring message from Rev. C. O. Johnson, of Takoma, Washington, showing the universality of the evangel. It is universal in its need, its provision and its proclamation. It is therefore the great and supreme mission of the church.

Monday forenoon the more practical side of the subject was treated. Rev. S. J. Reid, of Oregon emphasized the motives of evangelism. This is found in the desire Christians have to make their Christ known to others. To bring a smile to the face of Jesus is our joy.

Rev. E. LeRoy Dakin, of West Virginia, followed with an address on "The Courage of Evangelism." We must always remember we are the messengers of a mighty King. Our mission is a noble one. We have nothing to apologize for. It also takes courage to separate ourselves from the petty details that tend to involve us, and give ourselves wholly to the message we are commissioned to preach.

Rev. S. G. Neil, of Philadelphia, closed the afternoon session with a message on "The Victory of Evangelism." The Protestant pulpit is prophetic in nature. If the church has lost its power it must re-establish the prophetic office of its pulpit.

At the closing session, Monday afternoon, Miss Jessie Burrill, of Missouri brought a breezy message on "The Evangelism of Life." The membership of our churches must back up their pastors in evangelistic work, by their godly living, by their prayers, and by their constant witnessing to the truth of the evangelistic

Dr. E. Y. Mullins of Louisville, followed with a ringing appeal on "Evangelism, the Supreme Service." There is no higher form of service for the Christian than spreading the knowledge of the life and teachings of Jesus Christ.

The Conference was largely attended and participated in by a large number of pastors and Christian workers.

Pastors Confer Over Problems

(Reported by Alvin G. House)

More and more the annual meeting of the Pastors' Conference is coming to be regarded as a vital fraternity of the work of the Convention. It was held this year at Des Moines, Monday, June 20 at the First Baptist Church.

Dr. A. T. Fowler of Orange, N. J., presided. "We want to make this conference a helpful one to all our pastors," said he in his president's address. "The hope to have regional conferences in our Northern Baptist Convention for a devotional uplift and moral aid to all of you."

President Weeks of Bacove College spoke on "The Spiritual Life of the Minister." "The Spiritual life in any minister depends on certain conditions," said Dr. Weeks. He mentioned (1) a personal experience of Jesus Christ as a personal Saviour; (2) the Bible and his interpretation of it, (3) his keeping his trust with God. "It is just as important that we keep our appointments with God as that we keep those with our church committees or our congregation," declared Dr. Weeks under this point. Finally, he said (4), "The spiritual life of the minister depends on his constant proclaiming the fact and presence of God." "He must witness for God."

At this time it was decided to meet for the business session Thursday afternoon, to hear reports of committees, elect officers, etc.

Dr. Ambrose M. Bailey of Seattle, Wash., spoke on "The Place of the Minister in These Reconstruction Days." "Some subject," said President Fowler, on introducing Dr. Bailey, "and one that we all want help on." Dr. Bailey told the ministers that one of the great epochs of the world's history began in the dark twilight of Aug. 1, 1914. The place of the minister in these days of reconstruction will be the old, old place of the Lord's prophets. He must render a sacrificial service. It must be a place of vision, sanity and leadership. "We can give the answer to the world today as to the way out—and we only." "The place of the minister is one of honest privilege, and opportunity."

This address, the closing one of the conference, was personally presented and practical in its application throughout.

Attendance was large at this, the really first annual Pastors' Conference. It will be held in the future in connection with and just previous to the convention. It reveals the felt need in the lives of our pastors for a season of fellowship together and the uplift by inspiring and illuminating addresses.

Killam was still at Des Moines when we went to press. No copy has come for his kolum. In order that the readers of THE BAPTIST may not be entirely overcome by lugubrious reflections, the associate editor who has the responsibility of punning the ranch just now has sought for something appropriate to fill the kolum. It speaks for itself. Take a look at it,

Salerno Needs Vacation Right Away

(With Greetings to the Northern Baptist Convention)

Salerno jus' got back today from Baptees State Convention,

An' raves all time about sometheengs—too much to mak' da mention;

He says, "Wat's use to geeve up time an' pay firs' class attention,

To crowd wat only chews da rag an' makes da fierce contention?"

Spurduto ees got back also weeth heart so light as feather,

He praises peepke where he stayed an' God for splendid weather;

"Een crowd so beeg" he tell me, "dere'll be some weeth head of leather,

But wen dey talk eet over, den dey hav' grand get-together."

Guisseppe, he's all for tell hees frands 'bout Dr. Barbour's speaking,

Da house ees full enside da door weeth some thru weendows peeking;

To help men love deir God an' fellowmen, dat's all he's seeking,

An' cause da oil of joy een life to keep da boards from creaking.

Bambino says eet all was good, but one man dere was classy,

Tall, hansum fella weeth nice hair—from Brooklyn, Dr. Masse;

"Ah, dat's da man can preach all time an' not get wild or gassy,

An' breeng good cheer to every last salvation lad an' lassie."

Salerno sneers—eet maks heem mad lik' wat you call da hatter,

"To hear dese fellas shoot da mouth an' cause deir words to scatter;"

He says he knows weethout da doubt dere's something ees da matter, Dat every State Convention ees beeg time of noise an' clatter.

Myself, I theenk dat peepke find jus' dat for wheech dey look,

Fundamentals Conference at Des Moines

Pan-American Assembly adopts New Creed, an Abstract of two Historic Baptist Confessions—Strong leaders from North, South and Canada confer and debate—Same executive committee is continued—Will carry on a campaign among the churches of North America.

WELL, the fundamentals conference has come and gone.

About 700 people assembled at the Auditorium in Des Moines at 9:30 a. m., June 21 with Rev. J. C. Massee in the chair, for the second fundamentals conference preceding the Northern Baptist Convention. During the sessions the attendance grew to more than 1000.

Chairman Massee read a survey of the work of the movement during the last year; declared that there is a threatening cleavage in the Northern Convention along doctrinal, educational and ecclesiastical lines; and argued that the time has come when these issues that have been in dispute must come to a decision. Criticizing the schools he narrated the story of several young people of his acquaintance whose faith had been destroyed in a Baptist school, and presented a long list of fundamental errors in their teaching. "Unitarianism stands for the Fatherhood of God, the brotherhood of man and the neighborhood of Harvard," he quoted from somebody. He announced as an ultimatum to the denomination, "Agree definitely on the fundamentals or divide; there is no alternative." He proposed with reference to the schools either that they be excluded from participation in the New World Movement, thus assuming responsibility for their own endowment and support, or that a creed be adopted and every teacher in the schools required to sign it. He further said that he saw signs of the development of a bureaucracy in the control of the Northern Baptist Convention, but proposed no remedy.

Prof. Sampey's Awakener

On the subject, "What the Old Testament Meant to Jesus," Prof. John R. Sampey of the Southern Baptist Theological Seminary presented a popular, scholarly and thoroughly stimulating survey of Jesus' valuation, interpretation and use of the Bible as he knew it. After tracing the qualifications of Jesus as Bible interpreter, the speaker exclaimed, "I'll follow him against all the consensus criticism of all the ages." There was enthusiastic applause at this expression of loyalty to Jesus, but another statement fell pretty flat. It was this: "The imperfections of progressive revelation due to the errors of sinful men did not disturb Jesus. In spite of them he interpreted revelation in the light of the higher spiritual realities it conveys. He fulfilled the scripture in its great internality." Men fairly held their breath at the clearness and boldness of the speaker's words. A member of the conference sitting near this reporter leaned across and whispered, "In the light of that statement, this conference is out of place; it ought to adjourn."

Prof. Jacob Heinrichs of the Northern Baptist Theological Seminary read an essay in the approved style of the divinity schools on the "Authenticity and Authority of the Bible." It was intrinsically worthy of a good hearing, but the audience was not interested in it, and while he talked, dozens of people were reading the first edition of the DAILY BAPTIST.

The most sensational address of the conference was given by Rev. T. T. Shields of Canada. He is one of the most astute of controversialists. He shows his opponent neither fairness nor mercy. He would make an ideal political campaigner in a campaign in which the only consideration is victory without much regard to the way in which it is won. Slow and careful in speech, with epigrammatic phrases he pictured the B "modernist" as guilty of a long list of perversions of faith and life, called him a "Jonah who will neither preach the message God gave him nor let anybody else preach it," and said that the only way to calm the present storm is to "cast this Jonah overboard." "Unless you are going to surrender everything precious to yourselves as Christians, you must fight, and you had better do it now," exclaimed Dr. Shields; and the applause indicated that his audience was feeling the same way about the matter.

Rev. D. F. Rittenhouse of Columbus, Ohio, spoke on "Proof of the Resurrection and Its Meaning to the Ministry," presenting in a long and elaborate oration the usual Bible argument, in the style of a young man with remarkable oratorical gifts.

Then came the event for which all before had been but a preparation. Dr. Frank M. Goodchild, representing the executive committee of the movement presented a statement of doctrine in the terms following:

A CONFESSION OF FAITH

The adoption of a creed to which allegiance is demanded would be contrary to our historic Baptist principles and repugnant to our deepest spiritual instincts. On the other hand the adoption of a confession of faith, as a standard about which our Baptist people may rally, is consistent with the practice of our fathers from the earliest days of our denominational history. Living in a day of doubt, unbelief and irreligion, we feel that the time has come for Baptists publicly to reaffirm their faith in the great fundamentals. As Baptists and members of churches connected with the Northern Baptist Convention, we desire to restate the foundation doctrines of our faith in the following brief and simple confession which is but a re-affirmation of the substance of the historic Philadelphia and New Hampshire Confessions of Faith:

1. We believe that the Bible is God's word that it was written by men divinely inspired, and that it has supreme authority in all matters of faith and conduct.

2. We believe in God the Father, perfect in holiness, infinite in wisdom, measureless in power. We rejoice that he concerns himself mercifully in the affairs of men, that he hears and answers prayer, and that he saves from sin and death all who come to him through Jesus Christ.

3. We believe in Jesus Christ, God's only begotten Son, miraculous in his birth, sinless in his life, making atonement for the sins of the world by his death. We believe in his bodily resurrection, his ascension into heaven, his perpetual intercession for his people and his personal visible return to the world according to his promise.

4. We believe in the Holy Spirit who came forth from God to convince the world of sin, of righteousness and of judgment, and to regenerate, sanctify and comfort those who believe in Jesus Christ.

5. We believe that all men by nature and by choice are sinners but that "God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten son that whosoever believeth in him should not perish but have everlasting life;" we believe therefore that those who accept Christ as Savior and Lord will rejoice forever in God's presence and those who refuse to accept Christ as Savior and Lord will be forever separated from God.

6. We believe in the church—a living spiritual body of which Christ is the head and of which all regenerated people are members. We believe that a visible church is a company of believers in Jesus Christ, baptized on a credible confession of faith, and associated for worship, work and fellowship. We believe that to these visible churches were committed, for perpetual observance, the ordinances of baptism and the Lord's Supper, and that God has laid upon these churches the task of persuading a lost world to accept Jesus Christ as Savior, and to enthroned him as the Lord and Master. We believe that all human betterment and social improvement are the inevitable by-products of such a gospel.

7. We believe that every human being has direct relations with God, and is responsible to God alone in all matters of faith; that each church is independent and autonomous and must be free from interference by any ecclesiastical or political authority; that therefore Church and State must be kept separate as having different functions, each fulfilling its duties free from the dictation or patronage of the other.

Pros and Cons in Tug of War

Chairman Massee announced that this statement was submitted by the executive committee to the house for acceptance or rejection but that amendments to it could not be considered. Dr. Goodchild moved its adoption and supported his motion in a militant speech. Then broke out one of the keenest debates, in which men in profound earnestness, but with little acrimony, urged arguments pro and con. Pros argued the importance of a definite doctrinal statement. Cons plead liberty. Cons said, "This is dangerous ground; it is audacious; it is unbaptistic; it is cramming a predigested creed down our throats; it will divide our churches." Pros replied, "If a man is going to teach my children, I have a right to know what he will teach them; creeds are thoroughly baptistic; the proposed statement is merely a digest of the New Hampshire and Philadelphia Confessions; for lack of some such standard our churches are already being divided." Finally, while men were clamoring to be heard, and amid great confusion, the chairman closed debate and put the question to

No, We Did Not Divide

ALL sorts of dire prophecies preceded the meeting of the Northern Baptist Convention. Fear of actual division was widely felt.

When, a few weeks ago, THE BAPTIST indicated confidence in a fraternal issue of the discussions then running, if not raging, people regarded that forecast as a piece of morbid optimism.

But please observe the outcome.

There were at least three matters that held explosive possibilities: a doctrinal statement, the acceptance of a creedal trust and the report on schools.

Discussion had proceeded far enough to reveal the facts that the most tenacious religious loyalty was arrayed on either side, that the controversy was grounded in deep Christian sincerity, and that neither victory nor compromise could settle it.

The only possible basis on which it could be composed was to compare views without the least concealment, evasion or super-sensitiveness, in an earnest effort to reach a common understanding.

Great progress has been made in the direction of such a program.

First, the report of the committee on schools was so judicial, so luminous and so thoroughly creditable to our schools as to be highly reassuring.

Then the confession put forth by the conference on fundamentals was so temperate, as compared with many extreme statements that fulminated from unauthorized sources, that it could only be regarded as the expression of a wish to find common ground in theological moderation.

Finally, hot as the debate was over the question of a creedal trust, it issued in the reasonable agreement to refer the subject to a special committee charged with the duty of making a thorough investigation.

It may seem surprising to persons only superficially acquainted with the Baptist temperament, to discover that no difference in elemental religious convictions came out in debate. Analysis showed that the question at issue was largely one of method: How to safeguard Baptist principles of faith and life.

We are finding the way. Baptist democracy is on the road to a sublime self-vindication.

The Verdict of the Schools

THE committee on the schools has made its report. To the Northern Baptist Convention and the report has been received and the committee discharged. A minority report was also received. This report was not out of accord with the other but merely stressed certain conclusions. But for certain technicalities, it could easily have been received as a supplement to the other.

The findings of the report are surprisingly favorable to the colleges and seminaries, as anybody will discover who takes the trouble to get the complete document. Our schools and colleges, according to these findings, are not hot-beds of scepticism, but are doing a magnificent work for their students and giving to us efficient Christian leaders. There have been discovered, of course, possibilities of improvement, but this does not contradict the main findings.

The committee has found also that these schools and seminaries are intimately bound up with the churches of the sections in which they are located and that, if there is anything about them which is disturbing, the remedy is already in the hands of the denomination. Public opinion in the churches belonging to their constituency can, if it is awakened, accomplish everything. How much in accord with Baptist practice this is! The local church is subject to no higher authority. So the seminary and the college belongs to the place or section in which it is located. It will be as sound and as efficient as local opinion demands.

This report is wholesome. It should help greatly to clear the air of rumor and general charges. Our schools are worthy of our confidence and our help. If hereafter a man makes charges, he should be asked for his evidence and should be compelled to produce it. On the other hand these various institutions must realize that the denomination has come to feel a new sense of ownership in and responsibility for them. A magnificent opportunity for making them Christian in the largest and best sense is open and must not be neglected. The faculties have before them the opportunity of working with the churches in their areas for the promotion of the best Christian life in the students. And the churches of the areas served must realize in a larger measure than has been common that they have obligations towards their colleges and theological seminaries.

The committee is to be thanked for the arduous work it has performed and the able, constructive and thoroughly Baptist report it has presented.

Gift with Creedal Attachments

NO question bulked larger in the convention at Des Moines than that of the reception of gifts by denominational organizations when creedal conditions were attached to such gifts. The meeting of the Home Mission Society endorsed the action of the Board in accepting such a gift to which attention has recently been called. But the discussion and the divided vote made it absolutely clear that there is far from being unity of sentiment on this matter.

Following the course which has proved so satisfactory in the matter of the schools, the convention has therefore appointed a committee which shall study this matter in all its phases during the year and report its findings to the next annual convention for such action as that body may care to make. The resolution ordering this action is as follows:

"Resolved, that the Northern Baptist Convention refers to the boards of the co-operating organizations and the Ministers and Missionaries Benefit Board, and the Board of Education the whole subject of recommending to the convention a policy in regard to receiving, holding and administering any gifts or trust funds to which doctrinal conditions are attached and that said boards report at the next meeting of the convention; and that the board of the American Baptist Home Mission Society be requested to convene the boards herein named for the consideration of said subject."

Several things are accomplished by this action. For one thing, it is made likely that a common policy may be found for all of our great national organizations. For another, it is made certain that in a matter so vital and far-reaching as this is, there will be no snap judgment but rather conclusions based upon the most careful and prayerful thought. The subject has a great many angles and all should be considered.

It is good that the question is to be handled in this way. The committee is very large and representative of all schools of thought within our Baptist churches. We have the assurance that all precedents will be noted and that the bearing of the acceptance of such gifts upon Baptist principles will be thoroughly considered. We have a year in which the members of our churches may discuss this matter calmly and dispassionately. And then, at the end, the matter will be referred back to our great democratic body for decision. This procedure is wholesome.

May it not be noted also that we are fast establishing a precedent as to the manner in which important matters of this kind shall be considered and decided? The Lord has manifestly blessed the procedure in the case of the schools; let us pray for a similar leadership in this matter. We Baptists are too great a body and have too important a witness to bear to the world to decide matters of the first importance in a mass meeting until they have first been discussed in our churches and been given the most patient consideration by a large and representative committee.

Did the Cat Escape from the Bag

WHEN a nation through senility or stupidity becomes unable to see when it is either ridiculous or wicked, notify the undertaker.

This funeral reflection is prompted by the recently reported speech of Gen. Leonard Wood to the Rotarians. He is quoted:

"America is determined to have a share of the world's commerce, supported by a merchant marine and an adequate navy, notwithstanding the costly delay when the world's trade was within her grasp."

Bravo! The Kaiser in his prime could not surpass that sentiment.

Whatever may have been the causes of the last war, the public is invited to inspect beforehand the cause of the next one. It is to be a perfectly sordid blood-letting, forced by the imperialists of America to secure trade—and with no apologies.

Sanctity will cover the deed of course, because it will be committed in the interest of our own glorious nation, self-advertised as the custodian of international morality.

Yesterday we were fighting a holy war for humanity. Not a thing did we want that any other nation had. Tomorrow we shall be fighting another holy war because there is nothing any other nation has that we do not want.

And so help us! what we want we intend to have, even if in getting it we must treat the rest of the world as we have treated Hayti.

With Admiral Sims flinging open the barn door, Ambassador Harvey banging the monkey cage and Gen. Wood untying the bag that holds the cat, Uncle Sam is having a deal of trouble with his menagerie.

Hate to Admit It?

WOMEN as jurors engage the interest of the Cincinnati Times-Star. It remarks that they are apt to convict, and says:

"This conclusion goes against a widely-held theory that women are soft-hearted, sentimental and easily cajoled, and that their induction into all the rights and duties of citizenship would mean hectic politics and easier sledding for wrong-doers. But this theory has already been crimped. Instead of qualifying as a feather-headed radical, the woman voter has shown her true colors as a conservative. Men may hate to admit it, but it looks as if the presence of women in the jury box would make, in the long run, for truer verdicts and a more rigorous justice—a thing much needed here, as any comparison with European court procedure declares. Men are apt to be compromisers in business and sentimentalists outside of it. There is nothing so downright as a woman."

What sort of men has that editor been choosing for his associates?

Among forward-looking men, men of insight into human spirits and human rights, the capacity of woman for all the duties of citizenship has long been clearly understood.

We have expected her to give a good account of herself at the ballot box, the jury box and the contribution box.

And she is fulfilling all reasonable expectations.

Are not the trustees of our church property at least morally responsible for the safeguarding of the property which belongs to the organization?

Our Fellowship in Christ

Keynote address in the Northern Baptist Convention at Des Moines, Iowa, June 23, 1921—The Motto of the Convention was "Fellowship in Christ"—"We are all in the same boat"—But, Truth is more than a formula.

BY REV. CHARLES N. ARBUCKLE

ONE of the most significant disclosures of modern life is that of the interdependence of mankind. The time has gone by when one can ever reasonably believe that either men or nations can live in perfect independence and prosper. It is not long since it was possible for a man to live pretty much to himself because he did almost everything for himself. He produced his own food, built his own shelter, spun and wove his own cloth, made his own clothes, and educated his own children. History however, shows that as man progresses he tends more and more to specialization, doing but one thing well, and depending upon others for the many things which he has hitherto done for himself. This fact of interdependence so obvious in our complex society, today, but emphasizes the great scriptural truth that no man lives to himself; that he is his brother's keeper; that we rise or fall together.

When we transfer this principle, operative in all life, to the Christian community, we have what we have come to know as Christian fellowship. We are all in the same boat, fellows in the same ship. We are all concerned in the same voyage of life, we all must weather the same storms, we all hope for the same haven. We call it our fellowship in Christ, because it is he who inspires and circumscribes the interests that make us one.

Look at Life as He Saw It

As individuals we seek for a community of interest with Christ as a basis for our fellowship with him. We try to look at life as he saw it, to feel toward the needs of men as he felt, to undertake his tasks and to trust God as he trusted him. So as a community, a church or a denomination, we find that our true fellowship in Christ comes from pooling our common interests in him, and from recognizing our common stake in him. Let us look then at some of the things which we have in common in him and which constitute the real and vital bond of our fellowship.

1. Our fellowship in the truth. Truth is not a formula, a definition, a prescription, although these forms may be essential to our effort to convey the knowledge of the truth one to another. Truth is the ultimate reality of things. In the spiritual realm it is the basic spiritual experience of a man, intensely real, even though it baffle his understanding. Spiritual truth is the fact of love, of hope, of courage, of patience, of joy, of peace. It is the soul's achievement of spiritual reality.

"Lord, Lord!" May be Just Words

In Christ we find this reality made concrete for us. We read that "the Word became flesh and dwelt among us, full of grace and reality." We learn that he bade men behold in him spiritual reality. "I am the way, the reality and the life." "Ye shall know the reality, and the reality shall make you free." Men feel that reality in him and in contact with him achieve it for themselves. And Christ bade them be real above all else, to seek this reality of spiritual experience. Men might say, "Lord, Lord," in perfect unison, and agreement, but the reality was the doing of the will of God. God is a spirit and they that worship him must worship him in spirit and in reality. In these words which I have quoted, I simply translated the word for truth, according to its deepest root meaning.

It follows then that the ground of our fellowship in Christ is our common participation in this reality in Christ; coming to achieve for ourselves in contact with him, his love, his patience, his faith, his hope.

It was the desire of our fathers to build our denomination upon this reality of spiritual experience, for it is a foundation of imperishable rock. It is the foundation which Jesus himself laid while up in the hills of Philippi. You will remember that he first inquired of his disciples "Whom do men say that I am?" That was an appeal to hearsay, an appeal to opinion. But when he asked them "Whom do ye say that I am?" He appealed to something far more fundamental than opinion, he appealed to an experience born of a contact with him. The eager reply of Peter "Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God" called forth from Jesus his blessing and two immortal assurances, first, that his confession was the flower of a divine experience and second, that such experience should ever be the foundation of his church. Peter had not learned his confession in the schools; it was not conveyed to him in formula or creed; it was the faithful reading of his experience with Christ as the divine channel of revelation. Into this same experience you and I have come as we have looked upon Jesus and somehow our lives have been changed and these realities of spiritual experience have become our choicest possession.

But it is of the very nature of so great an experience that it must be interpreted. There is an urgent demand of the mind of man to comprehend his experiences. However, as we attempt to explain to others what has happened to ourselves or to tell them how or why it came to pass we find that we are overwhelmed with difficulty. We see as we never saw before that the truth is vaster than the measure of man's mind. It is a mystery but the difficulty is not in the reality but rather in the limitations of the mind. Realities that blend into the infinite cannot be fully comprehended by the finite. Each one reads his experience a bit differently from all the others, each is talking about the same fact but from an angle of vision distinctly his own.

Doctrinal Formulas Never Final

There is no fellowship of comprehension among us and never can be; we differ in our capacity to understand, but there is a "fellowship of the mystery," a fellowship of eagerness to understand. There is a fellowship that seeks to supplement its own vision with the vision of others; a fellowship of passion to "comprehend with all the saints what is the length and breadth, the height and the depth of the love of Christ."

As we turn to the history of doctrine, which is merely the record of man's unceasing effort to explain the deepest realities in his soul, what a pathetic story it is! What divergence is there! Each succeeding generation, not satisfied with what had been said, sought to speak for itself for none can speak for another. And at no time was full justice ever done to the reality itself. Whenever emphasis was placed upon uniformity of opinion, intolerance and bitterness were rife, and fellowship was impossible. But whenever emphasis has been laid upon the unity of experience in the midst of diversity of opinion there was a fellowship in the truth, our common participation in those spiritual realities into which Christ leads us and which we seek to express because we are at all times thrilled by them and desire to impart them.

Menial Fellowship a Christly Tie

2. Our fellowship is service; our common participation in the tasks which Christ inspires. There are many tasks to be done in the world today and among them are those which none will undertake save he be moved by the love of Christ.

When the Master sat down with his disciples in the upper room on that last memorable night there was no host to wash the travel stained feet of his guests and no disciple volunteered for that lowly task. It was a slave's work. Then noting the failure of those men to grasp the need of the hour, for they were preoccupied with speculation as to the coming of the kingdom and their rank therein, Jesus arose and girded himself with a towel and washed the disciples' feet. And he said unto them, "I have given you an example that ye should do to others as I have done unto you."

The example still abides; the disciples of Jesus are still called to do the lowly work of the world—to undertake the tasks no others will do. Christianity means work, hard work, lowly work, dirty work. It means self-forgetfulness and humility.

Brotherhood of Basin and Towel

The world today is in desperate need and is calling out of the depths of its soul for just such service as the Master rendered on that last night. It is calling for a religion that shall have a basin and a towel for its insignia. I think as we sit in this convention and have this desperate need brought before us once again, that the Master is standing, not to listen to our debate as to who is fit for the first place in the kingdom of God to approve our self-estimates, but to see if we will gird ourselves for the lowly service of the world's need. And to fail at this point will be to fail utterly, for such service is Christ's distinctive work for men. By it he makes himself known to them.

The richest reward such service

We cannot tell what may happen to-morrow. We know we are here to-day and if we would make the best of life we shall live to-day so that when to-morrow comes we shall be prepared to live to-morrow and not in the past. Obedience to God and His will to-day is the secret of a peaceful life to-day and to-morrow. "The loyal soldier asks no reason of his commanding officer for what he may think to be hazardous movements in the day's battle; he obeys in prompt and willing silence. The faithful workman asks no reason for these rude gashes in the quarry; he is content to wait till builder or sculptor fashions the unshapely block into symmetry and beauty.—The Living Church.

will bring us is a deeper fellowship in Christ. Laboring together in the common lowly tasks of world service, touching those whom others forsake, even as Christ touched the leper; loving the unlovely, and bringing peace and hope through Christ to troubled hearts, this is a tie that binds us to each other which nothing can dissolve.

Did He Mock Their Heartache?

May God give us hazards in the call of the world's need today; may he commission us to fill up that which is lacking in the sufferings of Christ,—to complete his conquest of the world, that we may find our fellowship in that common sacrifice, that common devotion and that common forgetfulness of self which he inspires.

3. Our fellowship in hope: our common participation in the expectations which Christ assures. As we set our hands to the task which Christ inspires we go not forth to take some slender chance in an enterprise of questionable issue. The service of Jesus is no vain pursuit. He taught his disciples to pray, "Thy kingdom come." He would mock the deepest aspirations of their hearts had he counseled them so to pray knowing that their petition could never be granted. It is rather our common heritage of hope from him that the disciples' prayer is not a futile prayer.

On that last night when Jesus talked with his disciples in the upper room he did not dwell upon the seeming failure of his life; he did not brood in bitterness on the false-heartedness of men. He talked about his kingdom. It was as real to him as if its spires were already gleaming in the morning sun. And he so infused his hope into his disciples that it became the indissoluble bond of their fellowship. It became to them the great Christian certainty and for it they gladly spent their lives unto the uttermost. Today the same hope abides. Two thousand years of history but confirm the faith of Jesus and warrant us in believing that the kingdom comes; that Jesus shall yet make complete conquest of the world. It puts heart into us, it enables us to endure the heat and burden of the day and it inspires our fellowship in the holy joy of so great an expectation.

Let Nothing Cloud the Glory

But as we work for this coming kingdom and sit together here and make our plans and conceive new purposes, let us not forget the great common liabilities of us all,—our physical mortality and our spiritual need. We must be constantly on our guard lest in a moment of forgetfulness we come to think of ourselves as of so great importance in the kingdom, that wisdom for its achievement die with us. Let us know, as God knows, our frame; let us remember, as God remembers, that we are dust. In this lowly sense of common need may we find a deeper fellowship in Christ.

For what is it that underneath all else unites our heart but the common hope we have in Christ for the satisfaction of all our common needs? In life's last hour we shall be strong not because one has had a better understanding of the truth than another for, we have all been baffled by the mysteries that lie about us here. But we shall all be strong because our Lord has preceded us unto that unexplored country whither we go, and where he went we need not fear to follow. When we appear at the judgment bar of God, by virtue of what excellence shall we find acceptance there, save our common trust in him who gave himself for us? What in that stern and critical hour will mean more to us than that we cherished and gave our lives to the things which Jesus came to accomplish?

The really great things are the eternal and indispensable things. In these we are one in Christ. Our fellowship is in the spiritual realities which he mediates, in the service which he inspires and in the hope which he secures. Let nothing cloud the glory and the joy of so rich an inheritance as this.

Last Year the Best Year for Foreign Missions

We have advanced, we must advance—Two hundred thousand members in Asian and African fields, and eleven thousand baptisms last year—Our purpose not to spread western civilization but to Christianize all nations—Moving in Europe.

BY FREDERICK L. ANDERSON

NORTHERN Baptists should appreciate more generally the greatness of the work which they are doing in lands beyond the sea. It has been estimated that The American Baptist Foreign Missions Society is the fourth largest foreign mission society in the world. It has ten fields—Japan, East China, South China, West China, the Philippines, Burma, Assam, Bengal Orissa, South India and Congo, besides the work it is doing in many countries of Europe. It has 833 missionaries, 7,000 native workers, 1,834 organized churches, 3,429 regular meeting places, 200,000 church members, over 11,000 baptisms last year, 32 theological seminaries and training schools, 4 colleges, 2,737 schools of all grades with 89,752 under instruction, 24 hospitals, and 62 dispensaries which gave 364,959 treatments. These figures do not include Europe. It is this vast work whose blessings no figures can possibly more than hint, which appeals to our Christian hearts, and to which we cannot possibly be unfaithful.

Evangelism is the Key-note

All these labors have but one object in view and that is to win men to Christ and thus to do our part in making this a Christian world. The foreign mission board believes as firmly as ever in medical missions as an expression of the love and pity of the heart of Christ for the sick and those who have no helper. It believes as firmly as ever in our educational work, as a means for training Christian leaders and the native Christian community, and for spreading an intelligent Christian view of the world and of life among the nations. But it is anxious that our traditional emphasis on evangelism shall not be diminished in the least. As the Burma conference recently said, we believe "that evangelization is the keynote of all our work, and that all forms of work should be viewed in relation to this fundamental aim." Winning individuals to Christ and permeating all society with the Christian spirit are not two separate ideals, but are our one and indivisible purpose. Our schools and hospitals should be, and we are glad to say, are generally filled with a warm evangelistic spirit. God has greatly blessed this work this past year in Shanghai College, where in a student body of 427, a large proportion of whom are already Christians, the Holy Spirit has moved upon the hearts of 81 students to give themselves to the Saviour.

All Along the Line Fire Flames Up

Dr. Thomas has resigned the presidency of the Karen Theological Seminary and has been designated general evangelistic missionary for Burma. Rev. Wheeler Boggess has become general evangelistic missionary among the Telugus. Rev. O. L. Swanson has been chosen to the same work in Assam. All along the line the evangelistic fire flames up, but we are also determined that the converts shall receive the broadening and quickening of a Christian education, and, when sick, shall know the healing touch of Christ in our hospitals.

Our work should be Christian in the New Testament sense; our purpose is not to spread our rather questionable western civilization, but the very spirit of Jesus, and that we desire nothing so much as to see all nations accept and serve Jesus as Saviour and Lord.

The greatest single advance was in our work in Europe. As a result of the epoch making London Conference of last July, the work in France, Czecho-Slovakia, Poland, Norway, the Baltic States and Northern Russia was given to us either alone or in co-operation with European brethren of various lands.

Our people should familiarize themselves with our three new stations in the Orient. The first is Jamshedpur in Bengal-Orissa. In this rising Pittsburgh of India, destined to be the center of the steel industry in Southern Asia, we are establishing the gospel. Mong Lem is the second, just across the Burmese border in China. Here, amid perils, hardships and vexations, labors Rev. William Young, a pioneer missionary of the older type. Already 400 have been baptized, and 300 are ready. Thus is fulfilled the dream of eighty years ago that by way of Burma we should some day penetrate China. The third is Kangpokpi in Assam, in a region for the first time opened to the gospel. Here our medical missionary Dr. Crozier and our sturdy Brother Pettigrew are invading the enemy's country. Already 400 have been baptized and 200 more are waiting.

Our schools are progressing finely. The great Mabie Memorial Middle School on the acropolis of Yokohama, the most sightly elevation in a city of 500,000 people, is now nearly completed. It is already filled to capacity and many are being turned away. Shanghai College, second to none in China, is the great growing commercial metropolis of the Yangtse valley and now has 427 students, splendid buildings are being erected. Probably its Science Hall is the finest educational building of the kind in the Republic. Here is the largest number of college trained candidates for the ministry in any school in the land. There are over 600 students in Kaying Academy and preparatory departments. Best of all the Northern and the Southern Boards which together support the College have settled their difficulties with reference to it and are ready now to cooperate heartily in making it even more widely useful.

China, Japan, Burma, Ready

China is especially open to Christian education just now. A non-Christian Chinese has just given property in Shanghai, which will supply an annual income of $14,000 Mex. for the support of schools and a hospital in his home town near Ningpo, and asks the missionaries and Chinese Christians to direct the enterprise.

The quiet, fruitful work among the future leaders of Japan goes on at Waseda University. In our hostels we provide Christian homes for the students and during the year many have found the Saviour. Scott Hall, a general meeting place for Waseda men under Christian auspices, is now in process of construction and will greatly aid in this admirable and comparatively inexpensive enterprise.

At Rangoon all is ready for the change which will make our Judson College a part of the University of Burma, and thus bring an aggressive Christian force to work in the head center of Burman culture. In a multitude of minor schools, progress is being made by hard working missionaries but these are the outstanding examples.

Our whole aim in the Orient is to establish indigenous self-supporting and self-propagating churches. We hope some day to be able to leave them to their own leadership and their own administration. Our missionary force is the scaffolding, one day to be taken down, the native Christian community is the building which will remain. There is therefore no real advance unless there is advance in native leadership and self-support. Now note our progress. President Chiba heads the Japanese Theological Seminary at Tokyo, and Principal Sakata has proved himself an admirable administrator of the new Mabie Memorial School at Yokohama.

At the Sixtieth Anniversary of the South China Mission, 1,200 of the students in our Mission Schools paraded the streets of Swatow, welcomed by the populace. Sixty years ago the missionary in South China was despised and hated. Only a few outcasts ventured even to hear his message. Today the people trust the missionary and hail the Christian student body, the rising hope of China with gladness. So our eyes witness a modern miracle, the suspicion and aversion of a great people changed to confidence and affection. Best of all at the celebration, the native Chinese speakers said that the time had come to make what in its beginning was a foreign movement really Chinese in spirit and in leadership.

Nothing could be more cheering than the great All-Burma Convention held at Mandalay, the very center and seat of Buddhism, in October. Here where Judson stood alone before the peacock throne of the Burman tyrant, a century ago, there met 1,000 Christian Burmans, 900 Christian Karens, 400 Kachins, Sixty Chinese, besides Anglo-Indians, Shans, Chins and Talains. Twenty-two Lahu delegates came and returned 300 miles on foot, representing 12,000 Lahu Christians. Only twenty years ago there was not a Lahu Christian in the world, and now their choir leads the convention in song. Best of all, for the first time, a Burman, Pastor Syoo of Moulmein, was elected president of the convention and made an excellent presiding officer. There are more self-supporting Baptist churches in Burma than there are in Massachusetts. Great advances in this line have been made in South India. Dr. Stait has left her beautiful and extensive hospital at Uda-yagiri in complete charge of Frances Bai, a native Christian woman whom she trained, and she is carrying on the work in truly admirable fashion.

The entire field of Kandukuru has been turned over to the Telugu Baptist Convention, which is continuing all the activities formerly conducted by missionaries. This is the first instance on record where the support of an entire field has been assumed by the local constituency. Also the Taluk Association this last year took over from the missionaries the entire responsibility for field work. Other evangelistic work in Madras and Bengal-Orissa is being conducted by the Indian Christians. In Burma, a Burman Christian has taken a missionary's place as principal of the Judson High School at Moulmein.

Our advance too, is seen in the fact that we have now 833 missionaries, the largest number in the history of the Society, and that in the last two years, since the inauguration of the New World Movement and the popularization of the Survey, we have sent out or appointed 203 missionaries. These figures include the single women of the Woman's Society, who are also missionaries of our own. This is a gratifying increase and convinces us that the dreadful shortage of missionaries, largely caused by the war, will eventually be made up, and further advances be possible.

A "Look-In" on Burma

BY REV. J. HERBERT COPE

PRELIMINARY census figures have been published and they show that with two exceptions every section of the Province has gained in population. One of these districts has had some of its territory taken from it while the other suffered from migration to other districts which have of course gained. The increase in population is about one million. This is small, due to the ravages of flu the past few years. The figures for the religions are not yet out.

The Burma reform scheme has been having a hard time in Parliament and the last news was that it had been side-tracked. There is a violent difference of opinion as to the qualifications of the Burman for self government. Some officers claim the Burman is no more fit to govern his own country than a Hot-tentot, while others believe just the opposite. At any rate one has a wide choice of opinions. One thing is evident and that is a certain section of the Burman population is making itself known and insisting on its views being granted a hearing. Government now announces that the summer capital at Maymyo, a hill station is to be discontinued. No reasons are given but there is a rumor it was caused by pressure from the people who object to government being conducted from the

Two heroic women are at last to be assisted in carrying the burdens. Mrs. Johnson has for years carried on the work at Loika all alone except as men have gone up to assist in the emergency. Now I see the return from furlough in the Fall. Heptonstalls are to go there on their The other who has borne the toil alone will get quicker relief. Mrs. Mosier has taken up her husband's work and remained beyond her furlough time. The Philpotts are transferred to Bhamo to take over her work, thus allowing her a rest. All honor to these ladies who have "carried on" so well.

The Philpotts leave Myangan with only Russel Case who goes in the Spring. This station has almost been a hoodoo. The man who opened it had to go home with a sun stroke suffered when he walked round a block on the railway with no toppee. And since then man after man has found the place simply impossible for his wife and children. It is in the dry zone and the heat is oppressive and too hard on children. A new brick house is planned which may bring some relief to the new appointee.

The work at Judson College continues to expand. They have now asked for the opening of a Biology department and a Reference Committee has recommended the request be granted. When Dr. Gilmour went home Dr. Kelly went to the College as principal. Now he has been re-appointed to the Rangoon Burman field and leaves the College as soon as other arrangements can be made.

Fourteenth Annual Meeting of the Northern Baptist Convention

Here is a story of vital faith, a vital program and vital achievement, of self-control under hard physical conditions of things to regret and things to rejoice over—The Baptist sky is clearing.

DES MOINES had made good arrangements for the entertainment of the Fourteenth annual meeting of the Northern Baptist Convention to be held June 22-28, 1921. The place of assembly, the Coliseum, was fairly well adapted to the purposes of such a meeting, but the convention had not been in session fifteen minutes before men began to shout, "Louder." Why does one never hear such a cry from women?

The opening of the convention was swift and joyous. Just before the hour the Southern California delegation rent the air with a yell which meant, whatever they said, "We are here, take notice!" Presently the crowd of more than 1800 swung into the singing of "Crown Him Lord of All." Dr. Frank Peterson offered prayer. Gov. N. E. Kendall of Iowa paid a high tribute to the worth of Baptists in the world; Mayor H. H. Barton of Des Moines welcomed the convention to a city having 72 Protestant churches and 8,000 students in the higher institutions of learning in the city; Rev. H. R. Best, chairman of the local Baptist committee, gave a sketch of the ups and downs of the committee in trying to make the delegates and visitors comfortable, and urged everybody to keep smiling; President E. L. Tustin replied to all of them at once, and the crowd was delighted with the snapliness, grace and brevity of all of these complimentary impromptus.

Looking Towards Biennial Sessions

Secretary C. C. Bitting, for the Executive committee proposed several amendments to the constitution to be considered in view of an expected change from annual to biennial sessions. Treasurer Frank L. Miner reported disbursements during the year amounting to $32,607.99; a bank balance of $899.67, and a debt of $15,000. Chairman D. C. Shull reported for the Finance committee, a statement of the committee's understanding of its duties, namely:

"(1) To study the budgets and try in every way to have them fair, just, and equitable to all interests affected.

"(2) To cooperate with every Board, Society, and committee of the Convention in the most cordial way in promoting their financial interests.

"(3) So to conduct its affairs as to have the confidence and approval of such Boards, Societies, and committees.

"(4) To seek to correct anything in the financial operations of such Societies, Boards, and committees, which in the judgment of this committee are not for the best interest of the organization and our denomination.

"(5) While the committee does not assume the power to enforce its suggestions made to any Society, Board, or committee, yet in the event of its suggestions being refused consideration, it would not hesitate to bring the matter before the Convention for its action.

"(6)" The committee believes it should report from time to time to the Convention anything which, in its judgment, is being done not conducive to the general good of the denomination in matters affecting financial interests.

"(7) The committee seeks to be creative and not critical in all matters which come within its jurisdiction."

The committee also proposed a new way of financing the work of the denomination, as follows:

End the Drives for Money

"Owing to the great expense incurred by the former method of having the same certified public accountant for each Society and Board, the committee has recommended each to employ its own public accountant for the present, it being understood this arrangement is only tentative. The committee called a meeting of laymen for conference at Cleveland in February of this year for the purpose of considering the general financial condition of the denomination, the raising of the balance of the $100,000,000, and what should be done to provide for the just and reasonable requirements of the denomination after this present campaign is over.

"The consensus of opinion was that drives are not the most ideal methods of raising money; in fact, it was thought they might become wholly ineffective, and therefore, some other system should be adopted. The conference was unanimous in the opinion that tithing should be encouraged, and therefore recommends:

"(a) There should be created a Laymen's Department of the General Board of Promotion, or such department should become a part of one of the divisions of the work of the said Board.

"(b) A committee of laymen should be selected by this Convention to advise with the managers of such Laymen's Department; the chairman of such committee to be 'ex officio' a member of the administrative committee.

"(c) That an educational propaganda be inaugurated by such Laymen's Department in connection with all agencies now operating, to educate all members of the Convention to become tithers, and establish as soon as possible a tithers' league, having as a goal sufficient numbers by the end of the present $100,000,000 campaign to carry the finances of the Convention, its Boards, Societies, and Committees."

Greetings and Guests

Greetings were received from Secretary of Labor James H. Davis, Secretary of State Charles E. Hughes and President Warren G. Harding, all Baptists. Mr. Hughes was the first president of the Northern Baptist Convention. Proper replies were voted.

President Tustin delivered his annual address which appeared in THE BAPTIST of June 25. It struck a responsive chord of thought and feeling in the assembly, as indicated by frequent and general applause. There followed a season of earnest prayer led by Dr. Carter Helm Jones of Philadelphia, Dr. A. M. Bailey of Seattle, Dr. E. A. Hanley of Rochester, N. Y. and Dr. W. S. Abernathy of Washington, D. C. The last closed with the Lord's prayer in common. It was noted that not a single voice ran into the phrase of the prayer-book version, but all steadily and firmly followed the form given in Matthew. Evidently the Baptists of the North are soundly scriptural in this piece of worship.

Guests of the Foreign Mission Society and of the Convention were introduced by Dr. F. L. Anderson: Rev. Peter Grarup of Denmark, Rev. John A. Orhn and Prof. Arnold Orhn of Norway, Rev. C. E. Lundin of Sweden, Rev. J. E. Frey of Latvia, Rev. J. H. Rushbrooke of Great Britain, Dr. J. F. Love and President Lee Scarborough representing the Southern Baptist Convention, Dr. Ma Saw Sa of Japan and Miss Kan-en-vong of China. Messrs. Rushbrooke, Love and Scarborough spoke briefly and in fine spirit.

Rev. Charles Arbuckle, pastor of the First Baptist Church, Newton Centre, Mass., delivered a set address on the motto adopted for the present meeting of the convention, "Fellowship in Christ." His address appears somewhat condensed in this issue of THE BAPTIST.

At noon the convention adjourned to make way for the great Jubilee of the women's organizations.

Wednesday afternoon and evening and Thursday forenoon were given over largely to the great Jubilee of the Woman's Foreign Society and to the consideration of the work of The American Baptist Foreign Mission Society. By special arrangement the women will present through the columns of THE BAPTIST their own specially prepared report of their program covering the entire period.

The report of the Board of Managers of the American Baptist Foreign Mission Society is reproduced in part in the paper by Dr. Frederick L. Anderson on page 698 in this issue of THE BAPTIST.

Some Missions Take the Platform

On Thursday afternoon a joint session of the American Baptist Home Mission Society and of the Woman's Home Mission Society opened with Rev. C. R. Brock presiding and a fine crowd of home mission workers on the platform to be introduced at the proper time.

Mrs. Katherine S. Westfall secretary of the woman's society during the last year in Christian centers, in Christian Americanization, among foreign-speaking people, on Indian fields, in Latin America and among the Negroes. It showed that the year's receipts from apportionments, individual gifts, legacies, annuity agreements matured, specific gifts, states outside the Northern Baptist Convention, interest on bank balances, income from investments, rental of property, transfers from certain capital accounts amounted to $356,189.40. Disbursements for mission work, education, the Training School, promotion, administration, Americanization and other miscellaneous purposes, amounted to $397,887.03. The cash deficit of $41,697.63 is covered by loans. The assets of the society include real estate valued at $347,926.67; furniture, fixtures and equipment, $26,258.27; stocks, bonds, and mortgages, $340,133.78; cash in bank, $148,681.19. Counting in certain other enumerated items, the total assets are $1,029,248.98.

Growth in almost all lines of activity is noted. But concerning the five-year goals set for the period 1916-1921, the report conveys this information:

As we look back over the past five years, we are rejoiced to record gains made over the year 1916, but we regret that in 1920-1921 we cannot report one National goal reached. Steady advance has been made in the number of women enlisted; in the number of young women's societies with one exception, in the year 1919, when there was a loss of 291 Guilds; in the number of C. W. C.s, and in the number of children enlisted. There has also been a small gain in number of Sunday schools enlisted and in subscriptions to "Missions," with the exception of 1920-1921, when a loss of 8,763 over last year is reported.

This Loss Puzzles One

We cannot quite understand the reported loss in number of women's societies over last year. As the figures now stand, there is a loss of 1,795 societies. We have received a few letters in which we have learned that in some way there has been a misunderstanding concerning the relationship of the woman's local societies to the New World Movement, but we cannot believe that it is so far-reaching as to obliterate nearly 2,000 societies.

Mrs. Westfal presented along with the report an interesting address calling attention to the salient facts in the report and giving an inspiring survey of the field and the work.

Secretary Charles L. White presented the formal printed report of the American Baptist Home Mission Society's Board of Managers covering as usual a vast field of activities; and he spoke in a dignified and statesmanlike way in survey and elucidation of the report.

Receipts under the budget for the year from the churches amounted to $564,806.69; from individuals, $61,476.69; legacies, $106,563.86; income from investments, $166,374.91; total (including other items) $961,305.67. Designated funds on hand April 30, 1920, $2,155,157.17; received during the year, $765,637.65; total, $2,920,794.82; on hand April 30, 1921, $340,483.92.

Last Echo of the Interchurch

Under the head of co-operative relations the following information is given:

Our relations with the Interchurch World Movement ceased one year ago. We have been in conference with representatives of other denominations through interdenominational co-operating groups in the hope that such conversations might lead to a sane and wise interdenominational co-operation. The reorganization of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America and the proposed establishment of consultative relations between it and the various co-operating groups representing the several home missions, foreign missions, Sunday schools, and educational groups, give greater promise of fairer skies and a clearer path. The Home Missions Council was given the care of certain survey material of the Interchurch World Movement and co-ordinated valuable material for the use of the various home mission societies. In the process of this labor which was limited by inadequate funds, it passed the material to a committee of laymen, who are generously undertaking at their own expense, through a survey committee and a general secretary, to complete certain typical home mission surveys which will later be placed at the disposal of the Home Missions Council and other co-operating groups.

In a supplemental report, Secretary White made the "Important Announcement" published by him in THE BAPTIST of June 18, reciting that a certain Baptist has made the society his trustee for a large fund for the promotion of missionary work in designated localities and for the support of missionaries who believe:

"1. In the inspiration and supreme authority of the holy scriptures;

"2. In the deity of our Lord Jesus Christ, his incarnation, his atoning death, his bodily resurrection and his return;

"3. That Baptist churches composed of those who have been baptized into the fellowship upon a confession of their faith in Christ as their Redeemer and Lord are commissioned to make their chief business the evangelization of the world."

Provision is made for the reversion of the trust to a designated educational institution in case it shall be proved at any time that the members of the Board of Managers do not believe these things.

He stated that the Board had accepted the trusteeship, but not unanimously; that the matter was not yet finally settled in the board; and that at the last meeting the matter had been set to come up for further discussion when the Board shall meet in September.

Just then arose one of the most exciting debates ever witnessed in the Northern Baptist Convention.

Judge Freeman of Colorado presented a resolution commending the action of the Board in every particular in accepting the trust, formally approving its action and thanking the donor. A motion to table the resolution was lost by a standing vote, 294 to 706, with loud applause.

The Great Debate

Prof. R. M. Vaughan of Newton Theological Seminary a member of the Board of Managers of the Home Mission Society, moved a substitute to Judge Freeman's resolution, instructing the Board to take the matter up anew with the donor, with a view to securing his consent to the elimination of the creedal condition attaching to the trust. Prof. J. R. Brown of Rochester, also a member of the Board of Managers seconded the motion of Dr. Vaughan, and the whole debate occurred in consideration of that motion.

Dr. Vaughan argued against the policy of accepting gifts with creedal conditions attached as being contrary to the historic practice of Baptists, as having the effect to impose a "dead hand" on the living faith of succeeding generations and as laying the foundation for heresy trials among Baptists before the civil courts. He recited particularly that the British Baptists had confronted a similar situation thirty-five years ago and had decisively refused to accept gifts with creedal conditions.

While he was speaking his opponents in the audience tried in vain to stop him. They were ready for a vote, time was precious and they were tired and oppressed with the sultry heat. They raised points of order. They clapped their hands and howled derisive notes. In the midst of confusion came various motions to limit debate. Finally Dr. Riley's motion presented at the close of Prof. Vaughan's speech, ordering that a vote be taken at 5:30. P. M., carried by a standing vote, 510 to 451. And nearly twenty minutes were spent in doing it!

Judge Freeman, old war horse of such forums, made the principal reply to Prof. Vaughan. He wanted to know who was opposed to the doctrines attached to the trust. It appeared that nobody was. He inquired who expected any generation of Baptists, a hundred or a thousand years hence, or in eternity, to be opposed to them. It seemed that nobody did. He denied that heresy trials could grow out of this trust, but did not explain how under certain contingencies indicated by Prof. Vaughan they could be avoided. He derided the appeal to the precedent set by the British Baptists, saying that they were the last example on earth we ought to be willing to follow; for they are even now considering whether they will accept ordination at the hands of the Episcopal church.

The Rattle of Small Arms

The rest of the speeches were limited as nearly as possible to five minutes.

Prof. Brown countered strongly on Judge Freeman by showing that the British Baptists by unanimous vote had refused to accept Episcopal ordination, and had given good Baptist reasons why they refused.

Rev. M. P. Boynton of Chicago granted that no such creedal trusts had ever been accepted by Baptists before, but said that the occasion for attaching such formal conditions now grows out of recent and wide-spread betrayal of Baptist principles in our denominational schools and papers. The audience roared (there were seldom any considerable intervals when it was not roaring about something or other): "Name them! name them! name one of them!"

He flung back, "The University of Chicago!" That brought Dr. Rolvix Harlan to his feet with the challenge, "As an alumnus of the University of Chicago, I resent that aspersion."

Dr. J. Fraser Lanford of California proclaimed his unshaken Baptist orthodoxy based on his experience of salvation. His effort was irenic. It was an appeal to a better spirit than that which seemed to possess the assembly. But the mood of irenism was not in them.

Dr. C. W. Petty of New York, another member of the Board of Managers, called attention to the fact that the action taken on this question would vitally affect other cooperating organizations and ought to be referred to a conference in which all of them would be represented. But he was talking to a crowd that had made up its mind and wanted action at once.

Rev. W. J. R. Simmons could not understand why Baptists should refuse a gift affirming their own principles; because his personal reason for coming to them from the Presbyterians two years ago was that he understood them to have principles.

Dr. F. L. Anderson would refer final action to the Northern Baptist Convention. But the assembly was of a contrary opinion, and its negative roars indicated no vocal weariness.

Dr. White led in a tender prayer, through which respectful silence was preserved, although with an air which said plainly: Prayer is all right; we are for it; but we know just how we are going to vote."

By a standing vote, Prof. Vaughan's substitute was lost, 422 to 662. Judge Freeman's resolution passed by a viva voce vote and a clear majority. Somebody started "Blest be the Tie That Binds." What tie? Was it the one they had just tied? The song meandered about the building in somewhat lonesome fashion and finally lost itself.

And those blessed home missions workers who filled the platform at the opening of the session as the special pride of the occasion were never introduced at all! What became of them?

But let no reader make the mistake of supposing this to be a story of a mob, or even of a disorderly assembly. The audience never lost control of itself. In the hot hearts of debaters and their supporters on both sides ran the blood of generations of martyrs; and they were alike fighting for the faith for which their fathers died. They were fighting their way to an understanding. One side fought for the doctrines the fathers loved, which they thought to be imperiled. The other side fought for the liberty which the fathers purchased with blood, and which seemed to them to be endangered. But as the debate proceeded it became clear that the former stood for liberty inseparable from sound doctrine, and the other sound doctrine held in liberty. The debate issued in no mere factional victory, but in bringing both sides appreciably nearer to a common fellowship in truth plus freedom.

Dr. Curtis Lee Laws led in earnest prayer; and antagonists of the arena walked out arm in arm.

An hour later they were returning to the Coliseum to participate in the great program to be presented by the Board of Education, with President Chamberlain of Denison University in the chair.

Dr. Frank W. Padelford presented the report of the Board of Education and followed it up with an interesting illustrated lecture on "Baptist Schools and Colleges."

In an interval President Harry Pratt Judson of Chicago University gave a sketch of conditions in Armenia, showing vividly the devastation of the country and the terrible need still existing. He regards the Christian Armenians as in imminent danger of extinction at the hands of the Turks.

Keeping Children in School

Every State now has a compulsory day school attendance law, according to information recently furnished by the U. S. Department of Labor through the Children's Bureau. The Bureau has just completed an analysis of education laws affecting child labor, the results of which are published in a chart entitled "State Compulsory School Standards Affecting the Employment of Minors."

In five States attendance is required until 18 years of age, in two of these in certain districts only; in 3 until 17; and in 32 until 16. One State requires attendance until 15, six others and the District of Columbia until 14, and one State requires attendance until the age of 12 years, but applies this to illiterates only.

Unfortunately the exemptions in the majority of States are so numerous that they greatly limit the application of the law. The most common exemptions are for employment, or upon completion of a specified school grade. Four States specifically exempt for work in agricultural pursuits, 3 with no age provision. The laws of 14 other States contain loosely worded provisions exempting a child at any age, which might be used to cover absence for farm work as well as for many other purposes.

Church Vacation Schools

Never in the history of Vacation Bible School work has there been such an interest manifested as at the present time. Many letters are received every day from all sections of the Northern Baptist Convention, seeking information and ordering supplies. In the sparsely settled state of Montana fine progress is being made, as well as in the more densely populated sections of the country. Rev. Chas. H. Burrill, Director of Religious Education for Montana writes: "We have a large number of places seriously considering holding Vacation Schools, and we confidently expect not less than seven or eight." From Kewanee, Illinois, First Baptist Church, where an early school is already in progress, Miss Elsie L. Oberg writes: "Our school is so very much better than last year that it will tax us all to the limit to live up to it. We have 154 children, and will probably have more by the end of the week. The interest is splendid. We have 20 volunteer teachers, one paid, and our pastor, and we think it is great. We will send you weekly reports."

For the season of 1920 we have listed in this office 450 schools with an enrollment of more than 40,000 pupils. We also know that there were many Baptist Churches which held schools of their own, or in co-operation with other churches which did not report. It is hoped that every church holding a school, whether of its own or in co-operation with other churches, will report to this office at the close of the season. Report blanks will be furnished free on application, either to this office or the Director of Religious Education for the territory involved.

Is This Program Satisfactory?

Recommendations submitted to the Baptist Young People's Union of America Convention, June 30 to July 3, 1921:

1. That we push with all vigor the campaign for securing 1,000,000 fitting signatures by July 1, 1922.
2. That every effort be made to create interest in Bible reading on the part of our young people and to secure pledges for the Quiet Half-Hour League Campaign.
3. That the Baptist Trained Leaders Course be brought to the attention of the young people's societies in an earnest effort to enroll a large number of individuals and societies in this course.
4. That great emphasis be placed on the Life Service activities during the coming year. The goal as adopted by the St. Louis Convention is 5,000 decisions for the ministry and work at home and abroad by July 1, 1922.
5. That we urge our Baptist young people everywhere to interest themselves in the attendance of our boys and girls, young men and young women in the various high schools and the denominational educational institutions.

5. That, following the great financial drives, our young people pursue an intense evangelistic program. "Each one win one" should be our slogan for 1921-22.

7. That we push with great enthusiasm a program for extension calling for a 25 per cent increase in membership of the young people's societies in this convention.

8. That we urge upon our young people everywhere the importance of the worship services of the church and the need for their attendance and prayerful support of such services.

9. That we institute an international-wide mission study drive, same to be opened with a mission study day in the early fall.

10. That we urge our young people to secure the attendance of at least one member from every society at a missionary conference, convention or assembly each year.

That the Sixth World's Christian Endeavor Convention, to be held in New York July 6-11, may leave a worth-while imprint on the public mind, arrangements have been made to carry its message far and wide through the great city. One feature of this outside work will be a series of street-corner meetings on July 7, 8 and 11. Provision has been made to hold sixty of these meetings simultaneously through the formation of sixty evangelistic teams, each having from twenty-five to thirty members.

Several faculty changes were announced at the last Bucknell commencement. Professor Charles C. Fries of the English department has resigned to accept a professorship at the University of Michigan. His place will be filled by Professor Owen G. Groves, of Hamilton College. Professor R. F. Howes comes from De Pauw to take a new position in the department of Economics. Professor O. S. Groner of Transylvania University, will come to occupy a new professorship in the department of chemistry. Mr. Harry R. Warfel of St. John's School, Manlius, N. Y., will occupy the instructorship in English vacated by Mr. H. C. Greenland, who goes to Michigan for graduate work.

Mr. Percy E. Munday, a student at the Northern Baptist Seminary, was ordained at the Baptist Church in Salem, Ohio, on June 14. He will continue during his senior year serving the church at Shabbona, Ill., after which he is hoping to be able to go as a missionary to Africa.

The Moody Bible Institute of Chicago is opening its annual summer evangelistic tent campaign. Three large tents have been located at Sheffield Av. and George St., Milwaukee and Spaulding Aves. and Ashland Ave. and Grace St. The tents will be moved at intervals to other parts of the city, giving a few weeks to each. The evangelists include Dr. J. E. Conant, formerly of Minneapolis, Rev. John S. Hamilton of Cleveland, Ohio, and Alfred P. Gibbs of Johannesburg, South Africa. Alfred Holzworth and George Schuler of the Institute's Music Faculty and evangelist Harry Clark are the song leaders.

The Bulletin Board

Will Apply Business Methods to Churches

A Round Table on Church Methods, under direction of the American Board of Applied Christianity, is announced for July 1 to September 15. The place of its holding, on week days, will be the Educational Building, Fifth Avenue and Thirtieth Street, New York, and every Friday evening at eight o'clock, at 16 West Forty-eighth Street, New York. The basis of the methods presented will be Christ's Economy.

Before the World War the American people were giving $415,000,000 a year to maintain churches and their work at home and abroad, but with increases in salaries, building costs, etc., the amount has risen to $600,000,000. Many questions of down town churches in growing cities, of foreign born, of church attendance, of nation wide campaigns, of training for volunteer workers, of conduct of Bible classes and men's clubs, come to the front and clamor for solution. The aim of the Applied Christianity Board is to create a church engineering school, which shall collect scientific management methods from everywhere, and distribute them without charge to those in need of them. Especially is it regarded as desirable that laymen who are set officially to manage churches and their material affairs become familiar with scientific management laws, and methods that bring success. It is also desirable to get men into harness to work and to give, and not as now a very few bear all of the burdens.

The Lord is in His Temple

Doubters as to the changing spirit toward the church and within the church today, might well read the following report from the Baptist Temple in Philadelphia, Dr. Russel Conwell's church:—

"The number of baptisms this year is almost double the number last year. In spite of unexpected expense in repairing the ceiling of the Upper Temple, our church budget has been fully met; salaries $24,471.12, repairs $15,341.80, and other items totaling $57,616.09. The total yearly income for this past year shows an increase over the previous year of $7,551.43.

"Our contribution to the New World Movement and other missionary interests during the same period has totaled over $20,000 including gifts to foreign and Home Mission Educational Work, the Missionary work of the American Baptist Publication Society, the Ministers' and Missionaries' Endowment Fund, State and City Missions, the Baptist Orphanage and the Baptist Home, besides gifts to the Chinese Fund and the Near East Relief. As compared with the previous year, our gifts to missions last year show an increase of $13,907.38.

"But best of all, the spirit of the entire church has never been more enthusiastic nor more harmonious."

Hearts Grow Larger

How the churches are awakening to a new day of missionary effort and are giving greater sums than ever before for benevolences, is illustrated by a report by Dr. Harold Husted of the American Baptist Home Mission Society who has been at work in Rochester, N. Y. Mr. Husted found that in 1901 the total contributions for benevolences in the Baptist churches there amounted to $33,000. In 1919 the benevolences had reached $40,000, an increase of 15 per cent. In 1921 the contributions were $50,000, a gain in two years of 25 per cent.

China Needs Help no Longer

The American Baptist Foreign Mission Society has been advised by the China Famine Relief Committee that information from the American Minister at Peking confirms the fact that recent large contributions by the Chinese people themselves and the abundant rains have brought about a radical change in famine conditions. The committee has therefore announced discontinuance of the China Famine Campaign and the Foreign Mission Society therefore desires to state to its constituency that contributions for this great emergency seem no longer to be necessary. The China Famine Committee extends to all contributors its grateful appreciation of their generous assistance, and their cooperation in this great and successful effort to help China in its emergency. The Board of Promotion also extends to Baptists its gratitude for their prompt response to the China Famine appeals which were made under its auspices at the series of regional missionary conferences and through other publicity efforts in recent months.

Hull House Backs Training School

The following letter of appreciation from the head of the organizational club work of Hull House was sent to the faculty of the Baptist Missionary Training School.

The senior students have had as part of their practice work, cooking clubs, sewing clubs, basketry, and play clubs. In all of this work, while there has been the supervision of the head instructor, the student has been expected to plan her own work and take the initiative in it.

Hull House, April 22, 1921.

"I want to express to you my appreciation of the work your girls have done at the House during the winter. I have never had students who put into their work the genuine spirit of service that the B. M. T. S. girls have. They have shown themselves to be possessed of initiative and leadership, and it has been directed in such a way as to bring out the very best in the children. So many times, initiative on the part of the teacher leads the children to be more or less dominated by her wishes, but your girls seem to have always kept in mind that they were working for the development of the children, and that they themselves were only an instrument working for the good of others. Their contact with their groups of children has been wholesome, and of a fineness that our children have, in so large a measure, lacked. For this reason, I think it has been more of a benefit than you can realize for our children to be surrounded by women of this calibre. Their training has been sound, so that they have known what they were teaching, and there has not been that groping and fumbling that one so often meets in the case of students who have not found themselves."

Visit These French Protestants

Visitors associated with our churches who go to France and Belgium during the summer are earnestly requested to visit the Protestant institutions and churches in these nations. There are a number of Protestant Churches in the devastated regions. Those in Paris are of deep interest.

The Commission on Relations with France and Belgium of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America has requested the Committee in Paris, consisting of Rev. Chauncey W. Goodrich, Rev. Frederick W. Beekman and Pastor Andre Monod, to facilitate such visits. Arrangements should be made by addressing Rev. Andre Monod, 8 Rue de la Victoire, Paris.

Think Federation Brought Growth

The Sacramento (California) Church Federation has issued a significant statement concerning increase in Protestant church membership in that city during the year ending Easter, 1921. It shows that the membership of the churches has increased at least 2.99 times more rapidly than the city's population.

The Sacramento churches believe that the gains are in large measure due to federation methods. The affiliated churches are engaged in a five year simultaneous campaign of evangelism.

Persecution Drives Them Together

The war has increased rather than lessened religious tolerance in Europe. In Jugo-Slavia the Catholic Church has been carrying on a bitter persecution against the various Protestant sects. The membership of these bodies numbers 480,000. As a result of the persecutions they are being driven to unite. An agreement has been reached and they will soon be united as one Church. This will give them greater advantage in dealing with their persecutors, and will give them greater power with the government. —United Presbyterian.

International Uniform Lesson for July 17

THE CONVERSION OF PAUL—Acts 9:1-19
Golden Text: Acts 26:19

The Lesson Text

There are three accounts of the conversion of Paul in the Acts. One account is written directly by Luke, and two of them are reported by Luke from Paul's own lips. These accounts are found in chapters 9, 22, 26, and are substantially alike. Paul's conversion is repeated in the record probably because it accounted for Paul's change of purpose and service which his former friends and countrymen could not understand. In fact that is Paul's motive in telling of his conversion as it is recorded in Acts 22 and 26. The story of Paul's conversion as told by Luke is vivid and compelling. The contrast between Saul breathing out slaughter and Saul knocked out of breath by one whom he had believed dead arrests the attention of the reader and holds him to the story until it is finished.

The Lesson Taught

The conversion of Paul was supernatural, sudden and sound.

Supernatural

From modern attempts to explain everything by psychology one turns to the conversion of Paul with considerable relief. If an unscientific age exalted the supernatural and accounted for everything it could not understand by miracle, a scientific age has gone just as far in the other direction by exalting the natural and scoffing at the miraculous. Both are extremes. An age that produced the apocryphal gospels and the superstitious miracles of medieval times carried the mysteries of religion to the extreme of absurdity; but our age which sees nothing in the Christian religion except the product of evolution is equally absurd. The conversion of Paul was not an evolution, but a revolution; it did not happen naturally, but was brought about supernaturally; it was not an accident, but a miracle. That is the plain testimony of Paul himself. Something happened on the way to Damascus which Paul explains as an appearance of the risen Jesus to him. That this was no hallucination on the part of Paul is proved by his evident good sense, intelligence and long life of service and sacrifice in the cause to which he had been converted. Many years after his conversion, the experience of it is as vivid in his mind as it was on the day it happened. When he told his story to King Agrippa he was Paul the aged, but the years had robbed the story of none of its freshness and vigor. Every genuine conversion has the supernatural in it. "Except a man be born of the Spirit, he cannot see the kingdom of God." Paul explains the human side of his conversion in the golden text when he says, "I was not disobedient to the heavenly vision," but in the very words, "heavenly vision," he acknowledges the supernatural also. Let us not make less of the psychology of conversion, but let us make more of the work of the divine Spirit in conversion. Few conversions have had such a demonstration of the divine in them as Paul's; but all who have been genuinely converted may truthfully say, "It is not by might, nor by power; but by my Spirit, saith the Lord."

Sudden

The conversion of Paul took place suddenly. One hour he was breathing out slaughter against innocent Christians, the next hour he was breathing a prayer for pardon. The proud Pharisee was suddenly changed into the humble penitent. The destroyer of the faith at once became the defender of the faith. Of course Paul did not become at once a full grown man in Christ. Just before he was martyred Paul wrote a letter to one of the churches in which he says, "Not that I have already attained, or am already made perfect; but I press on, if so be that I may lay hold on that for which also I was laid hold on by Christ Jesus." (Phil. 3:12.) Paul grew in grace and in the knowledge of the Lord right along after his conversion. But his conversion never had to be repeated. When Paul crossed the Rubicon he burned all the bridges behind him. He was a man of dispatch. What he did, he did quickly. He turned about with the alacrity of a well-trained soldier, and began to build up what he had destroyed with all the vigor and system and enthusiasm of the former persecutor. A man may make up his mind in a minute to do something which it will take him a life time to accomplish. Paul's conversion occurred with all the swiftness of the light that shone above the brightness of the noonday sun. Not all conversions are sudden. Much depends upon circumstances and temperament. Let no one think that because his conversion is not a duplicate of Paul's he is therefore not converted. No two conversions are alike.

Sound

The Salvation Army speaks of "a sound conversion." By a sound conversion is meant a conversion which has the right ring to it and is whole-hearted. There are unsound conversions. The difference may be illustrated by the conversion of Paul and the conversion of Simon Magus. The conversion of Simon is recorded in Acts 8:9-24. In spite of the fact that he believed and was baptized there was something wrong with his conversion. He seems to have been converted to what he regarded as a new kind of magic the secret of which he sought to discover. Paul was converted to Christ; Simon was converted to miracles. Paul was converted to the missionary passion and program of Christ; Simon was converted to the emotional amazement of the crowd captured by the miraculous power of Philip the evangelist. Paul's conscience was involved in his conversion; Simon's curiosity was involved in his conversion. Paul's conversion was supernatural; Simon's conversion was superficial. Paul's conversion was due to a selective process by which Paul was divinely chosen for a great work; Simon's conversion was due to kind of mob movement—a collective process when he was swept into the church on a tide of emotionalism with many others. Paul was the hand picked fruit of the kingdom; Simon was a wind-fall. We need to return to the selective process in conversion.

Our Sunday School Work

BY WILLIAM E. CHALMERS

The organization of Baptist Sunday school work has developed slowly and steadily. At first the whole denominational help to the local Sunday school was editorial and publishing. The preparation of lesson material by expert writers and its circulation in convenient form became the task of the American Baptist Publication Society. As the interest in religious education increased there was a demand for Sunday school workers in the field. Our Publication Society undertook this service as supplemental to its printed page of lesson helps. At first these workers were called Sunday school missionaries and served in the missionary department. They are now called directors of religious education and the society has organized a department of religious education, separate from its Bible and field department (which continued its old missionary department) and from its business department.

In the appointment of these directors a new principle obtains. They are no longer separately appointed by the Publication Society but jointly appointed and supported by the Society and the cooperating Baptist state convention or city organization. Twenty-two directors of religious education served as many states last year and five city directors in New York, Chicago, Pittsburgh, Detroit, and Buffalo.

In addition to its state and city workers the Publication Society maintains a staff of specialists in its Philadelphia office, as leaders in children's work, young people's work, adult work, teacher training, correspondence study, institutes and summer assemblies, church vacation schools, week-day religious education, and Sunday school work for new Americans.

The Chimney Corner

Just Mither.

LONG years ago Mither came to town, —Mither MacCarthy, as I'm sure you've guessed. And not one of all the nice ladies in town was aware that there was a new neighbor—not one!

So Mither had it all to do alone. And there was a lot to do, for the corners were so full of cobwebs, the floors so gritty and the window-panes so smutty that not a place in all that house was fit for even Mither's cat to look at. Ah me, what scrubblings went on—what scourings—what polishings—before ever that little house, which had been nobody's for years on end, became all Mither's own, and as clean as a whistle! But during all the broiling days of cleaning, I would be reminding you that not a neighbor came to the door with a bit of a pie for the youngsters to eat while Mither was too busy to dish up fancies—no, not a neighbor. So Mither whispered to herself in the cool of the evening when she rested idly on the doorstep! "Sure, and I've maybe moved into a town of frozen icicles!"

But all this time the neighbors were saying: "Just a poor Scotch-Irish body she is, with a whole raft of children and no husband living. I take it she'll find it right hard to make ends meet."

And she did, too. But the little house that had been nobody's for years on end was now not only spotless inside, but outside jolly gay geraniums flanked the front doorsteps; and perhaps you've noticed yourself that a "whole raft of children" make very good gardeners. So soft green grass sprang up and was always neatly cut, and vegetables in astonishingly straight rows began to make the MacCarthy mouths water, and the zinnias grew as big as apples. Oh, it was a dear little bit of a home that Mither made out of the dingy house that had been nobody's for years on end!

But that "raft of children" who had been looking forward all their young lives to the day when we "flit to the country for good-and-all" decided that a village of icicles was a poor substitute for the city block of houses where Mither was heartily hailed from every doorstep.

"Tut!" she reprimanded them, "ye've gone fair daft in yere heads, Biddy and Andy and wee MacGregor; I'll be asking you to clench yer teeth on such remarks; for what's one poor widow-woman more nor less in a neat little village all self-satisfied like this? Aye, just a poor blue gingham apron widow like meself. Tut! Are ye expectin' for the band to be meetin' in front to serenade me, and for the mayor hisself to be makin' a grand speech? 'Tis fair silly ye are! And now, if ye'll fetch yer bits of cushions out onto the doorsteps I'll be readin' ye from yer faither's auld Scots' Bible, like he used to be doin' hisself, five wee months ago."

So there was a clatter of little feet, then the cushions were placed side by side facing the sunset glow and their new village home—Bridget and Andrew and MacGregor MacCarthy, their eyes like saucers as Mither read the dear quaint words: "Tak tent that ye lichtlie—no ane o' thir wee anes; for say I t'ye that in Heeven their ain Angels aye look upon my Heevenlie Faither's face! For the Son o' Man has coome to save thae war lost."

"Noo, hoo think ye, yersels? Gin a man hae a hunner sheep, and ane o' them is gane awa, dis he no lea' the ninety-and-nine, and gang intil the mountains, seeking the ane forwander't? And gin sae be that he lights on't, truly say I t' ye, he is blyther ower that sheep than ower the ninety-and-nine that gaed-na awa. E'en sae, thar is nae desire afore yere Faither in Heeven that ane o' thir wee anes sould be lost."

When she finished every wee MacCarthy knew that Mither was like that herself, looking out for others,—and they went to bed contented. As for Mither herself,

Your Neighbor

By G. ROY REED

Get acquainted with your neighbor!

Stop and pass the time of day;
You may get a lot of pleasure
From the things he has to say.
You may find a different fellow
Than you thought him at the start;
You may form a mutual liking,
Though your views be far apart.

He may have a good suggestion
That's the very thing you need—
That will bring you fame or fortune
If you cultivate the seed;
He may need a little backing.
In a purely personal way,
That you'd feel quite free in giving,—
So, why treat him like a stray?

How is one to love his neighbor,
As the Bible bids us do,
If you never get acquainted—
If he's not a help to you?
Would each happy wife be married
To her present choice of man.
If she hadn't learned to know him
In a way no stranger can?

You may some day be a stranger,
Like the man who's just moved in—
Meeting folks with good intentions,
But who just forget to grin.
Friend, regardless of your calling,
Whether business, field or labor,
Know the fellow at your elbow—
Get acquainted with your neighbor!
Mason City, Iowa.

she locked up her loveliness inside the yoke of her auld gingham frock: "Poof!" she whispered, "I'll not be fretting for the bit of slight I've had!"

But this she did: she bided her time; and when news went the rounds that strangers were moving to town, she armed each wee MacCarthy with a pail or a broom and a scrubbing brush, and into that empty house she marched like an army, to scour and to polish the worst of the dirt; while the "raft of children" weeded the front yard. And when the astonished new family moved into this spotless abode, there would be Andy MacCarthy a while later on the doorstep, saying: "How do ye do? And if ye please, Mither says to tell ye as how the first days in a new house is always to sixes and sevens, anyhow, so she's just sent ye over this wee bit of a pie to knock the edge off yere appetites—and, that's all, so I'll just be going along home, thank ye kindly. Goodbye!"

All in one breath he said it, too, with his eyes peering curiously through the doorway to discover playmates his own size.

But his dear brown freckles and his breathless remarks made the warmest kind of a spot in the stranger's heart. And Mither soon had a new friend, you see! For in even the smallest of towns people do keep moving in; and Mither was always in their homes before them "spicking and spanning things up," as the wee MacCarthy's called it. And sometimes, in the spring of the year, they planted a few little seeds in these new neighbors' garden beds—all their own idea this was. "We'll be springing a bit of a surprise, ourselves!" they laughed in secret, until the neighbors came to see that the warm friendliness of Mither had become contagious—an heirloom to her "raft of children!"

Also, if anyone were sick, on went Mither's sunbonnet as she trudged to carry jellies to the invalid and to sympathize, her whole Scotch-Irish face aglow with feeling.

So, as the years went by, the wee MacCarthy's lengthened out to big MacCarthy's, and Biddy came to teach the village school while Andy was the village preacher—and a fine preacher he made, too: thundering one moment, tender as kind tears the next. All the wee children in town were Andy's shadows: "Sure, ye're the Pied Piper of Hamlin himself," laughed Mither, teasing him.

"It might be worse, ye will admit," said Andy, kissing her.

As for MacGregor MacCarthy, he farmed the pleasant acres Mither had bought, bit by bit, in the rear of the dingy old house that had once been nobody's for long years on end. And MacGregor was a farmer that was a farmer. Also, a tenth of his grain and a tenth of his fruit and a tenth of his eggs he gave to Mither to spend in the Lord's work; so that Mither, who had once given only her poor widow's mite, felt almost like some Mrs. Vanderbilt.

Well, in the course of time Mither grew to be seventy-five years old. Yes, that she did! And it is a great many years to have lived. So the village gave her a surprise party. There were men and women there whose floors she had scrubbed with her own hands before ever they moved to town, and they felt quite rightly that nothing but a kiss on Mither's withered cheek could thank her half enough; and one pretty high school girl cried softly: 'Oh, I'd rather be 'just Mither' than the most beautiful lady in the whole wide world!"

"See here," said Andy in his mellow, pleasant voice, "what's to hinder ye from being Mither yerself? Just begin! Just be Mither, lassie! All ye've got to do is to care for someone else as much as ye care for yerself in homely everyday bits of work. That's Mither!"

And I'm thinking that home missions is spreading just that self-same spirit round the town; loving your next door neighbors as hard as ever you love yourself.

The Young Reserves

God's Exclamation Points!

OF course Sam had always known that there were steeples in his own town. With two good eyes you were sure to come across one on almost any walk you chose to take. But he became unusually noticing about Houses-with-Steeples on the day when he and Sallie rode home from their Fourth of July trip to grandmother's. For as the train snorted along in the noisy scooting way that all trains have, Sam sat on one side of the train counting, and Sallie sat on the other side, counting; and it is a fact that in almost every single town they hurried through, Sallie would call: "My town has one, look, Sam! A white steeple! and, oh, goody, there's a brown one, too!" Then by and by Sam would shout: "Sallie, Sallie, my town's got one, see—a red steeple!"

So they made it a game, counting steeples all day long, and once when they dashed by an unusually sleepy little place Sam was just as ashamed as he could be that it was on his side of the train, because—there—was—not—a—single—steep—le—In—it! No, not one. He said he wished it had been on Sallie's side. But Sallie said that if it had been, then there would have had to be a steeple, or she would know the reason why! (Quite as if she would have stepped off the train and made one, then and there!)

Their mother saw that they were never going to settle the matter of the Town-Without-a-Steeple, so she said that she wouldn't be at all surprised if the people living there went to church on Sunday mornings in the school-house. Why not, since nobody else would be using it that day? Sam and Sallie agreed that possibly this was the secret of the Steeple-less Town, and it was a dreadful disappointment when it grew too dark to see,—for Sallie had counted thirty-one steeples from her side of the train, while poor Sam had only had twenty-four to count on his side!

But because it was dark they began to ask questions—why were there steeples, anyhow? So their mother folded her hands in the way you have often done yourself, I am sure, with her front fingers for the steeple, as she said:

"This is the church,

And this is the steeple,

Here is the roof,

And here are the people."

Then, while they fixed their eyes on her hand-made church, she talked about steeples.

"It certainly was rather strange that other houses did not have them, only churches. See how they towered up into the sky as if they were God's giant exclamation points crying to everybody down below: 'Watch! Look! Listen! But the people were so busy doing their own things that they hustled past and rarely noticed the steeples at all, or thought about God,—not even on Sundays,

Seen from a Railway Train

By EMILY DICKINSON

I LIKE to see it lap the miles
And lick the valleys up,
And stop to feed itself at tanks
And then, prodigious, step

Around a pile of mountains
And, supercilious, peer
In shanties by the sides of roads;
And then a quarry pare

To fit its sides, and crawl between,
Complaining all the while
In horrid, hooping stanza;
Then chase itself downhill.

And neigh like Boanerges;
Then, punctual as a star,
Stop—docile and omnipotent—
At its own stable door!

alas; which is the reason some churches hung a bell up in their steeples, and one day in every seven they rang it:

'Ding Dong

Is something wrong?

Come here—

God's near!"

"Every once in a while there is a town where a certain church will put a clock in its steeple, as if to persuade people to look up and perhaps think of God for half a second; or perhaps they burn a light up there at night to remind us in the darkness that God Himself is light; but little by little, day by day, we have all begun to see that if people in the world went go to church, then the church will have to go to them."

"Oh, how could it?" gasped Sallie; "can the church walk down the street, and up front steps to ring a doorbell, mother?"

"Yes, indeed it can," their mother laughed, "for every single member can carry their church wherever they want it to go."

"Now mother," Sam objected, "you know perfectly well that I could never, never, never carry our church, for it must weigh tons and tons, and I know the steeple would topple over and spill all along the sidewalk before I'd gone a block! So whatever do you mean?"

"My dears," their mother said, "a church is simply the love of God in the hearts of a group of Christians, and there's no reason in the world why little Christians, even like you and Sallie, can't each be a Church-on-Legs to carry this love of God to people who don't go to church on Sundays."

"Why, that's like being a sort of minister," said Sam.

"Or a missionary-person," Sallie added.

"Of course it is," their mother agreed, "for don't you remember the story of 'Just Mither' * and how her wee MacCarthys carried love all over town? And have you never heard about Banana Beppo's cup of cold water, or how 'Two Plus Two Equals Ten'? No? Well then I shall certainly have to tell you the minute we get home!"

From Our Young Reserve Mail Bag.

WE HAVE been receiving dozens of letters lately, and are going to share some of them with you. But first of all let me say that five Young Reserves are going to be "HOME GUARDENERS" and raise vegetables or flowers to sell for missionary money. Surely there are more of you who read the story several weeks ago by Peggy, called, "A Bean for Africa"—now that school is over you will have time to read that story over again and to plan a garden of your own. It will be such a Baptist way to have fun and to help others all the world around. Here are the names of the five who have responded so far:

Dillingham Truesdell, Chicago, Ill.; Ella Smythe, Toledo, Ohio; Seena Coe, Portland (is it Maine or Oregon? The postmark was blurred!); Tommie Waters, Philadelphia; Loraine Glading, Detroit, Mich.

Topic for July 17.

JUDGING KINDLY.

Matthew 7:1-5.

"Judge not, that you may not be judged; for your own judgment will be dealt—and your own measure meted—to yourselves."

Discussions for a number of months have centered around "fundamentals." So far as we know, the above passage has not been quoted by either side of the controversy. Perhaps this verse of Scripture has been left to the great majority of Baptists who are neither extremely radical nor ultra conservative.

1. A genuine test. "Every body is peculiar but me and thou, and thou art a little sometimes." This about sums up the attitude of the ordinary fellow. Fruit-bearing is a test of one's discipleship. To be able to judge kindly is indeed one of the great graces—it is an evidence of rightness of heart. Are our great host of Baptist people measuring up to this rather rigid test? In the young people's group: your fellow-workers, high-school classmates—even though they differ from you, have you learned to judge them kindly?

2. If we only knew. But, we do not know what is going on in the other fellow's mind and thus we speak harshly of his intentions. We do not know the motives back of the thing done and we say he is insincere. His weaknesses he has attempted to conceal from the general public, and yet when he sins or fails in life's struggles, we begin actively the use of our clubs or our tongues, the latter being the more injurious. Had we known of the struggles within his own soul, instead of criticizing, we would have been the first to help.

3. A reflex influence. We have heard such a statement that if a man fights a thing long enough, he will become like the thing he has been fighting. We know very well the influence of a beautiful picture. We have read the story of the "Great Stone Face." If good things impress us, certainly we have reason to believe the same of bad ones. Perhaps then, the greatest injury in judging unkindly comes to the individual doing the judging rather than the one being judged. This in effect is the meaning of the above passage.

4. Not a compromise. The writer of Matthew does not mean that we should never speak, even though wrong has been done. Christians must be people of real convictions. When necessary, they should speak out in meeting. One can stand for his convictions in the face of great wrongdoing, and yet judge kindly. The passage above was not given to make mollycoddles out of us but to straighten out one of the most difficult kinks of our being. How well the Master understood the failings of human nature.

5. The weak with the strong. There are a lot of people in the world with whom we do not agree. Some of them are not as strong as we are (in our own estimation). They do not have the standing of our dignified selves. What we need now is an abiding appreciation of humanity wherever we find it—of its weaknesses, its failures, its joys, its successes, its strength—an appreciation of the other fellow even though he is on the other side of the fence and does not use our shibboleths.

What Constitutes a Call to Missionary Service at Home or Abroad?

By W. O. CARVER

Calls from God are conditioned by, and adjusted to the temperaments and experiences of those who are called. The common element in them all is a definite, sustained conviction that God, in wisdom and law, desires me to do this thing. This conviction is produced by the Holy Spirit working within and upon my personality. In so working He uses my psychological processes, my thoughts, emotions and will. The conviction must begin, usually, if not always, in information. God is not likely to call me to a work in a field about which I am ignorant. Abraham was called to go to a land which God would show him and he "obeyed and went out not knowing whither he went." But the essential feature in Abraham's call was not the land. He was called to the worship of the one true God and to found a line of blessing through which his God could bless the human race. He subordinated all else to this great ideal. On that point his call was clear.

Isaiah was called and responded, "Here am I, send me" and then God gave him his specific message. "Come after me" said Jesus, to the fishermen by Galilee's lake, "and I will make you fishers of men." They followed only later—and yet in due time—to learn where these men might be. So Saul of Tarsus said first, "What shall I do, Lord?" The surrendered life is the first response of the called soul. Thence the road will open by the will of God and by the leading of His Spirit. God expects us to use our reason, to study His providences, to counsel with friends who know us and love us and who yet love God more and will deal faithfully with us. In it all there will be a deep feeling, deepening into a definite conviction, that God had in mind for me from the beginning doing this thing in this place. In humble, prayerful confidence I will accept this conviction. It is God's call to me. I may rejoice in it at once, or the joy may come later. That will depend upon my conscious affinity with the assigned task.

Let no young man or woman feel that God's call is necessarily to an unwelcome or uncongenial task. It may be so and one may need to conquer one's resentment. It is better if I feel at once that this task and I are suited. If I am willing He will lead me.

Important Notice

The B. Y. P. U. Topic for January 22, 1922 will be "Baptist Young People and World Fellowships." The great address on this subject delivered by Dr. W. J. McGlothlin before the young people's session of the Northern Baptist Convention has been printed and will be available for discussion of the topic on January 22. Write to Baptist Young People's Union of America, 125 No. Wabash Avenue, Chicago, or 408 Humboldt Bank Building, San Francisco, Calif.

Tithing Campaign a Winner

Mr. Benjamin Starr representing the stewardship department of the New York State Board of Promotion, sends the following interesting information:

The latest report of the tithing work in the Homer Church for the year 1920 is a very interesting study. Homer Church is located in a village of about 3,000 population and has a membership of 360. During the year 1920 the tithing band numbered seventy-seven; the non-tithing contributors, 201.

Seventy-seven tithers contributed $1,666.22, or $15.15 per member; 201 non-tithing contributors gave $1,455.37, or $7.04 per member.

Seventy-seven tithers contributed $3,520.45 or $45.72 per member; 201 non-tithing contributors gave $2,733.17 or $13.59 per member.

Those interested in putting on a campaign in their local churches should write to Baptist Tithers' League, 125 No. Wabash Ave., Chicago, Ill. for a sample package of sixteen leaflets on tithing.

Women Work in Machine Shop

It certainly looked and sounded like a machine shop. The strange part of it was there were forty or fifty women gathered about the great machine and stranger still each woman was a Master Mechanic who had specialized, and strange of all, in spite of the heat, which was like a fiery furnace these women were eagerly using every bit of their training and experience in putting their beloved machine in order. Screws and bolts were tightened, adjustments made and oil used freely where friction might occur.

The parts were labeled with mysterious letters.—J. B.—C. W. C.—W. W. G.—W. M. S.—S. O.—D. O.—and the whole with a long array of W. A. B. F. M. S. and W. A. B. H. M. S.

Sometimes they rested from their labors as each one explained how her particular part functioned and made the whole stronger and more efficient.

This gathering was none other than the workers' conference of the women of the denomination who have been entrusted with the home mission department of woman's work.

The magnificent organization of the women of the denomination (for the Women's Foreign and Home societies are joint owners of this machine) is not in existence for existence's sake, but for a world-wide, age-long purpose that all the peoples of the earth may know Jehovah and the Christ whom he hath sent.

Not all the time was spent on organization but rather in hearing the story of the year's achievements and in catching the vision of the days to come.

The three missionary supervisors, who mother and counsel the missionaries, were there, almost forgetting the hard places of the year in the joy of homes redeemed, great groups of boys and girls reached, new centers planned and working and the more than 2500 conversinos reported from the field. These twice born lives were not in our American Sunday schools and churches but in the lowly places of our continent, among Indians, Mexicans, Alaskans, Orientals, Negroes and foreign speaking peoples from Europe.

Who can catch the vision of this thing? Not only for this land but for the people of all lands,—Indian, Italian, and Chinese young people begging for Christian education and training for service.

The new department of the work, just two years of age, fired with enthusiasm all who heard the story of the Christian Americanization secretaries, because in this department every woman may become a missionary herself, no longer just delegating all the service and the joy. She may make friends with these lonely women from far away lands and in forming new friendships which shall enrich her own life, she shall win friends for her country and her Christ.

It was evident the spirit of Jubilee had spread through all departments. How could it be otherwise, because "where one member is honored all the members rejoice," and the same women in the churches who have made possible our great Jubilee in foreign missions also have made possible the splendid record of women's home missions. Through all the sessions the impression grew of stronger, truer, firmer foundations laid than ever before; of a readiness for a larger service and a growing capacity of catching a greater vision. The workers went out from that upper room with a fresh joy in service but with a humble realization that "we have this treasure in earthen vessels that the exceeding greatness of the power may be of God"—"praying that they might know him and the power of his resurrection and the fellowship of his suffering."

Farewell Meeting for Russian Missionaries

Four members of the Russian Baptist Church are returning to Russia and Russian-Poland as missionaries at their own charges. They are leaving the comparative comfort and opportunities of life in this country fully appreciating the sacrifice involved, desiring above all else to bring to the people of their native cities and villages the saving knowledge of Jesus Christ.

An impressive farewell service was held in the Reid Memorial Church, Tuesday evening, May 31st, in which these brethren told of their purpose and the pastors and officers of the Baptist Union responded. The meeting closed with prayers of dedication, while those present knelt about the platform of the attractive meeting room of the Russian congregation, which was recently remodeled largely through the service of these missionary brethren who are now returning to their native lands.

The constituency of the Baptist Union, and indeed the whole denomination, have reason for thankfulness in the privilege of a part in preparing and sending forth these missionaries. They are Demitry Peckarchik, Chairman of the Advisory Committee of the Church, John Sues and wife, Sunday School Superintendent, Stefan Kavalev and wife.

Just before leaving Buffalo for the steamer on Wednesday, June 1st, each of the men of the missionary party was presented on behalf of the Baptist Union with a teacher's edition of the Bible in Russian, beside being furnished by friends of the Union with a large number of Bibles and Testaments.

Dane-Norwegian Conference

The thirtieth annual meeting of the conference was held with the Norwegian-Danish church in its splendid new church building on the corner of 16th Avenue South and 33rd Street, St. Paul. There were 96 visitors and delegates enrolled. The weather was favorable and all the sessions from Wednesday evening till Sunday evening, June 1-5, were very well attended. The hospitality of the membership and the convenience of the new building were proven of a high order by this initial meeting.

The transactions of the conference were conducted in a fine spirit and with despatch. Officers chosen for the ensuing year were A. Broholm, Storden, pres.; O. Breding, Minneapolis, vice-pres.; E. P. Johnson, Lake Lillian, (Atwater post office) sec.; C. L. Jensen, Waiworth, (Ulen post office) ass't sec. and J. P. Larson, Clarks Grove, treas. As a mission committee were chosen: A. E. Carlson, Albert Lea; A. N. Arneson, Wegdahl; A. W. Warren, Clarks Grove; O. Breding and H. H. Sorenson, Alden. The women chose Mrs. H. C. Hansen, pres.; Mrs. A. A. Ohon, vice-pres.; Mrs. A. Broholm, sec. and Mrs. A. E. Carlson, treas. The tabulated results of the year's work are as follows: There were fifty-two persons baptized, fifty-three received by letter, three were restored; total 108. There was a decrease by death of twelve; by letter, fifty-one; by exclusion, eight; total, seventy-one. There was a net increase of thirty-seven. The entire membership of the conference is 1637 in seventeen churches. There has been contributed to missions, in part through the New World Movement, $15,489; paid for local expenses, $29,875.74; given to other benevolent objects, $583.37; a total of $45,948.11. There are two Norwegian and seven Danish pastors at work. There are one Danish and one Norwegian missionary and one Norwegian colporteur for half-time at work in the state. Much of the work is being carried on in the English language.

North Dakota State Convention Minot, July 13-17.

The state convention will open July 13. In the evening addresses will be given on "Our Ten Mission Fields," by Dr. J. T. Latta, India, and "The Call of the Best," by Dr. Carl D. Case, Chicago.

Thursday forenoon the ministerial conference will hear a discussion on "The Pastor and the New World Movement," by Dr. Hugh A. Heath of New York City, and addresses by Dr. E. F. Jorden, Bismarck, and Rev. J. R. Spiller, Ellendale. These addresses will be followed by a conference and a pastors' dinner.

From 9:00 to 12:00, a separate meeting of the women will be in charge of Mrs. C. E. Webster and Mrs. C. E. Johnston.

The address of Pres. R. B. Griffith, and the annual sermon by Rev. John Melmaker, of Glenburn, will come in the afternoon, to be followed by Miss Isabel Crawford and Dr. William E. Chalmers.

In the evening "Our Response to a World Challenge" will be presented by Dr. Hugh A. Heath and "World Reconstruction," by Dr. Carl D. Case.

Friday morning will witness the election of officers, and there will be addresses by Dr. J. T. Latta, Dr. Ralph W. Hobbs, Dr. Carl D. Case, Dr. William E. Chalmers, Mr. E. Wiesle, Rev. J. G. York,

Our Denominational Schools

Scrutineers make a thorough survey—Schools help in it—Find "vague accusations, rumors and grievances of doubtful origin, trivial matters of complaint, small and unworthy criticism"—Show wherein the trouble lies—Mr. Sweet adds something.

The eagerly awaited report of the committee on denominational schools to be a document of forty-seven pages packed full of detailed information regarding the findings of the committee, gathered in response to its questionnaire or through visits to the schools. Manifestly it is impossible to print such a report in full in the columns of THE BAPTIST. Readers who are interested can secure a copy of the full document: there will be given here only a few extracts and the conclusion.

In its early part the report says:

One result of the investigation that is of great value is that it has made it clear that ample provision has already been made for the oversight of our schools of every grade, and for the correction of any false tendencies that may from time to time appear. Usually there is adequate provision made for the removal of teachers who for any reason are not desirable. And again:

Another advantage of the investigation has been that it has stirred within our Baptist people the conviction that they have a right to control their schools. There has been begotten a deepened feeling that these are our schools, founded by our money, supported by our interest, claiming our allegiance, and training our children. We have no disposition to renounce our ownership in them.

The Schools Co-operated

The committee found that the schools were quick to respond to its inquiries and gave every possible assistance in ascertaining the facts desired. It also found when it tried to trace down the general accusations made against the colleges and schools that "most of the material sent to us consisted of the most general statements, the vaguest accusations, rumors and grievances of doubtful origin, trivial matters of complaint, and small and rather unworthy criticism."

Inquiry was made of the schools as to whether the members of the governing bodies must be members of particular religious organizations; whether the teachers must hold some particular religious faith; whether the teachers are required to believe or teach as "essential principles of the Christian faith," the Divine Inspiration and Authority of the Bible, the Sinlessness of Jesus, the Deity of Jesus Christ, the Necessity and the Sufficiency of the Atonement, the Reality of the Resurrection of Jesus Christ, the Personality of the Holy Spirit, the Return of Our Lord; whether, where such requirements exist, they are faithfully observed. The schools were also asked to indicate what religious activities were participated in by faculty and students. The findings on all these matters were measurably satisfactory.

The Committee was instructed also to inquire concerning the efficiency of our schools in producing "men and women of Christian character and capacity for Christian service." It seemed best to restrict this inquiry to the record of the churches served by seminary-trained men as found in State Convention reports of benevolent contributions and baptisms and other accessions to church-membership, comparing these figures with the record of churches served by non-seminary-trained men in the States in which the seminaries are located.

Returns from only three Seminaries and those for but a part of the men of the 1901 to 1905 graduating classes reveal that for the years 1916-1920 129 men led churches to give $1,155,418.56, reported 12,028 baptisms, and 10,342 other additions, an average of $8,956.73, 93 baptisms, and 80 other additions. Reports from the churches served by 276 seminary graduates of 1911-1915 show that $2,567,223.84 was contributed in the years 1916-1920, 25,786 baptisms were reported, and 23,897 other accessions—an average for the five-year period of $9,301.53; 93 baptisms, and 86 other additions. Comparing these figures it is seen that in the same five-year period the later graduates procured larger offerings to denominational benevolences and more accessions by letter or experience, and the same number of baptisms as their brethren of ten years more experience in the pastorate.

Combining these figures it is found that 405 seminary-trained men led the churches to give in a five-year period an average of $9,129.13 for benevolence, reported 93 baptisms and 84 other additions. In the same five-year period 675 non-seminary men in the States of Pennsylvania, New York, Wisconsin, Kansas, and California, led their churches to give $1,281,840.83 to denominational benevolences, had 2,517 baptisms and 26,639 other additions, or an average for the same five years of $1,899.02 for benevolences, 37 baptisms, and 39 other additions.

The inquiry also revealed the fact that orthodox faith and religious habits are far more prevalent in our Baptist schools than in others from which figures were obtained which are not called Baptist.

Baptists Now Control Their Schools

The general conclusions of the report follow:

And we cannot turn the convention into a court where a man shall be tried for heresy, and testimony be taken pro and con. The purposes of the convention are practical, not controversial or judicial. Nor has this convention any right of control over our Baptist schools. While the convention's advice would doubtless be of great weight, yet the almost certain effect of condemning any man here would be to put his school on the defensive, and perhaps cause it to challenge the convention's authority. The real power of control over our schools is in the Baptist constituency in the general locality where the school stands. The control of the Baptists of New York State over Rochester and Colgate seminaries is almost absolute. The control of the Baptists of New England over Newton, though less direct, is equally strong. Crozer is as independent of popular control as any of our seminaries, yet Crozer could not be deaf to the expressed will of the Baptists of Pennsylvania and New Jersey. No school could resist the organized influence of the people of its part of the country. In this convention we can all of us freely speak our minds as Baptists are in the habit of doing; we can unitedly affirm our steadfast adherence to the faith once for all delivered to the saints, but we must leave the matter of dealing with false teachers to the local body of Baptists, who are clothed with ample authority to dispose of practically every case.

What Causes Divisions?

More potent in creating divisions among us than anything that has been said in the classroom or in print so far as has come under our notice is the spirit that has been exhibited by some of the teachers in our schools and some disputants outside our schools. Some men create an atmosphere that makes it impossible to trust them. Some use language which makes it impossible to respect them. No one has as yet attained such eminence in scholarship as to warrant his feeling that he is omniscient and so may sneer at those who differ with him as ignorant. And on the other hand no one is as yet so evidently the sole repository of divine revelation as to warrant his denouncing as infidels those who disagree with him. Some of the disciples of old thought that the right method of procedure with those who did not follow Christ as they did, was to call down fire from heaven to consume them. But that was not the method of Jesus Christ. He rebuked such disciples and told them that they did not know what manner of spirit they were of. And it still is true that only they who have the spirit of Christ are his. Lack of the spirit of Christ in dealing with those who differ with us, though they really have gone aside from the faith, is the worst of heresies. No doubt a teacher in any one of our schools who rejects the age-long Baptist teaching that the Scriptures are our supreme rule of thought and life, or faith and conduct, ought to take himself off, and if he does not go of his own accord, we ought to use persuasive methods to assist him in going, yet it ought to be possible to do that without either side making a display of itself. Certainly excommunication and recrimination are not appropriate in men all of whom profess devotion to Jesus Christ, and declare themselves loyal to his teaching.

Get Rid of the Disturber by Proper Local Procedure

The committee is confident that for the most part our schools of all grades are doing a work of which the denomination may well be proud. Here and there doubtless is a teacher who has departed from the Baptist faith or has lost the Saviour's spirit. The utterances of these men have been published far and wide, and have brought strife into our ranks and confusion to our work. It is the duty of the Baptist communities throughout the country to displace from the schools men who impugn the authority of the Scriptures as the Word of God and who deny the deity of our Lord, but they must do it in the prescribed ways already indicated; and they ought to do it in such a way as will conserve the well-being of the churches which Christ has redeemed with his own blood, and in such a spirit as will extend and strengthen his work at home and abroad.

"Five years ago we spent three times as much money on intoxicating liquors as we did on education. A part of that money at least has been diverted to educational channels. Five years ago less than ten per cent of all the pupils in the common grades entered high school, and not over two per cent ever went to college. If only four per cent now go to college, we can see why the university halls are filled to overflowing."

Minority Report Shows Something More

Rev. F. W. Sweet gave a minority report in which he showed, by use of the figures contained in the other report that seminary efficiency is increasing and not decreasing, and that the graduates of such seminaries have in a certain area during a period of years "led their churches to give for denominational benevolences an average of four and a half times as much money, secured two and a half times as many baptisms and twice as many accessions by latter and Christian experience," as have another large group of non-seminary trained men.

He finds that with only one partial exception there are no legal requirements bidding schools to teach certain doctrines as essential to the Christian faith. "That uniform refusal of our Baptist forbears to incorporate their fixed terms of doctrinal statement in the charters perpetuating their devotion to Christian education is a revelation of absolute consistency with the root principle of our denominational life. It is a glorious illustration of the wisdom and courage of our Baptist fathers' faith in God, in the truth and in the safety of institutions entrusted to living Christian men mainly members of Baptist churches."

The report concludes:

There remains but one and that the first of the specific inquiries which our committee was charged to make, an inquiry so searching, so vital, so pre-eminent that it seems to embrace all others, i. e., an inquiry into the loyalty of our schools to Jesus Christ and His gospel. Hundreds of letters have come to the committee from school authorities and others. Members of the committee have visited all of our theological seminaries except one. Administrative officers, professors and students have been seen in the round of their regular school life. What report shall be brought as to their loyalty to Jesus Christ and his gospel? Let our Lord speak for himself on the subject of loyalty to Him. He taught "as one having authority and not as the scribes." He said, "Ye shall know the truth, and the truth shall make you free." In his parting message he said, "I have yet many things to say unto you but ye cannot bear them now. Howbeit when he, the Spirit of truth, is come, he shall guide you into all truth." His was the authority of truth, not of tradition. He saw God in the present as well as the past. He taught the continued leadership of God's eternal Spirit in every generation. Loyalty to him is loyalty to his Spirit, his freedom, his spiritual ideals.

I report to you, delegates to the Northern Baptist Convention, that from the large correspondence of our committee and from all the personal contacts of the year, making allowance for the human frailty to which we all confess, and save for the eddies which but reveal the volume and main movement of the stream of our denominational, educational life, that I come to the end of the extended labors of the year with a profound conviction that our brethren chosen from among us to train our young people and the ministry of our churches are Jesus Christ's free men, loyal to him and to his gospel, as expressed by his wife, his spirit and his teachings, his death and his resurrection.

Finds Baptist Teachers Loyal

The rich Christian character of our teachers as a whole, their sacrificial devotion to the cause of Christian education, the many disciplined leaders they return to our churches year by year developed from the immature youth entrusted to their guidance—these are some of the good fruits, not from an evil tree but grown only on the good tree of a vital Christian faith.

The majority report does not seem to me to affirm this vital loyalty to Christ on the part of our Baptist teachers in secondary schools, colleges and seminaries as clearly as the findings of the year demand.

In concluding this report, let me record:

1. Pride because the year's inquiry has revealed that our essential Northern Baptist unity is in the realm of permanent religious life rather than in the changing sphere of theological thought,

O LITTLE SNOWFLAKE

(Just received from New Zealand—try it with your ice cream.)

All sheltered by the Mother-cloud

The little flake looked down;

It saw the city's seething crowd

It saw the shining town.

How fair and far those steeples rise

To greet us, mother dear!

It is so lovely in the skies,

Why do we linger here?

The north wind says the merry earth

Is full of life and glow;

I long to mingle with its mirth,

O Mother, let us go.

The Mother-cloud reached out her arm,

"O little flake," quoth she,

"The earth is full of sin and harm,

Bide here, bide here with me."

But when the pale cloud Mother slept,

The north wind whispered "Fly!"

And from her couch the snowflake crept

And tip-toed down the sky.

Before the winter's sun his fleet

Brief journey made that day,

All soiled and blackened in the street and that we have kept hitherto that intellectual freedom necessary for spiritual growth.

The little snowflake lay.

2. Satisfaction that the method and scope of denominational control obtaining in our schools is not only consistent with our Baptist principles but has been approved by the type and efficiency of the Christian leaders produced.

3. A conviction that we are summoned anew to appreciate, exemplify, and emphasize that interpretation of the Christian life and Christian Church which time has justified in our Baptist history. Our schools furnish us the leadership of our churches but our churches have produced our schools. Our associations, state conventions, national societies and Northern Baptist Convention are organized to secure denominational efficiency, not doctrinal uniformity. On the official seal of our Northern Baptist Convention are engraved the words, "Freedom, Unity, Service." As a Baptist brotherhood we write freedom first. In our fellowship when freedom dies unity vanishes and service is destroyed. But while freedom lives unity will be vital and service fruitful. The only path of resistless power for Baptists is the one our fathers trod, each man with the New Testament in his hand and the Spirit of God in his heart. It was for them—it will be for us and our children—a rough path, but it is the path of courage, principle, freedom, fraternity and service though it lead to a Cross.

Our Own Folks

Rev. F. E. Stockton, and Dr. Bruce Kinney.

Saturday forenoon, in addition to some of the speakers already named, there will be addresses by a "lady speaker" and by Dr. E. L. Killam of Chicago. In the afternoon there will be a Baptist picnic at Riverside Park, with addresses and special music by the Minot Band. A missionary festival, with a children's pageant conducted by Miss Agnes Oliver, an address on "The Golden Jubilee" by a lady speaker, and another on "Japan" by Dr. William E. Chalmers, will fill up the evening.

Sunday morning Dr. Carl D. Case will preach. The afternoon will be occupied by the younger people with an elaborate program.

Sunday evening will bring a sermon on "Remember Jesus Christ," by Dr. Hugh A. Heath, and a closing consecration service led by Dr. William E. Chalmers.

Fundamentals Conference

with a pre-millennial interpretation. Finally President Lee Scarborough of the Southwestern Baptist Theological Seminary spoke on "The Supreme Passion of the Gospel." Although he came late at night after a hot and wearisome day, he roused and held the people with a trumpet call to evangelism. This he regards as the one really fundamental question. "If you want to preserve your schools from error, establish in them departments of evangelism," he said. "If you want to preserve the orthodoxy of the ministry, start an evangelistic campaign. Many of our preachers need juicing up. There is no shelf for an evangelistic minister."

"What a pity this conference frittered away its time on anything less fundamental than Dr. Scarborough's message," a pastor of the Middle West remarked as he left the hall.

The present executive committee was continued with instructions to carry on among the churches of the North a campaign for the adoption of the "Confession of Faith."

Kalamazoo College Commencement

June 10 to 15 was a period of unusual importance in the life of Kalamazoo College.

The board of trustees adopted a big program of expansion which will mean a new era in the history of our college.

The program which will cover a period of about five years, will place Kalamazoo College on the map as one of the best equipped, most modern educational institutions in the country. This new expansion is necessary because of the present unfavorable situation and inadequate equipment of buildings and to meet the needs of the present student body. With the new expansion the college will be fitted to take care of a student body more than twice the size of the present one, and the endowment will provide for a much larger faculty.

The program for expansion calls for endowment, $600,000; land for expansion, $125,000; woman's building, $125,000; library, $100,000; recitation building, $200,000; central heating plant, $90,000; auditorium and administration building, $200,000; first science building, $200,000; new gymnasium, $100,000; athletic field and house, $60,000; total, $1,800,000.

As an evidence of good faith in adopting this program the trustees have already entered upon the purchase of important pieces of property. The first payment by the trustees has been made for the magnificent Stockbridge property at the corner of Carmel and West Main Streets. The land purchased includes a frontage of 366 feet on West Main Street and 400 feet on Carmel; the west line is 451 feet and the south line is 376 feet. Such a move means bringing the college from its position on a side street and facing the railroad track, to a more commanding position on the main street of the city. It is planned to use this property as an approach and upon the hill to erect a new auditorium and administration building.

Another piece of property has been purchased as a site for the erection of science buildings.

Negotiations for the purchase of another parcel of land for a new athletic field are also under way.

At the college reunion banquet, attended by about 300, the alumni and former students proposed and voted to secure the funds to build a general recitation building to be known as "Stetson Hall" in honor of President Stetson. A considerable sum was reported as having already been subscribed and paid for a new dormitory for women. Miss Florence E. Grant is chairman of a committee to secure funds for the Women's dormitory and it is expected that the women of Michigan will provide this much needed building.

President H. L. Stetson preached the baccalaureate sermon and Rev. John E. Smith of Spokane, Washington, delivered the sermon before the religious societies.

The commencement address was delivered by Prof. Theodore Gerald Soares of Chicago University.

Forty-eight graduates received collegiate degrees. The honorary degree of Doctor of Divinity was conferred upon

Rev. John E. Smith, who is now in his sixth year as pastor of the First Baptist Church of Spokane, Washington, and who was for eleven years pastor of the First Baptist Church of Kalamazoo.

Maine Colleges and Academy

Commencement at the Maine colleges and schools have been the feature of the recent weeks. In the Baptist education system of Maine, the two colleges Colby and Bates have a student enrollment of over 1000 and the schools, Hebron, Coburn, Ricker, Maine Central, and Higgins, have nearly 1000. The commencement exercises have been a fitting close for a very prosperous year. The only sad element is the illness that has fallen upon Principal Sargent which must terminate his career as an educator. An able successor will take up his work and carry it forward in line with the best Hebron traditions. Coburn, with an enrollment of 178, has maintained the remarkable average of 165 in daily attendance during the year. It graduates 52 students, 42 of whom will go to college in the fall. Steps were taken by the Trustees to enlarge the resources and equipment of the school that it may keep full abreast of its great opportunity.

After the remarkable success of the centennial commencement of college last year, it was not expected that a large number of the alumni would return this year. The loyalty of Colby men, however, as well as their desire to have part in the new forward movements of the college secured a large attendance. The baccalaureate sermon was given by Dr. Cornelius Wolfekin of New York. It was a remarkable address both in its breadth and its inspiring quality. Dr. Crothers the brilliant essayist of Boston, gave the Phi Beta Kappa address. Dr. Franklin W. Johnson of Columbia University gave the commencement address. In the afternoon of Sunday a memorial service in honor of Col. Richard Cutts Shannon was held in the college chapel with addresses by President Roberts and Ex-chief Justice Whitehouse of Augusta.

Ninety-five degrees were conferred in course upon the graduating class, two honorary degrees were given, that of D.D. upon Addison Benjamin Lorimer, pastor of the Central Square church of Portland and the same degree upon President Peacock, the successor in the presidency of Shaw University of Dr. Charles F. Meserve of Colby.

At the Trustee meeting, the president was able to announce that the conditions governing the Centennial Endowment Fund have been fulfilled. The college receives $125,000 from the general Education Board and now has an offer from the same Board of $50,000 toward an additional fund of $150,000. A campaign for which has been already launched under their hopeful conditions.

This commencement was notable as the 50th anniversary of the admission of women to the college. It was celebrated under the auspices of the Alumnae Association of the college with Miss Adelle Gilpatrick as chairman of the committee. On the afternoon of Tuesday, the play, "As You Like It" was given by the girls of the senior class on the back campus of the college in a way that won the highest commendation. In the evening, Mary Lowe-Carver, Litt. D., the first woman graduate of the college gave an address on college women. This was followed by an address by Professor Romiett Stevens of Columbia University. Miss Runnals who has been acting Dean of the women's division, has demonstrated her signal fitness for the position and was made Dean of the women with increased salary. The Department of Physical Education for the women has been definitely organized. An athletic field will be prepared during the summer. Steps were taken toward the providing of a recreation building and gymnasium for the women and Miss Gilpatrick will have charge of raising the funds therefor.

Ricker Institute at Houlton has had a very prosperous year under the able, wise and Christian leadership of its Principal, Rev. E. H. Stover. One of the features of the Commencement Exercises was the presentation to the school by the Junior class of a bust of Theodore Roosevelt and a fine tribute to his friend by W. W. (Bill) Sewall the guide whom Roosevelt made famous.

Pillsbury Academy Commencement

The exercises of the week of the forty-fourth annual commencement of Pillsbury Academy began on Friday evening, June 3, with the annual prize contest in declamation. On Saturday evening, the pupils of the department of music gave a recital. On Sunday evening, Rev. Mark F. Sanborn, pastor of the Judson Memorial Church, Minneapolis, preached a strong and stirring baccalaureate sermon from Exodus 3:10, "Come now therefore, and I will send thee unto Pharaoh that thou mayest bring forth my people, the children of Israel out of Egypt."

The final examinations were held on Monday and Tuesday. It is interesting to note that since the academy has become a boys' school, there has been a larger percentage of the students on the honor roll than ever before. On Monday evening, the senior class presented in a very creditable manner, the class play, "The Fortune Hunter," by Winchell Smith. Besides contributing to the training of the participants and to the entertainment of the large audience, the play lent a striking lesson in the value of work and service, and helpfulness. In addition to the usual prize military drill on Tuesday afternoon, there was a marksmanship contest, and an athletic track meet with MacAlester College. The academy won over the college with a score of 63 to 45. Pillsbury won fifth place on Stag Field at the University of Chicago this spring in the academic field meet. Victor Naegli, alone, won this enviable place in competition with fourteen other academies which sent from six to thirty men apiece. This gifted, unassuming athlete now holds several records of the Northwest. The graduating recital by the department of music showed an excellent degree of accomplishment in piano and voice.

During the commencement program on Wednesday morning, six young men chosen from the graduating class presented orations in competition for cash prizes. The orations were of a high moral and spiritual tone. Such earnest speakers tend to allay the fears we may entertain concerning the flabby moral fibre of boys of this teen age. Most of the graduates are intending to go to college. The distributing of the many prizes, made possible by the gifts of Mrs. Margaret Pillsbury, is always interesting and a stimulus to work. Principal Milo B. Price announced the bequest of Mr. Charles Jefts of over $26,000 and the gift of Mrs. Mary Buck and the monthly gifts from the Northern Baptist Convention. At the commencement luncheon, Mr. Ernest Fagenstrom, as toastmaster, called upon several former graduates and visitors to respond to toasts. Parents, pastor, and students eloquently testified to the thorough training and wholesome Christian influence of Pillsbury Academy.

Bucknell University Commencement

Perfect weather, a record attendance, and the finest of spirit characterized this year's Anniversary Commencement at Bucknell University.

The week opened with the undergraduate recital of the School of Music on Friday evening, June 10. The following day was given up to the organ recital of the School of Music and the tennis meet with Penn State, which Bucknell won 6-0.

Formal exercises began with the baccalaureate sermon on Sunday morning. President Emory W. Hunt, speaking on the opening words of Paul's letter to the Hebrews, emphasized the necessity and sweetness of the personal relationship to Christ.

On Sunday evening the Oratorio Society presented Handel's "Judas Macabaeus" in masterly fashion.

Monday morning the graduating class of the School of Music presented its annual recital in Bucknell Hall. In the afternoon the baseball team wound up its season by defeating Susquehanna University 7-5. At six-thirty the Repasz Band of Williamsport gave its first campus concert. After the concert, the seniors presented as their class-play "Seven Keys to Baldpate."

Tuesday was Alumni Day, and busy from start to finish. The Alumni Association convened at nine o'clock for its annual business meeting, at which an entire reorganization of the body was effected. Carl C. Law, Esq., '85, of Pittsburgh, was elected President. At 11:30 the Alumnae Association met and resolved to undertake a "women's campaign for a new women's building." At 12:30 the alumnae held their annual luncheon in the Evangelical Church, while the men gathered at the college dining hall for a stag luncheon. In the afternoon the annual alumni baseball game resulted in the usual prodigies of skill and valor on the part of the old-timers. The anniversary pageant followed the baseball game. A new and delightful feature of the day was the alumni supper, at which tables were reserved for the reunion classes.

Following the second twilight concert by the Repasz Band, President and Mrs. Hunt held open house and extended greetings in their gracious way to a throng of alumni and friends. The day closed with the Alumni Assembly in Tuslin Gymnasium.

On Wednesday morning the annual Commencement of the college was held in Commencement Hall. One hundred and thirty baccalaureate degrees, twenty-seven Master's degrees, and twenty-one diplomas in music were conferred.

The five honorary degrees awarded this year awakened especial interest. Countess Elizabeth de Santa Eulalia, of Philadelphia, was awarded the degree of Doctor of Laws—the first woman to be thus honored by Bucknell. Charles P. Vaughan of Philadelphia, an outstanding figure in the industrial world, was given the degree of Doctor of Science. Upon Rev. Charles A. Brooks, was conferred the degree of Doctor of Divinity. Two Bucknell alumni also—Joseph C. Hazen, pastor of the First Baptist Church of Peoria, Ill., and Joseph R. Wood, of the class of '94, Secretary of the Federation of Churches of Newark, N. J.—received the D.D.

The Corporation Dinner Wednesday noon brought the exercises to a close. President Hunt presided in characteristic fashion. Snappy addresses were made by each of the recipients of honorary degrees, and by Director Ernest L. Tustin. '84, who in closing invoked the prayers of Bucknellians for him in his responsible task of guiding the annual Convention at Des Moines.

Among the announcements were those of gifts of $55,000 of which $40,000 came from Dr. Franklin J. Mathews, '68, and $15,000 from the estate of the late Henry Kirke Porter.

Commencement of the Bohemian-Slovak Department of the National Baptist Slavic Training School

On Tuesday evening, June 14, 1921, in the First Bohemian Baptist Church of Chicago (The old Millard Avenue Church) were held the graduation exercises of the Bohemian-Slovak Department of the National Baptist Slavic Training School. The church was filled with representatives from the various Czecho-Slovak churches in Chicago and vicinity. Rev. Chas. Brazda of Minnesota was also present. Anthems were sung by the choir of the First Bohemian Baptist Church and other musical numbers, vocal and instrumental, were furnished by the young people of the churches. Pastors V. J. Vita, A. P. Slabey, and John Fort of the Immanuel Bohemian, Slovak, and Third Bohemian Churches respectively participated in the services in Scripture reading and prayer.

Dr. V. Kralicek, pastor of the First Bohemian Church and Head of the Bohemian-Slovak Department of the School since its beginning, in his delightfully characteristic manner introduced the speakers. It was exceedingly gratifying that Dr. Frank L. Anderson, President of the International Baptist Seminary in East Orange, New Jersey, was able to be present to deliver the Commencement address.

The students were represented by Mr. Shuldes who delivered a strong address in the Bohemian language.

Dr. Benjamin Otto, superintendent of the Baptist Executive Council of Chicago, was introduced. His "proslovy" pleased the audience immensely. He cited incidents in his own life to show that in his preparation for the ministry from the time of his conversion at the age of sixteen he made it his purpose to bring everything he did and every lesson he learned into captivity for Jesus Christ.

Dr. Judson B. Thomas, pastor of the First Austin Baptist Church, Chicago, and President of the Board of the Slavic Training School, presented the diplomas, giving words of congratulation and commendation in behalf of the American Baptist Home Mission Society. The graduates were Messrs. Vaclav Shuldes, Frank Cech, Edward Catlos, Michael Profant and Joseph Hadraba. It is expected that all of these Christian workers will have their fields of labor in Chicago. Mr. Catlos and Mr. Hadraba are already being considered for the work at First Church and Marigold Mission, and Mr. Shuldes has been called to the pastorate of the newly organized Czecho-Slovak Church in Berwyn.

With this commencement service the Bohemian-Slovak Department of the National Baptist Slavic Training School closes its work in Chicago. It will continue in the fall as a part of the International Baptist Seminary in East Orange.

University of Redlands Commencement

The Baptist Churches co-operating with a program that has to do with higher Christian education will ever feel deeply interested in the results of the development of that movement. It took keen vision, prayer and consecration to a noble ideal to bring the University of Redlands to its present position. The institution was wisely planted in a fast-growing territory where a college was needed. The devoted body of trustees, well equipped buildings, fast growing student body and excellent faculty attest the wisdom of the founding of the University of Redlands.

The University during the year has won honors. The girls' and boys' glee clubs have taken first rank as musical organizations in Southern California. In forensics the University debaters lead the West. In scholarship the College aims to take no second place.

June the 12th, was a Sunday long to be remembered. At 11 A.M. the Rev. Lincoln Ferris, First Methodist Church, San Diego, preached an eloquent and spiritual baccalaureate sermon to a full house on "Remember Jesus Christ." The Rev. Frank O. Belden, First Baptist Church, San Diego, delivered an able and impressive sermon to the Christian Organizations of the University in the evening. His theme was "The Service of Christ."

Monday evening the Annual Zanja Fiesta took place. The Musical Department, with some sixty or more students as performers, gave "The Chimes of Normandy." The Zanja Fiesta is now a popular tradition of the College Commencement.

June the 14th the Graduating Class Exercises took place. These exercises consisted of clever skits of class history and prophecy, musical numbers, planting tree, and presentation of two valuable globe lights on pillars at the entrance to the Science Hall. On the evening of this day the Annual Reception to the Graduating Class by President and Mrs. V. L. Duke in the Fine Arts building was a success.

Wednesday the 15th the Graduation Exercises began at 10:30 A.M. in the Baptist Church and concluded by a Banquet in the Congregational Church. The Commencement Address was delivered by the Rev. O. P. Gifford, D.D. His theme was "Accepting One's Universe." This was shown to mean accepting God and his Universe and adjusting oneself to that.

The first installment of the Fine Arts building is in course of erection. The girls' dormitories are full with a large waiting list. This is true of the boys' dormitories. Here is a challenge to women and men of means to invest in young men and women.

Church News by States

IN each state the director of promotion is an agent of THE BAPTIST. Unless some other person has been designated, as in a number of states, news items intended for publication should be sent to him. This does not deny the privilege always belonging to churches of sending matter direct to the office. In either case condense your material. Unless reporting some unusual event, make no item longer than six or seven printed lines. You can save our blue pencil.

ARIZONA

PHOENIX, FIRST—By the increased accommodation for our Sunday School, its attendance has doubled over last year. All other societies of the church are active and doing good work. The Mexican work is very encouraging. There are seventy-eight members, enough in numbers to form a church body. Until such time as they can organize, we are receiving them into our membership. We now have a Men's Missionary Union, which is helping our local Mexican work, but whose purpose is as wide as the world's mission field. We have received two hundred and five members, ninety-three by baptism.

PHOENIX, CALVARY has purchased a beautiful lot on which to build a new church home. On March 6, Rev. C. M. Rock tendered his resignation as our pastor. Rev. J. H. Helm and H. G. Behrman, members of our church, have since regularly supplied the pulpit. The membership has increased by seventy, fourteen by baptism.

PHOENIX, IMMANUEL—A short time ago we disposed of the old edifice and moved into the new one recently constructed. Since our removal to the new house both the attendance and the interest have been increased. Received eight new members, three by baptism.

PHOENIX, SECOND (COLORED)—Rev. E. D. Greene has been pastor during the past eight months. Ninety-two have been received, five by baptism.

PRESCOTT, LONE STAR—Our church has shown growth in almost every department of the work. The church as a whole has received her largest blessing in the victory the first day in the New World Movement Campaign. We went "over the top" some $1,100 and have paid 90 per cent to date on pledges. In our benevolence we have made a record of 350 per cent better than last year. Three months our pastor was ill and during the whole time the church carried on all the services. This has added strength to our people for they thus learned to depend more on themselves and the Lord. New talent was developed in this period. Nineteen members have been received, three by baptism.

SAFFORD received thirty-one new members, six by baptism.

SCOTTSDALE—Brother Pope, who was pastor at the beginning of the year resigned and Brother Vanderhoof became pastor. Sixteen have been added to our membership, six by baptism.

TEMPE—The church quite recently called the Rev. E. M. Lands of Hamilton, Mo., to become our pastor. We have received fourteen members, three by baptism.

TUCSON, FIRST, reached its quota in the New World Movement, then subscribed some $115,000 for a new church house, the building of which will probably begin this fall. One hundred and seventy have been received into the church, sixty-two by baptism.

SOMERTON—Rev. W. F. Stone, pastor. Seventeen additions, one by baptism.

TUCSON, ADAMS STREET MISSION—We are a small mission in number but we are working for the Master among those who are not able to go elsewhere, and to gather the children to learn more of Jesus and his love. Three have been received by baptism.

TUCSON, MEXICAN—Our members are few and have felt rather discouraged as we have been without a pastor so much of the time during the year. Brother Cattelain left the field September 6, 1920. The church doors have been kept open, however, for the regular services and the Sunday School, the faithful few leading the meetings. We are rejoicing in the coming of our new pastor, Rev. M. A. Urbina.

VERDE—In January Rev. W. J. Gordon came to be our pastor. Since then we have made rapid progress. Eleven have been received, five by baptism.

MIDDLE VERDE—Our church is located near the Camp Verde Indian School and quite a number of the Indians are taking an interest in our Sunday School and attend church services regularly. We look forward to the day when many of them will be won to Christ. Nine have been added to our membership, four by baptism.

WEST END—Rev. S. F. Hawkins is still our pastor. Our membership has increased by six, one by baptism.

WILLCOX—From a financial standpoint it has been a hard pull. Owing to an exceedingly dry year very little crops were raised. Eight have come into our church, four by baptism.

YOUNG—The church has voted to retain Pastor H. C. Horton for the coming year. He has served us well, enlarging his ministry by preaching in neighboring school houses. Our largest attendance was forty-nine. There has been a marked increase in the interest shown in the Sunday school. Four additions, one by baptism.

YUMA, FIRST—Rev. Frances W. Taylor has been the pastor for the year. The attendance has been excellent, the capacity of the house taxed for both preaching service and Sunday school. Membership increased thirty-four, twelve by baptism.

YUMA VALLEY—The Rev. V. B. Jones has been pastor since the first of the year. Interest and attendance is growing. Thirty-three additions to the church, thirteen by baptism.

REV. HAL P. FUDGE of Globe is supplying the church at Safford while they are locating a pastor.

YUMA MEXICAN, Carey B. Tooms, pastor. A new parsonage has been built during the year. The church is paying its pledges to the New World Movement promptly each month. Many removals. Received ten members, seven by baptism.

THE CHURCHES OF PHOENIX, Phoenix Mexican, Chandler, Bisbee and Miami are putting on Daily Vacation Bible Schools this summer. This is a fine beginning. The American churches of Phoenix are working together and the Bisbee Church is co-operating with the other churches of the city.

REV. E. M. LANDS of Hamilton, Mo., having accepted the call of the Tempe Church, is now on the field and hard at work.

BISBEE—Our pastor, C. T. Garrett, came to us last May. Under his leadership our work has been prospering splendidly. We have bought a parsonage during the year and paid almost $2,000.00 on our indebtedness. While we have paid only 56 per cent of our pledge to the New World Movement, we have paid over five times as much for missions this year as last. We have received eighty-three new members, forty-one by baptism.

BUCKEYE, Rev. J. D. Brown, pastor—Plans have been made for a new church house which it is hoped can be erected with the return of more prosperous times. There were ten additions to the membership.

CASA GRANDE was organized with four teen members. Received sixteen by baptism. Membership is now forty-five. Purchased four lots costing $1350 and erected a chapel at a cost of about $2500.

CHANDLER membership has been doubled. Of the fifty-five new members, thirty-nine have been by baptism. The Sunday school has doubled its attendance. Congregations fill the house and mission offerings have increased from $72.35 last year to $901 this year.

DOUGLAS, FIRST—Rev. A. P. Howells supplied during February and March. During the year received sixty-two members, thirty-six by baptism. Also made improvements on church house costing $5000.

GLENDALE, FIRST—With the aid of the convention purchased a house for their worship and have a consecrated pastor and family on the field. Received ninety-eight members, forty-four by baptism.

GLOBE, FIRST—Rev. E. A. Gottberg resigned in June to go to Oregon. The church called Rev. Hal P. Fudge, who came in September. Forty new members have been received, of which thirteen were by baptism. The closing of the mines and smelters has seriously hindered work. Many of the members have moved away.

GLOBE, SECOND (COLORED)—Our new church house has been completed and by the aid of the Home Mission Society and convention we are free of debt. We have no pastor. One has been baptized.

HOPI, FIRST MESA—Ten have been added to our membership, nine by baptism. This past year marks a great change in the attitude of the Mesa Hopis for good.

HOPI, SECOND MESA—The Spirit of God is working the hearts of many of the people of the villages. The missionaries are more kindly received and the Hopis listen reverently to the native Christians.

Our church is allotted $600 for the New World Movement Fund. It subscribed $1800 and is paid up to date in full.

MESA, FIRST, received thirty-five by additions, fifteen by baptism. The financial stringency has been keenly felt by our membership.

MIAMI, FIRST, secured twenty-five new members, eight by baptism. Every department of the church has grown steadily.

PALO VERDE received fourteen new members, six by baptism.

COLPORTER-MISSIONARY HOLLAND has moved his family from Scottsdale to Globe where he will be made centrally located for his work.

MR. CARL ERICS, the superintendent of construction of the convention, is doing some much needed repair work on the church house at Naco. He goes next to Tucson to put the Mexican parsonage in living condition for the pastor, Brother Urbina, and family.

DOUGLAS has elected one of their own members, Brother Harold L. Fickett, as supply.

REV. H. G. BEHRMAN has been called as stated supply of the Calvary Church, Phoenix, while the church is looking for a pastor.

REV. ROBERT MCMURDO is conducting special meetings with the Casa Grande Church.

ON THE MORNING OF MAY 3 the house of Pastor J. D. Brown of Buckeye was burned to the ground. All his household goods and clothing burned also. The community responded very liberally in raising over $500.00 for Brother Brown. The Pastors' Conference sent him $83.37 as an expression of sympathy and brotherly love.

SOMERTON has become pastorless through the resignation of Pastor W. F. Stone.

Annual Convention

The Arizona Baptist Convention met in annual session with the First Church, Bisbee, C. T. Garnett, Pastor, May 4-8, 1921. The sessions of the Convention were harmonious throughout. The discussions were on a high plane of Christian consideration and all exhibited an earnest desire to know how best to do the Lord's work. It was thought by many that the period of intercession in the midst of the forenoon and afternoon sessions had much to do with the spirit of the whole Convention. Throughout the entire Convention emphasis was placed on the Word of God and the necessity of the presence of the Holy Spirit in the life and work of ministers and people as necessary preparation for Christian service.

The presence of such visitors as Mrs. Mary L. Bishop and Dr. Alonzo M. Petty of the General Board of Promotion, Dr. W. A. Stanton of India, Dr. A. Mangano and President Duke representing our schools, Dr. Bruce Kinney and Rev. E. R. Brown of the Home Mission Society, and Dr. Geo. L. White and Dr. J. D. Springston of the Publication Society, insured us talent of unusual merit. Their addresses were of high order and their counsel of great value.

The Convention opened with Pastor's Conference, Pastor Francis W. Taylor presiding. The theme for the morning service was "The Bible," and R. Marion Garrett read a most excellent paper on "The Bible—Its Aim," followed by Pastor R. S. Beal on "The Bible—The Preacher's Book." Then Dr. Petty closed the session with an address on "A Call to Intercession." The afternoon session was in the discussion of "The Preacher and the Holy Spirit" in which Pastor Summers spoke of "The Holy Spirit in the Pastor's Daily Life," Pastor Morris on "The Holy Spirit in Sermon Preparation," Pastor Dunlap on "The Holy Spirit in Effective Preaching." Hal P. Fudge of Globe preached the annual sermon in the evening which was followed by an address by Dr. Petty on the subject, "What Jesus Thought of Himself." The officers elected for the new year were Cecil T. Garnett, president; E. R. Bencler, vice-president; R. Marion Garrett, secretary.

During the pastors' conference a telegram was received from Pastor J. D. Brown of Buckeye, bearing the information that his house had been destroyed by fire the morning before. An expression of brotherly love was manifest in an offering which was taken at the evening service which amounted to $83.39, which amount was forwarded to Brother Brown.

The woman's state missionary society met in the afternoon of Wednesday and after the business session, reports of various committees, an address was given by Miss Ethel L. Ryan on "The Work Among the Hopis," and by Mrs. Mary L. Bishop on "The Importance of the Missionary Budget in the Life of the Church and the Relation of the Woman's Society to It."

The sessions of the Convention proper were presided over by a layman, Col. L. W. Coggins of the Calvary Church, Phoenix. Colonel Coggins was campaign director for the New World Movement Fund and succeeded in leading Arizona as the first state to subscribe its full quota. Colonel Coggins presided with ease, fairness and dignity and as a reward of his excellent service was reelected for the next year.

The annual sermon was preached by Dr. Geo. M. Lehigh, Pastor of the First Church, Phoenix, who spoke on "Spiritual Development," using as his text Exodus 34:29, "Moses wist not that his face shone."

Dr. Bruce Kinney and President V. L. Duke of Redlands University, California, spoke during the denominational period, Dr. Kinney on "Baptist Ideals and Opportunities," and President Duke on "The Denominational Schools."

The paper of Professor J. C. South of the Bisbee schools on "The Relation of the Church to Law Enforcement and Law Enforcement" was so well written and contained so much of vital truth needed by our Christian people today, that it was ordered printed by the Convention.

The report of the Board of Managers showed that the past year was one of the most successful in the history of the Convention. More money had been raised and expended than in any other one year and the Convention had extended its influence in a larger way in many directions than ever before. The New World Movement has proven to be the greater blessing to Arizona of any previous movement in the denomination. The total receipts for the year for mission purposes was $26,314.95 as over against $9,665.76 last year.

At each evening session there was a stereopticon lecture with an address accompanying, as, "The Bible and Missions," "Mexico Breaking the Fetters," "Child Life of the World," and the moving pictures showing the work among the Mono Indians of California. Lee I. Thayer of the Hopi-Navajo Indian Missions spoke of the work among the Indians and the Rev. E. R. Brown of the work being done among the Mexicans. The people of Arizona are keenly alive to the problem presented by these two groups and as a result of these addresses and pictures a new impetus was given for more and better work in the future.

The Sunday services were full of inspiration. After Sunday School, Dr. Manyano brought the message for the morning, emphasizing the place of the United States in the world's evangelization. In the afternoon the B. Y. P. U. held its sessions. An interesting program was concluded by the young people, followed by an address by Sunday School Field Worker Gamble on "The Strategic Position of the B. Y. P. U. in the program of the Local Church." The Convention closed with an evangelistic sermon by Pastor R. S. Beal of Tucson.

WESTERN WASHINGTON

THE SWEDISH BAPTIST WOMEN'S MISSIONARY SOCIETY of Washington held its Annual Meeting with the Swedish Baptist Church at Preston, June 14 and 15. Mrs. E. Edwins of Preston is the president and presided during the sessions. Mrs. Olaf Carlson of Preston is secretary and Miss Earlanston of Seattle is corresponding secretary. About fifty delegates were present, eighteen of the twenty-one circle of the state being represented. The reports showed an excellent year's work. More money was raised during the past year than in any previous year. Many of the circles contribute toward the support of Miss Anna V. Johnson, head of the Girls Training School in the Philippine Islands. They are now raising a special fund to purchase an automobile for her to use in her work. Miss Johnson, who is now on furlough in this country, has been spending some time in Preston and was heard with great interest as she told of her work and illustrated her story with many beautiful stereopticon slides.

COLORADO

From Southern Colorado

Trinidad Baptist Church has outgrown its cozy little church building substantially constructed of stone some thirty year ago under the pastorate of the now venerable and much beloved Dr. B. F. Lawler, of Osceola, Mo., and has definitely decided to add a fine auditorium and a Sunday-school equipment to the present structure—this addition to occupy some vacant lots which adjoin the church lot and which were purchased very wisely many years ago in anticipation of the time which has now arrived. It is expected that at least the foundation and a large basement will be built and ready for use before snow flies. Recently Pastor Heydon preached a splendid sermon on "Making Bricks Without Straw," the point being that like the ancient Israelites the Trinidad Church is attempting to do Christian work without the necessary equipment and materials to meet the needs of a growing city—a handicap as bad as that of being compelled to make adobe brick without straw. There are many adobe structures in Trinidad and vicinity and so the audience could appreciate the comparison made, and the sermon bore immediate and satisfactory results.

Two more Baptist Churches have been organized in Las Animas County—the result of the efficient work of State Evangelist Davis. One of these churches is at Branson fifty miles east of Trinidad and the other is at "Hoopup" in the same part of the county. Both towns are new, but they are wide awake and ambitious and have a future. Our county now has three Baptist Churches in an area equal to that of Holland or Belgium.

The counties in Southern Colorado have many towns with beautiful names, mostly derived from the Spanish. Some of the counties are also beautifully named. Take Las Animas County in which Trinidad is located. It means the County of Souls—a recognition of the fact that the people have souls. Trinidad means the Trinity, and the Baptist church of Trinidad is located on "San Pedro St.," which means the Street of Saint Peter. It may be confidently asserted, however, that no statue of Saint Peter is to be found in the vestibule of that church for the worshippers to reverence by kissing the big toe on the right foot. Baptists do not believe in such nonsense and praise God that it is so.

KANSAS

REV. LEWIS JACOBSON of Manhattan has resigned to accept the call of the Sioux City, Ia., Church. He has been at Manhattan for something like six years and has had a very successful pastorate. He will be missed in the Kansas work.

REV. GUY H. WIMMER of N. Ottawa Church is leading his forces forward in some needed improvements on the church property. The work is moving forward under his leadership.

REV. WALTER E. TANNER, associational missionary, conducted special meetings with the Weir Church recently, resulting in nine additions to the church, seven of them by baptism. The church is now endeavoring to locate a pastor.

REV. N. PENNINGTON, student at Ottawa University, has been called to the pastorate of the Louisberg Church and has already entered upon the work.

REV. RALPH M. EDWARDS of LaHarpe has been called to the Pleasant View Church, located in the country to the southeast of Weir. The outlook for the work is hopeful.

ASSOCIATIONAL MISSIONARY C. J. Spiers of Great Bend has been conducting special meetings with the Nickerson Church lately, with a view to resuscitating the work there. The church has recently received a legacy of $800, and there is now a desire to go forward in the work there.

FIELD WORKER W. H. Leyburn, held special meetings at Buxton recently, resulting in five additions to the church, and arrangements have been made for regular preaching appointments.

BAPTISTS AND DISCIPLES of Oberlin have joined together in their work for the time, and have called Rev. Jesse E. Elder, formerly of Colorado. He is already on the field and is laying plans for an aggressive work.

OTTAWA UNIVERSITY closed a very successful commencement week June 10 with forty-four graduates in the various departments of the school. Rev. J. M. Powell of Kansas City delivered the address before the Academy and Dr. J. W. Bailey of Woman's College of Denver gave the commencement address.

PASTOR J. R. TODD of the Dry Creek Church, to the southwest of Salina, had the assistance of Rev. H. A. Hunt in special meetings lately. There were seven conversions, five of them uniting with the church.

REV. O. M. SHOWALTER, office executive secretary at Baptist headquarters, is now the regular supply of the Reading Church, to the northeast of Emporia.

REV. E. A. BLAKESLEY, recently pastor at Codell, has been called to the Woodston Church, and has entered upon the duties of the work there.

REV. M. R. HOLT, who has been giving attention to educational work during the past year, has been engaged as principal of the Appanoose rural high school in Franklin County for the next year. He will likely make his home in Ottawa.

PASTOR E. F. HALLOCK spent ten days recently in a ten days' outing with the Boy Scouts, in some quiet place near Pittsburg. They report a very fine time.

REV. FRED COCHRAN of Parsons found it necessary to go to the hospital recently for special treatment. He is now on a leave of absence for rest and change of climate. Rev. W. E. Tanner, associational missionary of Columbus, will be the supply in his absence.

ARRANGEMENTS are being completed for the transfer of Colporter E. W. Olson from Nebraska to Kansas. He will be jointly supported by the State Convention, the Home Mission Society and Publication Society. It is understood he will live near Ottawa, thus giving his children excellent school advantages.

ANNOUNCEMENTS ARE OUT calling attention to the Summer School and Assembly at Ottawa July 18th to 27th. The program is one of the finest ever offered to Kansas Baptists, and we anticipate a very largely attended and enthusiastic Assembly.

THE CHURCH VACATION SCHOOL in the First Church, Topeka, had something like one hundred enrolled on the second day. All the Baptist churches in Topeka are backing up this work. Miss Ruth Baird a graduate of the Training School, Kansas City, is in charge of this school.

REV. F. C. WARD of Belleville is conducting a church vacation school in his church at the present time. The school opened on the 13th of June. Miss Jessie Rich of the Training School in Kansas City is supervising the work. There were forty present the second day.

REV. W. A. FARRELL is closing his work at Neodesha. He has not announced his plans for the future.

REV. F. W. DAINLEY has resigned at Altamont, and plans to take up other work soon. He has done an outstanding work there.

THE CHURCH VACATION SCHOOL at Horton opened June 6 and had 200 children present the second day. Pastor Wm. Little is taking a prominent part in the work of the school. Miss Jessie Eades, a graduate of the Training School, Kansas City, is the supervisor.

THE CHURCH VACATION SCHOOL at Eldorado opened June 6, and had 125 present the second day. The pastor, Rev. M. O. Clemmons, is backing the work up heartily. Miss Wilson a teacher in the public schools there is supervisor of the school.

THE PLANS ARE ABOUT MATURED for the assembly at Ottawa. The date is July 18-27. Among the speakers will be Dr. J. T. Latta, a missionary on furlough from Burma; Dr. J. J. Ross, pastor Second Church, Chicago; Dr. T. S. Young, Philadelphia; Dr. Warren P. Behan, Philadelphia; Miss May Huston, New York; Miss Mabelle Rae McVeigh, a specialist with children, Denver; Dr. T. P. Stafford, Kansas City, and Dr. J. B. Smith, Wichita. We anticipate a fine attendance and a great assembly.

REV. MILO MOORE has resigned at Caldwell and will take up the work at Milton the first of July.

THE VILLAGE CHURCH at PIPER has been revived through the leadership of Rev. J. D. Chappelle of Rosedale. A new roof has been put on the house of worship, and plans are maturing for pastoral leadership.

UNDER THE LEADERSHIP of Pastor C. D. Eldridge of Coffeyville nearly fifty new members came into the church during the Easter season.

UNDER THE LEADERSHIP of H. R. Bolle, a student at Ottawa, fifteen have been recently baptized at the Tany church.

THE MANY FRIENDS of Rev. O. L. Weir of N. Topeka will sympathize with him in the recent death of his mother. The work on the N. Topeka field is moving forward nicely. Recently a splendid site for a new church building was purchased and some $15,000 is in hand for this worthy enterprise. The location is one of the finest in N. Topeka.

PASTOR I. W. BAILY of Ottawa had the privilege of baptizing some sixteen on his field at Bush City. He gives half time to this field and the other half time is devoted to the Kincaid field.

PASTOR F. F. BOCK of Stilwell had the assistance of Pastor J. E. Woods of Alta Vista in special meetings some weeks ago, resulting in more than sixty conversions, with forty-five presenting themselves for baptism. This gives new life to this village church.

REV. J. H. BRADBURY of Scotts Bluff, Neb., has been called to the pastorate of the Ellsworth church, and is already on the field at work.

A HOME COMING and Rally Day was observed by the Hebron Church in the Missouri River Association June 12. An invitation was extended to all former pastors. A splendid time of fellowship was experienced.

TO HIS MANY FRIENDS in Kansas it will be a source of genuine sorrow to learn of the death of Rev. J. N. Kidd in Los Angeles early in May. The funeral service was held May 13. He spent forty-one years in the ministry in Kansas, mostly in pioneer work. He was a good minister of Jesus Christ.

PASTOR J. M. ROBINSON of the Wellington Avenue Church, Wichita, had the assistance recently of Dr. Wilson Mills of Kansas City in special meetings. The interest was fine, and there were several additions to the church. Pastor Robinson has been on this field about one year, and in that time there have been 40 additions to the church.

REV. J. C. HAMPTON of Grant County, recently led in the organization of a new church near New Ulysses. He preaches for this new church, and also for the Harmony and Dermot churches to the Southwest of New Ulysses.

MICHIGAN

SCOTTEN AVE., DETROIT—Four young men will represent the Bible school at the Inter-church Training Camp conference for older boys, at Fish Lake, Mich., June 24, to 27. The B. Y. P. U. will conduct a daily vacation Bible school in July. Rev. W. A. Steinkraus will be the superintendent.

LANSING, FIRST—Pastor Clarence W. Kemper has been elected president of the Lansing ministers' association. North and Olivet churches have made fine progress during the past year. Practically fifty new members have been received, thirty-eight coming by baptism. With a view to having a pastor for each church they have recently pledged more than $30 each per week. First church is putting approximately $1000 into this work and the state convention recently appropriated $1200 for the coming year. Mr. Grey is now pastor of Olivet and we hope to locate a pastor for North very soon. Their Sunday schools have been running around 200 and 150 in attendance for North and Olivet respectively. That added to our own school of 400 makes a greater First church school attendance of 750. The Lansing Union has done a very fine work in fostering these two fields.

ST. JOSEPH VALLEY Association was held May 5 and 6 with the church at Union. There was an unusually large attendance and an unusually good spirit. The letters from the churches were of a much more encouraging nature than they have been for a few years. A larger number of baptisms was reported than for several years, and the benevolences were the largest of which there is any record. The annual sermon was preached by Rev.

H. A. Buell and strong addresses were delivered by Rev. Grant M. Hudson, Rev. G. W. Laurence, Rev. C. H. Barry, Rev. Frank B. Batchelor and Mrs. Hurd. One hundred delegates and visitors were present. Rev. F. M. White was chosen moderator, W. K. Lane clerk, George Tolbert treasurer and Rev. J. W. Priest chairman of the promotion committee.

Rev. Wm. Walker, who served the Green Ave. church, Detroit for ten years, and who has been active in the probation office of the recorder's and circuit court of Detroit for three years, desires again to take a pastorate. He may be addressed at 8044 Cabalan Ave., Detroit, Mich.

JACKSON ASSOCIATION—Delegates and visitors registered to the number of 177. Many more attended one or more sessions, especially in the evening, when the sessions were held in a neighboring M. E. church with more than double the seating capacity. Of the twenty-seven churches of the association, twenty-six were represented by delegates' letters, and twenty-four had delegates present. There were eighteen pastors and six ministers or speakers from outside present. The annual sermon was preached by Pastor W. B. Hartzog of Mason. J. F. Ingram took the place of his wife in the woman's session and gave a most interesting and lively address. His talk in the evening illustrated by slides of his own making was exceptionally good. State Director G. W. Lawrence was new to most of the people and won the favor of all.

REV. L. A. MEADE has just begun at Grand Ledge his third year as pastor. During his two years 171 members have united with the church, mostly baptism. The Sunday-school had an average attendance the first year of 150 and the last year of over 225, and a collection of over $12 per Sunday. Prayer meetings are seldom less than seventy-five and often over 100. Over $6,000 came in the past year for all purposes and over $2,900 has been given to home and foreign missions. Baptisms and conversions are the usual thing. This church is paying $1,000 more to the pastor than it did two years ago.

Michigan Baptist Women

The Executive Board of the Woman's Baptist Mission Society of Michigan closed the season with a meeting held at Woodward Avenue Baptist Church, Detroit, Tuesday morning, June 14. Mrs. Wilson, president, presided.

Mrs. Bowen, state secretary-director reported that sixty Michigan women attended the Jubilee at Chicago, also that ten girls attended W. W. G. Rally. Reports show extension work, also W. W. G. and Children's work were never so good.

Mrs. Conrad, young woman's secretary-director reports nearly 100 guilds in our state. Fifteen guilds are planning Fourth of July Christmas trees for our missionaries. Miss Janet E. Howell, children's secretary-director reports two new bands of Crusaders and one Herald Band organized. Wayne Association voted $10 for literature on children's work. Mrs. Johnson, their director, is doing splendid work.

The Woodward Avenue Church, Detroit, are greatly honored by having one of the members, Miss Florence Nightingale Crane, sail July 15 as a medical missionary to the Belgian-Congo. This young woman spent about two years in France with Harper Hospital Ambulance Corps and received a medal from Uncle Sam for bravery under fire. This splendid church has given her money and many other needful gifts including a victrola and fifty records. They are also packing a Christmas box for Mrs. Harper.

Mrs. W. H. Dorrance, Detroit, is chairman of the Christian Americanization work in our city. It is hoped to have more daily vacation Bible schools in Detroit this year than ever before.

A great deal of field work has been done by local women at Associations and churches. Miss Grant and Miss Huber attended the Detroit, Flint River and Shiawassee Associations.

It was voted to send a message of sympathy to Director Hudson and his family.

Meeting adjourned with prayer by Mrs. Surline.

JANET BURGESS,

Cor. Sec'y.

OHIO

THIRD STREET CHURCH, DAYTON celebrated its twenty-fifth anniversary during the week of June 5-12.

EASTERN PENNSYLVANIA

THE BRADFORD ASSOCIATION met June 1st and 2nd with the church at Fassett, Rev. W. F. Booth, pastor. Though limited in membership the church very hospitably entertained the Association, which was well attended. Rev. N. Johnstone, of Troy, was elected Moderator. The unified promotion program, suggested by the State Convention, was followed. R. M. Crawford, of Burma, made two addresses. Reports showed that gifts to missionary work increased over 100% during the past year. The Association adopted resolutions for the promotion of evangelism and set as a goal 150 accessions by baptism during the coming year. It also approved plans for promoting missionary education and Christian stewardship.

George Knowles Crozer

The sudden death of George Knowles Crozer, son of the founder of Crozer Theological Seminary, and president of its Board of Trustees, cast a shadow over the commencement exercises of the Seminary on June 7th.

Although nearly eighty-two years of age Mr. Crozer had presided at the annual meeting of the Trustees on the afternoon of June 6, and was looking forward to making the announcements for the Board at the Commencement exercises the next day. During the night his Master called him to his eternal Home.

The funeral services were held in the Upland Baptist Church on the afternoon of June 10th. The members of the Bible School, who had come to pay their tribute of respect to their loved superintendent, were seated together. The church was filled with those who had gathered to honor one who had held with faithfulness and efficiency many positions of trust and responsibility. The Governor of the state, a Justice of its Supreme Court, comrades of the Civil War, representatives of educational and benevolent institutions and people from every walk of life were present.

Mr. Crozer has been a leader in our denominational enterprises. He was president of the Publication Society, the State Mission Society, the Nugent Home for Retired Baptist Ministers, and the Baptist Home, as well as of the Trustees of the Seminary. Many representatives of these organizations were present and served as honorary pallbearers. Among the number were Dr. L. C. Barnes, Dr. Rolvis and the Faculty by President Milton G.

Evans and Professors Edward B. Pollard,
Eli S Reinhold, Frank G. Lewis, Spencer
B. Meeser and Isaac G. Matthews.

The services were in charge of Pastor
Bergen D. Stelle. President Evans paid a tribute to the character of Mr. Crozer as he had come to know it through the associations of thirty-four years; and the pastor spoke beautifully of the influence and service of the one whose life had meant so much to the Upland Church.
The interment was in the family plot in the cemetery adjoining the church.

WESTERN PENNSYLVANIA

ON JUNE 19 the Beulah Baptist Mission, two miles from West Elizabeth was dedicated with appropriate services. The sermon was preached by Rev. Eugene Neubauer. The building costing $6,000 is completely paid for and there is a surplus of $200 to provide a furnace and other equipment.

NEW JERSEY

CAMDEN, Rev. Frederick Blaser, pastor, has received during the two years of his pastorate 125, of whom ninety came by baptism. Current expenses have doubled and offerings for benevolences increased from $600 a year to $4700. To clear of debts, make improvements and buy a parsonage $15,000 have been raised. The salary is double that paid in former years.

MR. STANLEY MATTHEWS was ordained to the ministry by a council of thirty-three members at Evanston Church, Cincinnati, O., June 4.

A COUNCIL COMPOSED of ministers and other members from several states ordained Mr. Glenn L. McKinney to the ministry, June 16, at Fremont, Nebraska.

THE FIRST BAPTIST CHURCH, Sioux Falls, S. D., has just purchased a home for the pastor. For many years the church has debated whether to buy or to wait for "a convenient season" when it might be less of a burden. This addition to the beautiful house of worship of the First church makes it a very complete plant for service. The East Side mission, which the church has maintained for some years, is now ready to take an advance step and a pastor has been secured who will enter upon his work in this field the first of July. Rev. G. Elton Harris has been pastor of this splendid church for something over three years.
He has received 230 people into the church thus far. The church provides in its budget for the sending of its pastor to the Northern Baptist Convention. It gives more to benevolences than to its local work. Its full quota of $60,000 was subscribed for the New World Movement during the initial week of that campaign.

NEW YORK

C. E. McFADDEN and W. H. McKINNEY, students in Rochester Theological Seminary, were ordained at Mt. Olivet Church, Rochester, May 20. Mr. McFadden will take pastoral charge of a church in Terre

Haute. Ind. Mr. McKinney has two years in the seminary before completing his course.

HASCALL CHAPTER of "The Corinthians," a new theological club has been founded at Rochester. It is named in honor of Rev. Daniel Hascall who became pastor of the First Baptist Church of Hamilton, in 1812 and who in 1817 was one of seven men who met to consider the founding of an institution out of which has grown the present University. The chief aims of "The Corinthians" are to promote scholarship and to promote and maintain interest in theological studies. The charter members of the club are Dr. John F. Vichert, Dean of the Seminary, and students. A.
C. Brokaw is president; F. H. MacNair, vice-president; L. A. Wheaton, secretary;
H. M. Braker, treasurer; and J. B. Freestone and G. E. Earl, committees. A pro-college year which at the outset is hoped

CONNECTICUT

Stonington Union Association

The 149th Annual Meeting of the Stonington Union Association, was held with the Poquonock Bridge Church, Rev. O. G.
Buddington, pastor, June 15-16. The attendance exceeded that of the past few years and on the first day taxed the seating capacity of the church to the limit.
Rev. H. M. Thompson, under the new constitution was selected as moderator last year, and Rev. J. G. Osborne was elected as clerk.

Some of the outstanding features of the sessions were the introductory and doctrinal sermons preached respectively by Rev. G. R. Atha and Rev. W. B. Oakley.
The Women's Home and Foreign Mission societies were presided over respectively by Mrs. Louis P. Allyn and Mrs. Arthur Brown. Miss Rice of Los Angeles and Miss Kate French of India delivered addresses of deep interest to lovers of the home and foreign mission work.

The report of the associational missionary, Rev. F. S. Robbins, was of special interest because of the more than ordinary visible successes during the year.
The report of the committee on the state of religion was presented by Rev. C. A.
Merrill, and contained interesting features gathered from a survey of the field.
Rev. A. D. Carpenter from Willimantic, in the necessary absence of the state officials, delivered a stimulating address in the interests of the state work. Rev.
Chester H. Howe of New London, in an impressive address Wednesday evening spoke on the topic, "Shall the People Rule in Religion?"

The moderator closed the session with a most helpful address in its spirit of devotion. Other speakers were Rev. Myron D. Fuller, Rev. James Higgins, Rev.
C. S. Nightingale, and of lay brethren, Deacons Elias F. Wilcox, W. A. Fraser and A. V. Morgan.

The letters from the churches showed an increase by baptism over losses, reversing the order of several years past.
The largest accession by baptism from any one church was that of the entertaining church, being twenty-six.

MASSACHUSETTS

FIRST CHURCH OF WEXMOUTH, under the leadership of Rev. Charles Wesley Allen, has been richly blessed and its membership of 184 is a high-water mark for its history. Mission contributions have nearly tripled last year's, or twenty-five percent of the combined offerings of the past twenty years.

President Coleman Now

George W. Coleman, A. M., the great Forum Man of Boston and everywhere, in order the better practically to "carry on" the principles which underlie his Forum idea, has associated himself with Hon. Roger W. Babson, the famous statistician, taking the Presidency of the "Babson Institute" at Wellesley Hills, Mass. It is Babson's New School for the business training of men in industry.

Mr. Coleman will not relinquish his leadership in the Fort Hall Forum, nor his interest in Forums; he will still lead the one, and make himself felt in the others. Also he will conduct the Summer School of Forum Methods at Chautauqua, and the Open Forum Bureau in the Little Building, in Boston. Some Baptists will wonder whether the Ford Hall Forum has run its race, having nobly performed its mission, and whether Mr. Coleman's new position will not afford him welcome opportunity to incorporate his idea into a scheme of training that will demonstrate it.

Old Boys on the Common

Boston is just now deep in the Centennial Celebration of her famous English High School. Thousands of the "old boys" are back, and they are taking possession of the Common in their speech-making, and of the straightest of the famous "crooked streets" for their parading. It is a welcome infusion into the general school and college patriotism that the month of June brings to us.

Commencement Festivities at Colgate

Rochester; Doctor of Divinity upon Rev. Clark T. Brownell of Brattleboro, Vt., and upon Rev. Alfred Wesley Wishart of Grand Rapids, Mich.; Doctor of Sacred Theology upon Rev. William Mangam Lawrence, D.D. In presenting Dr. Lawrence Dean Crawshaw said: "The especial occasion for this honor is his completion of fifty years of noble service since the time of his ordination to the Christian ministry. He is a graduate of the College and of the Theological Seminary. He was for seven years President of the Board of Trustees of the University. He has contributed to its life through his work as a theological professor. He has also been associated as a trustee and a lecturer with other theological schools.

Mr. George W. Cobb, President of the Colgate Alumni Corporation presided at the Alumni Dinner in the "Gym." He announced that Acting-President Read had been elected on Monday the President pro tem of the University, and called upon him to speak. In mentioning the gifts of the past year to the University President Read said that the greatest gift of all had been made by Thomas E. Boswell, '00, a teacher on a small salary, who, knowing that death was near, made out a will bequeathing to his Alma Mater two-thirds of his little estate of three thousand dollars. Mr. Cobb, referring to Prof. E. P. Sisson as "one of our oldest and best loved alumni who had been teaching forty-eight years, called upon the veteran teacher for a few words. The dinner was followed by a pleasant Reception in the home of President Read, which was the former home of Dr. W. N. Clarke.

No account of this Commencement would be complete without an expression of keen regret that we must part with the Rev. David Foster Estes, D.D., for twenty-nine years Professor of New Testament Interpretation in the Theological Seminary and for the last twenty-three years also the University Librarian. The writer, who, after being a student in Dr. Estes' classroom for three years, has been his colleague for the last twenty-one years, deems it no exaggeration to say that for the true scholarly spirit, for enthusiasm in the cause of learning, for careful thinking and exact expression in the difficult field of New Testament study, Dr. Estes is fully the equal of any Biblical scholar in the United States. Through his patient and unrelenting toil in preparing men for the Baptist ministry at home and abroad he has not only performed an incalculable service for his students, but he has also put the whole Baptist denomination in his debt. We wish Dr. and Mrs. Estes Godspeed as they leave Hamilton to make their home in Los Angeles.

J. B. A.

The address before the Phi Beta Kappa Society was delivered in the chapel before a very large assembly by Prof. William Lyon Phelps of Yale University. The theme of the address was "Culture and Happiness."

The largest Class that ever went forth from Colgate was graduated on Tuesday morning. Two of those receiving the Master of Arts degree in course, but in absentia, are Colgate men who are missionaries in Burma; namely, Rev. Stanley E. Baldwin, A.B., of Mandalay, and Rev. James H. Telford, A.B., of Kengtung. The chief guest of honor was his Excellency, Honorable Nathan L. Miller, Governor of the State of New York, who received the degree of Doctor of Laws. The commencement address was delivered by Mr. William A. Prendergast, Chairman of the Public Service Commission of the State of New York.

In addition to the honorary degrees already mentioned the following were conferred: Doctor of Science upon Dr. Oswald T. Avery of the Rockefeller Institute for Medical Research, and upon Prof. Henry E. Lawrence of the University of

A university is something more than a school or group of schools. It is a complex of traditions and influences; of sentiments inherited from the past and aspirations reaching out into the future. The lessons learned in its class-rooms or laboratories constitute but a small part of the education which it offers. The students are taught and inspired by the example of those who have gone before them and by the interests and ambitions of those that are about them. They breathe the spirit of the place. They become imbued with ideals in some respects different from those of the outer world, and by their devotion to these ideals they strengthen their influence on the life of the next generation.

—The Outlook

On Sunday morning, June the 19th, a large congregation gathered in the spacious and beautiful university chapel for the opening service of the One Hundred and Second Anniversary of Colgate University. The solemn strains of the great organ, the outpouring of praise in the Te Deum, the upward surge of the soul in the majestic hymn,

"O God, our help in ages past,

Our hope for years to come,"

the reading of the Word of God, and the prayer—all made an impressive and worshipful beginning of the anniversary of a great school founded in prayer and dedicated "Deo ac Veritati." The address of the hour was delivered by Acting-President Melbourne Stuart Read upon the theme, "The World of Today and Man's Place In It."

The Annual Sermon before the Theological Seminary and the Baptist Education Society of the State of New York was preached to a crowded congregation in the Baptist church on Sunday evening by the Rev. Bernard C. Clausen.

The College Class Day exercises were held on Monday morning in the University chapel. Later in the morning the Seminary Day exercises were held in the chapel of Eaton Hall, Dean Vichert presiding. There have been fifty-five students in the Seminary this year, of whom fourteen are now just graduated. The graduating class was represented on the program by Mr. Paul F. Swarthout and Mr. A. L. Aulick. The former spoke on "Colgate and the Years," declaring the Colgate spirit to be (1) fellowship as over against isolation and eccentricity, (2) humility as contrasted with conceit, "the greatest are the humblest," and (3) industry instead of indolence, "the team that does its best is always the victor irrespective of the score." Mr. Aulick then spoke on "The Task Ahead." He analyzed the task as (1) The evangelizing of the whole world, (2) The Christianizing of international relations, "The nations cannot be brought together around the cannon's mouth. The task is to rally the nations around the Christ of God," (3) Teaching Christian men to consecrate their wealth. Dr. W. M. Lawrence in giving the address to the Class unfolded the meaning of the ministry as he found it contained in John 17:3. You cannot answer the needs of a dying world unless you have an intimate, reverent knowledge of the living Christ present in the world today.

A number of class reunions were held at noon, always one of the gladdest experiences of the Commencement season. Perhaps two of the happiest men on the campus were C. R. Nasmith, '04, U. S. Consul at Ghent, and L. V. Collings, '16, who had just returned from China for the fifth reunion of his Class.

OUR MUSIC CORNER

CONDUCTED BY

WILLIAM LESTER

From a recent issue of the Musical Times of London, we clip the attached article dealing with the matter of sets of bells to be installed in church towers, in many cases as memorials to martyrs of the war. It may prove of interest to committees in our own land as a suggestion for like application. The article was headed "Bells, Chimes, and Carillons," and appeared under the signature of William Wooding Starmer, an authority upon the subject.

"Bell founders have been very busy during the past year making new bells and recasting and re-hanging existing ones, particularly as war memorials. Probably there is nothing more suitable or more lasting for such a purpose.

"Bell metal through all ages has retained its value with little fluctuation as to its comparative cost, save during the recent war when conditions as to the metal markets were abnormal. It is one of the most durable alloys known—consisting of copper and in the proportion of thirteen to four—and loses practically nothing by oxidation during a period of over five hundred years. A bell is always worth about two-thirds of its original cost, merely as a metal value.

"In England, until quite recent years, bell music has been confined to change-ringing and automatic chimes. There is much to be said for change-ringing and its healthy exercise, although from a strictly musical point of view its claims are small. The enthusiastic change-ringer requires his bell to "go" well, and is fascinated with the mathematical problems of the changes he delights to take part in ringing. He is not much concerned with the tone or accuracy of tune of his bell. If he were, a great many of our old rings would have been re-cast and accurately tuned long ago.

"Chime tunes played automatically by clock mechanism are devoid of rhythm and accent, which must ever be supplied by the listener's imagination. There is a dearth of suitable tunes for chimes on account of the limitations of the bells on which they are played. In most cases the available bells number six, eight, ten, or twelve diatonic, on which very little melodic modulation is possible. Sometimes extra bells are available, which makes modulation to the dominant and sub-dominant possible, but the chime mechanism itself is responsible for many difficulties which have to be considered. Any excessive demands that may be made, such as a quick succession of notes, which generally produces an effect modestly describable as grotesque—usually interfere with the accuracy of the tone. The reasons for this are obvious when the difficulties to be overcome are taken into account: the bells are very often in awkward positions, some being near and some far away from the chiming machine; the hammers vary in weight; the connections between the barrel, and the hammers vary in length, etc.—all serious conditions to be dealt with when notes must be played accurately to the fractional part of a second.

"In England, however, the musical possibilities of bells are now better understood than ever before, thanks to the great advance made in the design of the bell and the successful solving of the intricate problem of accurate tuning, accomplished during the past twenty-five years.

"This country now produces the best bells in the world, and not only this but better bells than have ever before been made, not excepting the great masters such as Henry and Dury.

"The four most recent carillons erected in Europe—Appingedam (1910), Eindhoven and Flushing (1914), and Rotterdam City Hall (1920)—have been made at the famous Taylor Bell Foundry at Loughborough. The Rotterdam carillon consists of forty-nine bells weighing over twenty-seven tons, and is the most important instrument of its kind in Europe constructed during the past hundred years.

"In the United Kingdom the same firm installed the magnificent carillon at Queenstown Cathedral (1919)—forty-two bells, weighing eighteen tons, and are now constructing for Armagh Cathedral one of thirty-nine bells, weighing eleven tons.

"As war memorials, carillons with clavier are to be erected at Spalding (thirty-five bells) and Loughborough (campanile and forty-seven bells)."

NEW MUSIC

From The Boston Music Co., Boston, Mass.

American Organ Monthly for May:

Bless the Lord, O My Soul..... Faure

Every active organist should arrange to have the Organ Monthly in his hands as it is issued. It is a perfect gold mine of good organ music, well-chosen both for technical value and for practical use. The present issue is even above the average, in the quality of the selections and in the number enclosed. Round within the one cover are four original compositions and one effective transcription:—"Endymion," by Reiff; "In Olden Times," by Diggle; "Legende," by Zimmerman; "Homage," by MacDougal and "Eastern Romance," by Rimsky-Korsakoff, arranged by Gordon Balch Nevin. All are excellent examples of the organ music of today, effective in recital, and usable for service purposes, not prohibitive as to technical requirements, but not the spineless pap that is the last refuge of the inadequate organist. A very instructive and illuminating article on "Modern French Organ Music," from the pen of Henry S. Fry, is also included, as well as the usual program notes and biographical detail. Congratulations to the editor of this magazine, Edward Shippen Barnes.

The sacred solo named above is simple in outline, model in coloring, but with that deceptive sort of simplicity which marks a fine piece of work chiseled down to the elements that are absolutely foundation material. It is not the poverty of vision that marks so much of the young composer's work (and to which ill-ease the prevalent surplusage of notes is a reaction); it is that fine Grecian certainty of control that allows a precise use of the materials at hand, that allows the composer to delineate by just a simple line what at the hands of a less-routined man would degenerate into a mere welter of notes.

PRACTICAL COMPOSITION

THERE are many text-books published which are supposed to tell all there is to be told about composition. But, unfortunately, these estimable works cannot say much about practicality, because this comes only from experience, which word, by the way, is a synonym for practicality in the music editor's vocabulary. We honestly believe that the best trait the inexperienced composer can develop is restraint. Most of the rejected manuscripts—the ones passably proper musically—have too many notes rather than not enough. That is, they are full of exaggeration and distortion—their good points are swamped by a confusion of impractical deviations from the main idea, and complex figurations, which, though thought original by each writer, are really musical "bunk" of the commonest type. When restraint captures a composer he is apt to think about every note before he writes it and when he does he is a hopeful case. The very first step toward practical composition is that of learning to estimate the accurate worth of an idea. Once this art is acquired, publishable music is likely to result.

Commencement at McMinnville College

By WILLIAM R. FRERICHS

McMinnville College closed its sixty-third year with the graduation exercises on the evening of June 5. Leading up to this festivity were the various events of commencement week, including musical recitals, oratorical and declamatory contests, senior class-day exercises, granting of awards and prizes, etc.

For many years it has been the custom to include in the commencement program a farewell prayer meeting at the Baptist church on the regular night for the mid-week service. This occasion is looked forward to with interest by the membership of the church, and as always proved this year one of the most helpful church services of the year. To the visitors, who are in McMinnville at this time, such a meeting is an inspiration and at the same time a splendid demonstration of the spiritual atmosphere which surrounds the students of the college throughout the year.

The class of 1921 of the collegiate department numbers this year twenty-four; it is the second largest class graduating from the institution. It is pleasing to note that nearly every member of this class leaves with a definite decision in regard to his or her life work. More gratifying even than this is the fact that four of the young men are immediately beginning their preparation for the active work of the Christian ministry, while four other members are looking forward to service on the foreign field. It is fitting to mention that a young man from the present faculty, one of our recent graduates, joins the latter group at this time, and that another graduate of only a few years ago is about to leave with his bride for Africa. The faculty and friends of the college are justly proud of the product thus sent out into the world, feeling that these young people will fill their places in a manner that will reflect credit upon their alma mater and upon the educational enterprise of the denomination.

Seventeen boys and girls completed their work in the preparatory department and were granted diplomas. Most of them the college next fall.

The degree of Doctor of Divinity was conferred upon the Reverend W. E. Henry, pastor of the First Baptist church of Everett, Washington. His effective work in the pastorate as preacher, teacher and organizer, his scholarly attainments and habits, his wise counsel and ready service in the larger field of the denomination and kingdom all make him eminently worthy of the distinction given him by the college.

Doctor Henry was the speaker at the graduating exercises of the preparatory department. His deep sympathy with the ambitions and visions of young people was throughout reflected in his address, and his words made a lasting impression upon his hearers. The address before the Christian associations was delivered by Doctor W. T. Milliken, pastor of the Baptist church of Salem, Oregon, and a new member of the board of trustees of the college. The large congregation at the church greatly enjoyed the intensely inspirational tone of his message. The baccalaureate sermon was delivered by Rev. Ambrose M. Bailey, D. D., pastor of the First Baptist Church of Seattle, Washington, and also a newly elected member of the board. It was his first visit to McMinnville, but he soon won the attention and admiration of the audience as in masterful language he outlined the present tendencies and problems in the educational world, and as in unmistakable terms he expressed his conviction in regard to the value of the Christian college. Many favorable comments were made upon the speeches by members of the graduating class. All bore striking testimony to the uplifting influences of the college and its spirit upon the students; though the subjects of the orations differed widely, yet the pervading note of all was a firm conviction that the noblest aim of life is that of service in the world. And this is the principle dominant in the class of 1921 as a whole.

Among the announcements made during the closing exercises several are of special interest. One is that for the coming year an athletic coach has been engaged. Another, that the office of "dean of men" has been created and that Professor L. S. Shumaker has been elected to this position. Also, that the construction of a new gymnasium will be begun at once and that it will be ready for use in the fall. Perhaps the most important announcement was that the General Education Board has just granted McMinnville College the sum of 200,000 dollars to be paid as soon as 400,000 dollars are raised by the college, and that 7,000 dollars will be paid to the college for each of two years to meet the increases in the salaries of the professors.

There was thus at the sixty-third anniversary of the college every indication of success and progress, and the administration and friends of the institution have reason to look forward with hopefulness to rapid development and increased service in the future.

McMinnville, Oregon.

Calls for Annual Meetings

Special From California

OF THE ONE HUNDRED and thirty-seven Baptist churches in Northern California, twenty-two have pledged their full allotment to the New World Movement, while in all the churches that have participated in the Movement the gifts have greatly increased. The ratio of increase is from $1.00 per year per minister to $14.95. That the churches have been quickened spiritually is shown by the results of the Evangelistic Campaign which was conducted the first three months of this year. 990 conversions having been reported, 196 backsliders reclaimed, 213 received by letter, 171 by experience and 708 by baptism, and total additions and restorations 1,288.

CHAPEL CAR "GRACE" has paid a visit to Waterford. The labors of Rev. and Mrs. E. R. Hermiston have been greatly blessed. Nineteen have been baptized and three received by letter. The church has called Rev. W. T. Riggs as Pastor.

South Pacific Jubilee

The South Pacific Golden Jubilee Meeting was held in the First Baptist Church, Oakland, June 7, 8, 9, with 275 delegates in attendance, representing Arizona, Nevada, Colorado and California. Mrs. W. A. Montgomery was the principal speaker. Visitors were present from New York, Ohio, Minnesota, Missouri and Kansas. Messages were brought by native women from the Orient, representing our work in Burma, Bengal, Orissa, China, Czechoslovakia and Poland.

The officers elected for the ensuing year are Mrs. Edith M. Wells, San Diego, Calif. President; Mrs. J. M. Brough, 1st Vice-president, Mrs. A. W. Rider, 2nd Vice-president, Mrs. W. H. Ballard, Recording Secretary; Mrs. W. G. Shoemaker, Treasurer.

Preceding the district meeting, a house party was given at the Berkeley Divinity School for the World Wide Guild. Mrs. A. R. Heron and Mrs. C. E. Tingley were the hostesses and Mrs. Montgomery the guest of honor. For the three days period 240 W. W. G. girls were present.

Washington B. Y. P. U.'s Visit to Baltimore

One of the greatest meetings of the Baptist young people ever held in Baltimore was the joint meeting of Washington Federation of B. Y. P. U. and the Maryland B. Y. P. U. at the Eutaw Place Baptist Church.

The Washington brethren came one hundred and fifty-four strong, and "beautiful"; the latter word is applied to the ladies only. The Eutaw Place Baptist Church rose to the occasion, and entertained them all without hesitation.

Delightful music was furnished during the supper by talent from the Peabody. Toasts were offered, and songs sung.

The meeting upstairs was a most enthusiastic and harmonious occasion. Special speakers from the Washington Union presented in a delightful way, "Why we study the Bible." Dr. H. A. Tupper of the First Church gave an inspiring address on the same subject. Our own John F. Aspey, Jr., presided in graceful fashion, and won the hearts of all the Washington "lassies" by his good appearance and courteous manners.

Hugh Bagby and John Decker of Riverside led the singing, and such singing by young people is rarely heard. Washington took the prize, Dr. Woolsey and Mr. A. W. Mattox being the judges.

Between four and five hundred young people were present, and it showed quite clearly the prospects for the future success of the denominational work of Maryland, and District of Columbia.

Resolutions were adopted pledging our loyalty to our good Baptist, President Harding, and Secretary of State Hughes. Baptist principles were the foundation of our constitution, and the Baptists will, in all probability write a constitution of the United States of the world.

Religion and Science

A Study in Divine Law
By AMANDA M. HICKS

The main idea of this essay is that the truth of religion is not contrary to the facts of science; the God of nature and the God of our hearts are the same. Religion is something more than a survival of the primitive mind. A study well adapted to help minds burdened with agnosticism or distrust of Christian truth. Of especial value to college students.

Our B. Y. P. U.

Manual for Baptist Young People on Organization, Programs, and Methods

By JAMES ASA WHITE, Th. D.

General Secretary of the Baptist Young People's Union of America

This book is written particularly for those who are using the B. Y. P. U. form of organization in Baptist churches, though it may well serve any other Young People's Society.

The author has had an extended experience in B. Y. P. U. work. He seeks, in this manual, to answer briefly and practically the questions that have been raised in the many conferences he has conducted. He is especially desirous to give "first aid" to new groups of young people who for the first time face the privileges and problems of organization.

The Romance of American Life and Progress

By ROBERT L. WEBB

Secretary, Newton Theological Institution

The author's purpose is not to write the story in detail, but to suggest some of the great steps in the romance of America's growth, and to call attention to some of the natural and providential forces that have contributed to the unfolding miracle of three centuries of beginnings and experimentation. A suggestive, stimulating little book, with a field of usefulness in Christian Americanization.

Published Every Week by the Northern Baptist Convention

IN SESSION AT DES MOINES

REGISTRATION at the meeting of the Northern Baptist Convention at Des Moines totalled 2189. Of these, 1184 were ministers, 676 were women, 302 were laymen and twenty-seven were visitors. Six states sent more than 100 delegates, namely, Iowa with 356, Illinois with 236, New York with 168, Nebraska with 143, Kansas with 140, Minnesota with 134 and Pennsylvania with 128. The weather was hot and the assembly was generally coatless, as the picture shows.

Fresh from the Field

Dr. E. M. Poteat is planning to sail, with his wife and daughter, for China the latter part of August and will spend a year there in traveling and in teaching the New Testament. Two of Dr. Poteat's sons are engaged in missionary work in China.

Rev. Joseph L. Peacock, president of Shaw University, Raleigh, N. C. was honored this year with the degree of doctor of divinity conferred by Colby College at its commencement on June 22. Mr. Peacock attended the sessions of the Northern Baptist Convention at Des Moines and is now at his summer home at East Northfield, Mass.

Rev. Addison B. Lorimer of Portland, Me., received the degree of doctor of divinity from Colby College on June 22.

Rev. Frank W. Padelford, secretary of the Board of Education, is one of the commission which will sail in August for China to make a study of the whole subject of Christian education in that great country.

The annual leper mission day will be observed on the Winona grounds on Monday, August 15. At 2:30 there will be a song service conducted by Professor Homer Rodeheaver. Dr. Howard Agnew Johnston of Chicago will preside. At 3 o'clock there will be a special address by Dr. W. E. Biederwolf, who recently returned from a world tour. He has had close observation of the leper work in the Orient. There will also be talks by other missionaries, including William M. Danner, American secretary of the Mission to Lepers.

More copies of the Bible are sold every year than of any other book. In addition, the American Bible Society gives away nearly 200 Bibles and Testaments every working day in this country alone, while in foreign lands the numbers are very much greater. Colporters going from house to house find very poor people in all parts of the country who cannot afford to buy even a gospel printed separately. None are denied who really want the Book.

Lanier University honored Rev. Theodore M. Hofmeister, minister of the First Church, Greenfield, Ohio, at the June convocation in conferring on him the degree of doctor of laws.

Rev. R. M. Vaughan of Newton Theological Seminary left Des Moines on June 28 for Cuba where he is to lecture during the first ten days of July at the Summer Institute of Evangelical Workers which meets at Sancti Spiritus. This is his second visit, the first having been made a year ago.

Rev. M. J. Twomey of New Jersey received the degree of doctor of divinity from Brown University at its commencement this year.

Visiting editors at Des Moines greatly appreciated the courtesy of the Baptist Record of that state in providing for them a room in which were to be found writing paper, desks, typewriter and all the other things needful in order that men might comfortably prepare materials for their respective papers. THE BAPTIST joins with others in expressing appreciation of this graceful and brotherly deed.

Rev. W. W. Bustard of Cleveland returned this year to the commencement exercises at his alma mater, Brown University, and was honored with the degree of doctor of divinity. This, we believe, makes him twice a doctor.

Baptist Patriarch of Europe Sends Greetings

Dr. John Clifford is the last of the great triad of British Baptist preachers of a former generation of which the other two were Spurgeon and MacLaren; and he is at present president of the Baptist World Alliance. He sent this greeting:

Dear Brethren:

Your friend and mine, Dr. Franklin, has asked me to send you a few words on the occasion of your meeting to consider the claims of Europe upon the whole Baptist world.

It is not necessary for me to say much. You have the special advantage of hearing my dear friend Dr. Rushbrooke, our Commissioner for Europe, who is fresh from great and most successful service for the Kingdom of God. He will bring you face to face with the most recent facts, and in the presence of reality you will find inspiration as well as instruction. In addition you will also have the testimony of a personal and effective witness in the Rev. Charles Brooks.

But I may recall the obvious fact that this work of emancipating myriads of our fellows in Europe from the falsehoods and perils of a corrupt and magical religion, and introducing them to the freedom and joy of discipleship to the Lord Jesus, is especially given us by God. As Paul said to the Ephesians (II. 10, according to Dr. Moffatt), "God has made us what we are, creating us in Christ Jesus for the good deeds which are prepared beforehand by God as our sphere of action."

He has not only marked out our task, but He has trained and fitted us for it. All our past experience leads up to this supreme and sublime adventure. The heritage of truth which as Baptists has been handed on to us by our ancestors; the ideas and ideals, the discipline, the political and religious liberty which has been won for us; our mastery (no doubt partial, but still of value) of the difficult work of self-management of small social groups; the evangelizing passion we have cultivated; and the co-operative endeavors we have recently made at the gathering of the representatives of the World Alliance in London last year; all this makes it clear that it is the purpose and plan of God that we should dedicate our concentrated energies as Baptists all over the world to the redemption and religious reconstruction of Europe.

Moreover this is undeniably the time for action. The hour has struck. God's summons is ringing in the air. He calls us saying, "Go ye therefore and make disciples." He has given us the truths Europe is calling for. The people are eager for liberty and self-government. We teach the incalculable value of the individual soul. Like our fathers we insist on the rights of the common man, on his right to all the great freedoms, freedom of conscience, freedom of thought, freedom of soul, freedom of speech, and freedom of political development. Christ died for each one. If one go astray the shepherd goes after it till he finds it. It is a basic idea with us that the Church is democratic. Jesus Himself is the one and only Master, all the members are brothers; and out of their personal experience of the redemption that is in Christ Jesus, are qualified to witness to His Gospel and preach it. Besides that we have stood for a just and righteous economic and social order, and that is what Europe demands.

Best of all we can tell the sin-burdened soul to believe on the Lamb of God who taketh away the sin of the world. We have the good news that Christ saves from sin, saves from selfishness, and inspires to heroic adventures to save others.

Thus our history, our possessions and our experience call upon us to carry out the great work to which we have been led.

Dear Brethren of the Northern Convention, we in Britain rejoice with joy unspeakable in the ardor, the generosity and zeal with which you are giving yourselves to this work. God Himself is leading. God is working in us to do His will, and He confers upon us the glorious privilege of sharing with Him in this effort to make His Kingdom universal.

With earnest prayers that God will bless your gatherings,

I am yours in the bonds of the Gospel,
John Clifford.

Short Talks on Investments

BY LEE B. DOTY

Industrial Management

THE recently published annual report of a prominent manufacturing concern illustrates how dependent investors are upon alert and careful management. This company has a considerable number of preferred stockholders and a substantial amount of serial notes in the hands of the public. Manufacturing staple necessities and with a long record of successful operation, its securities would appear to have had most of the elements which justify investment.

The report, however, states that for several years no reduction or reserves had been made to provide for obsolescence and that meanwhile considerable quantities of obsolete goods had accumulated. After making necessary reductions for this valueless merchandise, the year's operation showed a considerable loss which, coming on top of the problems incident to these days of readjustment, has placed the company in an embarrassing position.

"Hindsight" indicates that here was a case where the condition had arisen almost unawares. The merchant's problem is always to keep his goods moving, and courageous prudence often requires that slow-moving goods be sold at a loss. Either through inattention to the fact that certain lines were not selling or through unwillingness to dispose of them when it could be done with but little sacrifice, the management of this company is now confronted with a loss which has grown to unwarranted proportions. The pity is that they fooled themselves as to their inventory values.

A Baptist Characteristic

Dr. J. H. Rushbrooke, of England, in introducing Rev. John A. Frey, of Latvia, to the Des Moines Convention, turned aside long enough to assure the convention that the sin of English Baptists did not consist in seeking Episcopal orders. One of the great marks of all Baptists, European included, seems to be the refusal to take orders from anybody.

Killam's Kollum

We Conferred the Degree

"Dr." E. R. Brown, of California, wants to know where THE BAPTIST got the "Dr." which we pinned to his name a few weeks ago. Be it hereby known to all that in this instance THE BAPTIST conferred it.

A Case of Dollars Without Sense

"Killam, honestly, I wish you would not print that 'Kollum.' It cheapens the paper." With these words a man who was for several years our spiritual adviser greeted us in Des Moines. He is right. For years we filled a similar space with wonderful material which so far as we could learn nobody ever read, even to criticize. After careful consideration, with a reputation for spotless dignity at stake, we made up our mind to tell the truth as we should see it in a language which, with suitable helps, could be understood. It has helped to cheapen the paper—to the denomination. The bank balance of THE BAPTIST is the most satisfactory it has ever been.

Is It An Alternative?

THE BAPTIST has printed in its short history an account of the resignations of a large number of most worthy pastors. It is a matter of surprise to find how many of the reports state "health" as the cause of closing a most prosperous work. In no instance as far as we can recall, has any particular malady been named. All of which leads us to ask: Do we understand that these good men were sick when they resigned or simply afraid that they would be sick if they stayed much longer? A well-known minister, who has served the denomination many years, tells us that he always felt sick near the end of the second year of each pastorate. If he stayed he fully recovered. He says that the disease is chills and fever—mostly chills. He says that the man who changes climate too often is sure to become a confirmed invalid. Let us hear the conclusion of the matter. When you are sick and find it necessary to resign would it not be well to attach a diagnosis of the case by a competent physician? Tell the world that the doctor says that you are a victim of small pox, sleeping sickness or a broken heart.

Denominational T. N. T.

Didn't know we had such high explosives? Away behind the times my friend. You should read THE BAPTIST with both eyes open. We constantly remind our readers of the dangers which threaten extremists of whatever type. T. N. T. stands for The New Theology (whatever that is). If all reports are true it should be handled only by the experienced and then at the peril of their lives.

As Bruce Kinney Saw It

Below are my impressions asked for by Mr. Cleaves.

1. As never before rifts which appear to have been healed are deep. The cleavage sinks into the very vitals of our denominational life. Nothing was settled.

2. Many votes were not so unanimous as they seemed.

3. Regrettable things were done by extremists on both sides.

4. Some who have been regarded as leaders and denominational statesmen are now considered mere ward politicians.

5. The influence of the secret caucus and whispered word was never so patent nor so potent in any previous Convention. Some who most loudly denounced their opponents for this crime were most guilty of it themselves.

6. There is a growing conviction that some of the Boards are concealing or camouflaging information that the constituency has a right to have. Different stories about the same fact were told by different people equal in authority. No one knew what to believe.

I have said it because having said similar things to the editor he asked me to write and I could not consistently write something different from what I had already said. We need to give ourselves much to prayer.

Bruce Kinney.

Corrects an Error

I am requesting that you be good enough to give room in your columns to the following statement:

At the recent meeting of the Northern Baptist Convention in Des Moines a delegate is said to have declared, in a speech on the floor of the Convention, that the Divinity School of the University of Chicago had made a base betrayal of the use of its trust funds—or words to that effect. I was not present at the session in question, and have tried in vain to get from the speaker a written statement of what he said. I must depend, therefore, on the evidence of those who heard. I am also told that the charge is based on the theological views of one or more members of the Divinity Faculty.

As the statement had rather wide publicity, and as it reflects on the integrity of the Trustees and of the administration of the University, I must ask permission to place before your readers a few facts as to the trust funds concerned.

The cash expenditures on account of the Divinity School for the year 1920-21, ending June 30, were $97,399. Of this amount $16,372 came from the income of funds belonging to the Chicago Baptist Theological Union, $5,390 from the income of a fund given to the University in 1890 for the use of the Divinity School, and the remainder, $75,637, from the general funds of the University.

With regard to the last two sums, aggregating $81,027, it must be pointed out that the charter of the University prohibits any theological test for election to any professorship.

With regard to the other sum of $16,372, belonging to the Theological Union above mentioned, it is the income of unconditional gifts made to the Union by a considerable number of persons, and the charter of the Union establishes no theological tests for professorships in the Divinity School.

The assertion, therefore, that there has been a betrayal of trust funds by the University in the conduct of its Divinity School, to say the least, is unwarranted. Harry Pratt Judson.

Special Random Notes of the Convention

By REV. J. W. WEDDELL

It was here in Des Moines over a score of years ago Henry C. Mabie conducted a great missionary and evangelistic conference in which Haggard and Perrine came forward to present themselves for the work abroad. To that noble service they went forth, and having achieved much in their designated fields in foreign parts, subsequently returned under the providence of God to do a like devoted and efficient work at home.

Granville students, meeting at the Chamberlain Hotel, "mine host" being himself a Denison man, heard President Chamberlain, ex-President Purinton, Trustees Beaver and Prescott, and three former students, Hulbert, Kinney and Nixon. They enjoyed a fine banquet and sang their college songs: "It's the Way We Have at Old Denison," and "Denison, Dear Denison."

The Y. M. C. A. of Des Moines kept open house for the delegates, and was a place of constant resort. The reading room, writing tables and bathing facilities were made free to all. The convenient cafeteria fed multitudes of the visitors from abroad. A free moving picture show on religious themes each evening was enjoyed by many.

The East and the West met in cordial fraternity in the hotel lobbies and approaches to the halls. Old friends, who had not seen each other since seminary days, clasped hands and exchanged reminiscences, and felicitations. This is no small part of the amenities of the glad anniversary days.

Corn, corn, everywhere. Corn in the furrow, corn in the elevators, corn on foot being driven to market. Corn is king in Iowa. Delegates from the farther East got a moving glimpse of the vast wealth of this Hawkeye state in its contribution to the mouths of the United States and of the world. It is a Joseph to give corn to all lands.

Many of the delegates found happy shelter in the private homes of the city. Here they were made members of the family to a large extent, and everything was done to make them feel at home and be free to come and go in attendance upon the sessions of the great Convention.

The convenience of a daily bulletin, provided as the program proceeded, by THE BAPTIST, was appreciated by all. In clear type and in excellent form each man and woman had placed courteously in their hands, as they entered the buildings or as they retired from the buildings, the immediate items of the regular calendar as it unfolded.

Additional Bulletins

From College to Council

An important addition has lately been made to the staff of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America. Rev. R. H. Crossfield, L. L. D., President of Transylvania College, Lexington, Ky., for thirteen years, has resigned the presidency of that institution to become one of the secretaries of the Council. Dr. Crossfield is to be particularly responsible for financial administration, which is one of the largest problems which any inter-denominational movement has to face.

Would Recall the Recall

The Baptist Ministers' Conference of New York City protests against the recall of Admiral Sims on the ground of expressing what we believe to be the general sentiment of all right thinking American citizens on a question that involves good feeling, between this nation and the British people. On the permanence of this good feeling depends the future peace and welfare of the world. We therefore protest against the recall of Admiral Sims as a surrender to the prejudices of an element amongst us that is seeking to sow discord between our people and the people of Britain.—H. F. Laflamme.

Do You Want Fifteen Dollars?

The Woman's National Sabbath Alliance offers two prizes, the first one for twenty-five dollars for the best essay or story, suitable for adults, the topic to be, "How can we best witness to the Christian faith in the observance of the Lord's Day," and the second one of fifteen dollars for a story suitable for children. It is especially desired that young people enter this contest but not ministers. As to the number of words and other conditions please send inquiry with stamped envelope to the office of the Woman's National Sabbath Alliance, Room 515, 156 Fifth Ave., New York City.

We Are on the March

IMMEDIATELY upon the close of the annual meeting of the Northern Baptist Convention held the last week in June at Des Moines, the question was on the lips of many: "What of the Convention?"

Critical, disturbing and even divisive possibilities lay in at least six subjects that came up for consideration, namely: the New World Movement, the schools, Fundamentalism, trust funds with creedal conditions, interdenominational relations and denominational papers.

Forward, the New World Movement

When the women had presented their great Jubilee program, when the reports from both the home and foreign fields showed that no such missionary achievements have ever before been recorded in the history of the denomination, when it was understood that we had invested in missions and benevolence the unparalleled sum of more than $12,000,000 during the year, when we had looked into the faces of fifty fine young men and women who were going to the foreign field, when we had listened to the inspiring messages of hope from overseas, when we heard the tidings of salvation rolling in from the churches all over the country, and particularly when we received reports of the blessings that had come to those churches participating in the campaign for the $100,000,000, all doubt concerning the New World Movement was dispelled. In this great enterprise there is to be no turning back.

Fundamentalism is Dead

Fundamentalism (using the term in its settled, technical sense, as designating an interdenominational movement to disseminate a certain group of theological ideas and to force a division in the churches along the line of those ideas) was definitely rejected. The pre-convention conference at Des Moines was intended to assemble, and doubtless did assemble, on this subject, a pan-American Baptist consensus. Discussion was full and sympathetic. Conclusions were embodied in a confession of faith. That confession is distinctly a Baptist document, essentially similar to dozens of other statements that have been given to the public by Baptist groups in the last two or three years. And it is distinctly not a Fundamentalist creed. One scans it in vain for the familiar Fundamentalist affirmations, negations and exactions. Concerning verbal inspiration and the literal method of interpretation of the Scriptures, the method of creation, the virgin birth of Jesus, the substitutionary theory of the atonement, the existence of a personal devil, the premillennial return of Christ, and eternal conscious punishment, it is silent. Not only does it not embody the Fundamentalist objection to a "social gospel," but it pronounces the social implications and fruits of the gospel "inevitable." And finally, when it definitely rejects "the adoption of a creed to which allegiance is demanded," as being "contrary to our historic Baptist principles and repugnant to our deepest spiritual instincts," it severs the last bond between the Fundamentalist movement, and even that group of Baptists which has been supposed to sympathize with that movement.

The confession itself will be variously estimated and used. It is not as symmetrical, as complete and as conservative as the statement issued by the Convention committee on Denominational Day in 1919, but it is brief and convenient. Churches that have no use for a creed will, of course, not use this one. Churches that have been in the habit of using the New Hampshire Confession intelligently will hardly be disposed to discard it for this one. Churches that have no articles of faith and desire them may well consider this confession. The whole matter is left where it properly belongs, with the local church.

It remains true, as stated in THE BAPTIST of June 4, that a Baptist may hold to an indefinite extent the theological ideas current among Fundamentalists; also that the Baptist denomination as such is not concerned about those ideas favorably or unfavorably; but by what words or acts Fundamentalism as a system, as a nexus of fellowship and as an interdenominational movement, could have been rejected more decisively than by the conference on fundamentals at Des Moines, is hard to conceive.

Fundamentalism, therefore, if it ever was an issue in the Baptist denomination, is no longer so. It is not even an accredited candidate for consideration among us. Its tests of orthodoxy have been completely discredited in a pan-American conference on Baptist fundamentals. Let the name be applied henceforth to the system to which it belongs, and let Baptists be known simply as Baptists.

Modernism also (if by that term we are to understand any theory of religion that treats the Bible as an obsolete book—and if any Baptist holds such a theory) may as well gently depart before it in turn is dismissed by its friends.

Triumph Crowns the Schools

What of the schools? Their investigation had been preceded by a long period of adverse publicity. Highly accredited men in the denomination had carried on an open propaganda of denunciation against them as being generally hotbeds of heretical and even of pagan teaching. The religious press had joined the chase. Influential undenominational papers, circulated by thousands in our Baptist homes, had perseveringly advertised that the Baptist schools were disloyal to the essential truths of Christianity. Stories were circulated about young Christians whose faith had been wrecked by the false teaching in these schools. Even the Baptist papers took up the cry. Not more than two or three of them in America openly challenged that propaganda and demanded proof.

Finally a committee<sup>1</sup> was nominated representing especially those who had been most outspoken in condemning the schools. Of the integrity and competency of that committee there has never been any question; but its very origin pledged it on honor to find out what was wrong and all that was wrong with our schools, and report fearlessly and fully what it should find. Persons who had special reasons for desiring an adverse report volunteered to assist the committee, and did assist it, in making the investigation. What was the result? The most effective advertising the colleges and seminaries can use during the coming year is simply to publish broadcast and in full the report presented by that committee and unanimously approved by the Convention. They emerge vindicated, heightened in honor and shown to be adequately subject to Baptist control.

Trust Funds With Creeds

Trust funds with creedal conditions caused a great deal of searching debate. The action taken by the Board of Managers of the Home Mission Society in accepting such a trust without previous notice to either the Society or the Convention raised at once some serious questions, and placed the Convention under embarrassment. The whole subject of such trusts was referred to a competent committee for thorough investigation. Such action will tend to emphasize the responsibility of the co-operating societies to the democratic judgment of the Baptist body as a whole and to render more remote in the future the possibility of any such society or board taking advantage of the Convention by snap judgment or surreptitious procedure. The fact that a great religious body in these times is going to spend a year looking into the mouths of possible gift horses worth possible millions has a positive moral value for the world.

Interdenominational Relations

One of the most disturbing agitations among Baptists during the last two years has been that concerning the subject of interdenominational relations. Memories of the Interchurch experience linger. Fears of the Federal Council of Churches have found free expression. But after two years of reflection and of practical experience, the Convention by unanimous vote at Des Moines committed itself to a definite program. It stands by the principles announced at Denver in 1919. It is ready to co-operate consistently with those principles. It recognizes the Federal Council of Churches as a practical agency of interdenominational co-operation already existing in proved effectiveness. It made a definite place for the support of the Federal Council on the budget of the Convention on conditions that other denominations do the same and that the Federal Council shall no longer receive individual gifts. The plan also guards against unauthorized legal obligations and against ecclesiastical encroachments on our churches. It reserves to the Convention the unimpaired right to withdraw from the Federal Council at any time. The subject of interdenominational relations may therefore be regarded as settled so far as the deliberate and united action of the Northern Baptist Convention can settle anything.

Denominational Papers

A cloud of confusion has been cleared up concerning the denominational papers. In the face of hard times that have shown a disastrous effect on the circulation of nearly all religious periodicals, THE BAPTIST has made a striking increase and is approaching a condition of self-support. The report of the committee and the Convention's approval, by unanimous action in both cases, fixes the status of THE BAPTIST as the sole and unquestioned organ of the Convention and of the Baptist movement as a whole in the North, and pledges the machinery and constituency of the Convention to an effort to give to THE BAPTIST an effective general circulation throughout the Convention territory.

On the Whole, Forward!

On the whole, therefore, the major perplexities that preceded the meeting at Des Moines have been removed and afford no further ground for dissension—unless somebody should be temperamentally bent on making trouble. Of course if there should be any person with whom nothing is settled as long as he can find anything to fret about, no man can forecast what his temperament will lead him to do. But among reasonable men who deliberate, act and settle things in a democratic way, all of the major questions are settled except that of trust funds, and that one is in the process of orderly settlement.

These conclusions are based on the official records of the action of the Baptists assembled at Des Moines. The only misgivings that can arise concerning their reliability must grow out of an inadmissible surmise either that the people who made those records did not know how to say what they meant or that they did not mean what they said.

Progress, large, real and definable has been achieved, with the promise of permanency and of further advance. The field of a common understanding has been cleared so as to make room for all of the loyalties of conservative Baptists, for all of the ascertained facts of modern science, for the utmost freedom of faith in personal loyalty to Christ, for the whole expanding program of God's providential leadership and for the union of all of our forces in the New World Movement. Appreciably nearer is the day when it will be possible to unite the whole Baptist host in a whole Baptist program for the salvation of the whole world. Only unsubdued carnality in Christian men and women can bar the coming of that day.

A Woman Leads the Baptists

IN ELECTING Mrs. W. A. Montgomery as president the Northern Baptist Convention has broken new ground. No other great Christian body, comparable to the convention, has ever chosen a woman as its chief executive officer. In this application of the democratic principle Baptists lead the world and the centuries. The action demonstrates how thorough going Baptists are in their acceptance of the spiritual equality of believers in Christ and in the democratic application of that principle in their own denominational organization.

We have in the past easily quoted the words, "In Christ Jesus there is no male and no female," but when the application was made to our general denominational organizations the word has been, "Men only." Naturally women will now feel that an honor has been done them in this election. Incidentally there may come to pass a closer linking of the women with the general work of the denomination.

In the case of Mrs. Montgomery an exceptional woman has been drafted for a position which today has unusual importance. "There is not another denomination," said one of the speakers, "which does not envy the Baptists the possession of Mrs. Montgomery." She has traits of mind and of soul which would anywhere make her an outstanding figure.

Of her executive ability there is no question. That has been abundantly shown in her leadership of the Woman's American Baptist Foreign Mission Society which would be unwilling to surrender her to anything except such a larger task as has now been laid upon her. Her year of office will be no perfunctory matter. We freely predict that there will be something happening all the time.

Mrs. Montgomery pledges all that she is to the work which has been entrusted to her. Shall not the churches in turn pledge her their loyal and unwavering support? A great leader and a great people, devoted to the accomplishment of the yet unfinished task, can make this the most notable year in the history of Northern Baptists.

Is the Convention Really Representative?

THE convention at Des Moines was a representative body. It was a good cross-section of our great denomination. All shades of thought and all types of Baptist were present. The men who have been known as leaders were there in large numbers as were also representatives of the rank and file of our pastors and laymen. In character, the body was typical of Northern Baptists.

And yet there is food for thought in some facts concerning this gathering. Of the 2189 delegates, 1009 were from the five states of Iowa, Kansas, Nebraska, Minnesota and Illinois. In other words these five states possessed about half the voting power of the convention. Let it be said that the Baptists of the region named are splendid people, as all who know them will be quick to declare, but it must also be noted that numerically they do not represent one-half of the Baptists of the country.

The region in which the convention is held always holds this preponderance of voting power. Perhaps it is inevitable. And yet the Baptists of the North should notice that every year now there is talk, whenever places for the convention are mentioned, to the effect that this type of religious thought or the other is strong in that particular region. The day may come when we shall think it wise to provide means for securing equal proportionate representation from the churches of all parts of the country.

There are in the Northern Baptist Convention some 10,666 churches. Accurate figures concerning the number of these represented at Des Moines are not at hand. But let us say that the minimum would be something like 750 churches and that the maximum would approach 1500. What about the others? It is clear that the majority of the churches of the convention have no active voice, under present conditions, in the important decisions which may be made at the annual meetings.

This, of course, has always been true, but it is becoming of increasing importance each year as the work done by the convention is enlarged and as types of theological thought become more pronounced.

Is it not clear that we have not as yet found the ideal method of representation? How shall we make the convention as really representative as we like to think that it is? The Presbyterians provide for the expenses of the delegates from the various presbyteries to their great meetings; does such a method as this loom up in the distance for us? Such considerations as these become prominent in view of the fact that next year the session will be held in Seattle on the Pacific Coast, a section important now and which has vast possibilities for the future of American Baptists, but which is at the same time a long distance from the present center of Baptist population.

* * *

In this issue appear several statements giving interpretations of the significant convention at Des Moines. Next week there will be printed another and larger group of these. Many important things were done at Des Moines. A correct understanding of the whole is important. Believing that in the multitude of minds there is wisdom, the editors are gathering these brief articles and are certain that they will be found of intense interest. If among the brethren there are those who have not been asked to contribute we shall yet be glad to hear from them, asking only that they confine their interpretation to 250 words. The editors also announce that from time to time important addresses given at the convention will be published.

* * *

We had expected to print in this issue an interpretation from the pen of Mrs. T. E. Adams of the Jubilee meetings held by the Woman's Foreign Mission Society at Des Moines. The manuscript was to have been in our office by Saturday, July 2, at the latest. For some unknown reason it has been delayed. Nobody regrets this more than the editors. We shall hope, however, to be able to present this, with other important interpretative material in the next issue. Readers may be sure that it will be well worth waiting for.

* * *

At the recent meeting of the General Assembly of the United Presbyterian Church action was taken looking toward the establishment of an official church paper. A committee was appointed to go into the matter with care and devise ways and means of carrying out the will of the General Assembly. In this action the United Presbyterians are putting themselves in line with other great denominations. The time is past when great Christian bodies will be satisfied to permit privately owned papers to be the sole mediums for the information of their members and propagation of their work. The present conditions in the printing industry makes such private ventures financially unprofitable. Most denominations have come to feel that it is wiser and safer for the body as a whole to assume, if needs be, a deficit than for such obligations to be met by the personal sacrifices of the owners of private papers or by individuals who may insist upon certain policies being carried out.

Give the Minister a Man's Place and Task—Strong Men Will Answer the New Calls

An address delivered before the Northern Baptist Convention at Des Moines on June 28, and published at the request of the Convention

BY JOHN M. MOORE

THERE is one word in this subject that stands like a traffic officer with upraised hand and bids us halt. It is the word new. Is there really any new conception of the minister's function worthy of being considered? Should we not rather turn back to the apostles and prophets and learn anew what was the old conception of the minister's position, and order the course of the modern minister accordingly? Let us go further back than that. Let us get down to the very bases of the minister's task for any age.

God's greatest work is the making of man in and into his own moral image and spiritual likeness, a task on which he has been engaged for unnumbered milleniums and which is now apparently only just well begun. Man's greatest problem is to learn how to live so as to achieve the fullest normal self-expression and the most harmonious relationship with all other persons, human and divine. Christ is the complete expression of God in the life of man, the goal of human growth and its dynamic, and the satisfaction of the social desire of God. The Father will be well content when the Son has become "the firstborn among many brothers."

A Passionate Pioneer

The minister of the Gospel is one who is journeying with his fellows along the way toward God's great goal, manhood in Christ, and who is believed to have, through prophetic insight or apostolic experience and passion, such special gifts as will enable him to help others learn the difficult art of living right. With this conviction and for this purpose they have consented that he should be released from the ordinary productive tasks of life to specialize on the work of interpreting God and man, and the environing world in its relation to God and man. But no one of these factors with which the minister deals is fixed. God is progressively revealing himself, man is continuously developing new interests and relationships and the world is changing so rapidly that "time makes ancient good uncouth" within the short span of a single generation. It is necessary therefore, that in each new time the church shall make a new appraisal of the minister's function and task. In these present perplexing days that need becomes clamant. Back of all our work of recruiting and educating men for the ministry and our late begun beneficent work of caring for aged and outworn ministers is the basal question of the minister himself, his place in our Christian economy and particularly his position and function in this changing challenging modern world. The problem of getting a sufficient number of spiritually and intellectually able men to lead our churches is acute today and will become tragic tomorrow unless we discover and remove the causes of the refusal of most of our brightest and best young men to consider the pastorate as a life work.

A Soul-Hungry World

Our age is not fundamentally irreligious. There is probably a keener appreciation today than ever before of the utter hopelessness of the world without religion. Some people have always been saying this but it was often simply trite, pious talk until the war came and showed us why it is true. Civilization cannot survive unless human relationships are right. It is not any longer a matter of theological theory but of cold scientific fact. We may not accept all of Roger Babson's gospel of success, I hope we do not, but there is surely significance in much that he is continually saying to the biggest business men of the country, as for example: "All we have that is worth while we owe to religion. All our troubles we owe to the lack of religion. The future of our industries depends on the developing of the soul of man, harnessing the power of prayer and permeating labor, capital, and management with integrity, service, and a willingness to go the second mile. The need of the hour is not more salesmen, or more foremen, or more technical men, but the need of the hour is to get the salesmen, the foremen and the technical men to give their hearts to Jesus Christ."

Mr. Frank A. Vanderlip, President of the National City Bank of

New York has been urging that "the way back to the normal economic conditions is a moral issue involving sacrifice and service." Vice-President Coolidge says that "a community without religion goes to pieces." Hamilton Holt, editor of the Independent declares that "the biggest thing in the world today is religion." The Premiers of the British Empire issued a little while back a most powerful appeal to their people in behalf of religion. The Premier of Australia who is not himself a Christian man says: "If we have any hope it is through the ministers and churches." Filene, the Jewish merchant of Boston challenged a group of Christian leaders whom he had called together for conference, "In the name of God get the Christian church into action." James Bryce declared in the American Commonwealth a generation ago that if history teaches anything it teaches us that hitherto civilized society has rested on religion." Over against all this Albert Parker Fitch in that disturbing little volume, "Can the Church Survive in the Changing Order?" follows an historical survey by enumerating these signs of a new age:

Signs of a New Age

"Political feebleness with its inevitable accompaniment of experiment and change. Intolerable economic conditions of existence inciting to corporate revolt and making men amenable to any overturn. Intellectual rebellion against an outworn order of ideas and its methods of expression; moral restlessness and doubt. If, where these are some new idea is launched, it is like a spark which fires the train which in turn explodes the accumulated charge." Here we are then face to face with the undoubted signs of a new age and men of all faiths and no faith, statesmen, business men, literary men as well as clergymen declaring with one voice that nothing can save the situation but religion.

Who can estimate the responsibility of the church in such a time as this, "the church of the living God, the pillar and ground of the truth" set in the midst of troublous times to make religion dominant in life—religion as we know it in the Gospel of Jesus? Why then do our fine young men not find the task of religious leadership through the church attractive and commanding and in every way worthy of their best powers? Many are willing to become foreign missionaries who will not consider the pastorate at home. Many reasons are given why this is so; the decay of family religion, the decline of idealism and the materialistic measurement of success, the tide of worldliness that has flooded our churches, the frivolity of modern youth, sectarianism, theological uncertainty, the failure of the church to take seriously the work of recruiting, the quality of the present ministry itself. There is truth in each of these explanations but not all the truth in all of them together.

They Do not Balk at Salaries

The answer that is ready on many lips puts small salaries as compared with the financial attractiveness of modern business at the head of the list. I do not believe that this is true at least in the sense in which it is often urged. If the thought of the small salary ever deters a really eager-spirited youth it is because he knows that under the limitations that poverty will lay upon him it will be impossible for him to do the full work of the ministry, and he refuses to throw his life away in the heart-breaking futile business of trying to make bricks without straw. And it is not alone the limitations of the poverty salary itself but that salary is often a fair measure of the low estimate that the church is placing on the ministry as such and this many believe will foredoom them to failure. But his real trouble lies deeper. He is convinced that the minister is not given that place of spiritual leadership by the modern church which would justify ambitious young men in believing that they would be able as pastors to exercise a really effective spiritual influence upon community life. Multitudes of these young men in our colleges and universities whom we covet for the ministry have grown quite hopeless about the church as likely to enter into real moral and spiritual leadership in modern life. They do not believe that the average church would tolerate a thoroughly aggressive modern ministry carried out in the spirit of Jesus of Nazareth. They believe, moreover, that the minister is hopelessly handicapped by an absorbing round of petty duties and endless routine drudgery. They believe that he is bound by conventional notions of the church's mission and expected to stand for an outgrown theology, to promote and perpetuate a valueless sectarianism and let severely alone the great vital questions of social justice and political righteousness which were the supreme interests of the Hebrew prophets and are the obvious aims of Jesus' Gospel of the Kingdom. And so they have passed the ministry by as ineffective and unattractive, and so we are driven now to the necessity of facing squarely this question of the minister's place, his position, his function in the church.

If They Are Wrong, Show Them

If these young men are mistaken in their estimate of the freedom the church is ready to allow them, if they are in error in thinking that the pastorate does not offer a first-rate opportunity to men who are ready to put body and heart and mind into the task of saving the world by the power of Jesus' Gospel, we must show them that they have misjudged the church. If we can prove to them that we recognize the need of experts in religion who have specialized in the Gospel interpretation of God and man and life, to whom we will give intellectual and economic freedom, whose leadership, subject to proper limitations the church is ready to honor and follow; if we are ready to go to our colleges and universities and challenge the best brain and heart of our youth to qualify itself for the moral and spiritual leadership of the age, we shall discover that heroism is not dead. We shall discover too, that religious idealism has not disappeared from the colleges and universities.

Have We Killed Them Off?

The church needs to consider humbly whether it has not been itself the chief reason why able young men have either never thought of the ministry as a place worthy of their powers or having given it thought have abandoned the idea for some other form of service in which they believed that there is more chance for freedom of thought and the spirit of idealism. We ministers too need humbly to consider whether we are not in part responsible because of failure to adorn the office of the ministry, whether we have not acquiesced in a conventional idea of a minister's function which has held no attraction for lovers of achievement and reality. Nothing less than a radical and complete change of heart about the place and function of the ministry will meet the present situation, holding the virile men we now have (it is alleged that thousands of men left the ministry last year) and filling the broken ranks with men of spiritual strength and mental acumen. There will be ministers aplenty, never fear, but the kind of men the world needs now, trained men, invincible men, spiritual leaders in church and community will come only when they are convinced that we are ready to offer them a man-sized job and will honor their leadership as we fare forth together on the trail of truth.

A news item of recent date reads as follows: "Of the graduating class at Amherst College this year, only one student will enter the ministry. Fifty-four will enter business and twenty-seven will take up law, medicine and other professions."

In all our Northern Baptist Colleges according to a recent study, there were 454 students for the ministry, not all of them Baptists of course, and about the same number of Baptist students in all our theological seminaries. What are we going to do about it?

Offer Them a Man's Job; Then See!

I propose that we attack this problem by taking the work of the ministry seriously. That would mean that we offer our young men a real opportunity to exercise spiritual leadership demanding of them such mental training, such social vision and such spiritual purpose as is necessary to give us for our churches sane and balanced but aggressive and sacrificial leaders.

Surely it would arrest the attention of the best and ablest of our college and university men if we were to go to them with such a challenge and call and offer them the opportunity in a distraught time to serving the highest interests of the community, the nation and the world.

Let me illustrate my meaning by naming five outstanding tasks of the churches that call imperatively for a sane strong spiritual ministry, tasks that belong to the distinctive work of the church. No job for amateurs these!

I. THE SPIRITUAL INTERPRETATION OF LIFE

It is a commonplace to say that our age is grossly materialistic. The scientific movement which came to flood tide in the middle of the nineteenth century was wholesome and beneficent in its ultimate cumulative effects but for a time the spiritual casualties were alarming and terrible. Sam Walter Foss in a few verses tells what happened to the faith of those who were unable to stem the current of this time of scientific materialism.

"A boy was born 'mid little things,
Between a little world and sky,
And dreamed not of the cosmic rings
'Round which the circling planets fly.

"He lived in little works and thoughts,
Where little ventures grow and
plod,
And paced and ploughed his little plots,
And prayed unto his little God.

"But, as the mighty system grew,
His faith grew faint with many scars;
The cosmos widened in his view,
But God was lost among the stars."

Art and ethics and religion were threatened with destruction by the mechanistic view of the universe which captured the minds of many who as it would seem from our present higher vantage ground ought to have known better. Soul with its absurd claim of immortality was a mere egoistic fancy. God was superfluous, if not an impertinence in a universe that could get along quite nicely without a personal Creator or Ruler. Law was almighty. Force was the first cause. Personality was illusion. But the scientists turned philosophers, ceased to be wholly scientific. They had left many of the most significant facts out of account. A scientific scholasticism and dogmatism developed that was quite as misleading and dangerous as the older theological dogmatism.

A Boy—and Another Boy

But now the tide is beginning to turn. Such men as Bergson, and Eucken and James and Browne have brought philosophy back to a spiritual basis. Scientists have become more scientific and the panic is passing. The last three verses of the poem just quoted tell how faith was saved.

"Another boy in lowly days,
As he, to little things was born,
But gathered lore in woodland ways,
And from the glory of the morn.

"As wider skies broke on his view,
God greatedened in his growing mind;
Each year he dreamed his God anew,
And left his older God behind.

"He saw the boundless scheme dilate,
In star and blossom, sky and clod;
And, as the universe grew great,
He dreamed for it a greater God."

The eternal hunger for God demanded the Bread of Life and could not be satisfied with the stories of science.

Some time ago a New York daily newspaper published a poem which it had rejected as poetry but which came to have news value because the authoress, unable to sell her writings, get employment or find sympathy had committed suicide. This is one of the verses:

"And I, upon life's battlefield, with many a stifled moan,
Perchance e'en now, already dead,
I seem turned into stone;
With head upraised, with eyes be-dimmed, and wistful look abroad,
I call to comrade, friend or foe,
Is there no word from God?"

All Life is Sacred

This is the cry of human hearts everywhere. The minister must give the answer. I am not renewing the old plea for emphasis on spiritual as against secular things. The present task is far more important and difficult. The middle wall of partition between spiritual and secular is broken down in Christ. The spiritual interpretation of the whole of life is the minister's task. He must show how such supposedly sordid things as wages and dividends and buying and selling such worldly things as play and work are to be guided and controlled by the spirit of Jesus. More than that a great deal of current Christian doctrine even must be worked over in terms of the spiritual. The doctrine of God must be restated in terms of Jesus' great word in Samaria, "God is a spirit." The doctrine of the Bible must be restated in terms of another word of Jesus: "The words that I speak unto you, they are spirit and they are life." The doctrine of the Kingdom must be saved from political materialism in terms of a third weighty utterance of Jesus. "The Kingdom cometh not with observation. When they say unto you, lo here or lo! there, believe them not for the Kingdom of God is within you." Our theological teachers have done their work well. It remains for the preachers of the land to bring to the people these great spiritual interpretations of doctrine and life which Jesus proclaimed, and save the churches from as dangerous a heresy as ever was promulgated—the dualism of the sacred and the secular. There is no such dualism in the mind of Christ. All life is sacred.

2. THE DEVELOPMENT OF A CHRISTIAN TECHNIQUE OF LIVING

The lack of this is one of the gravest defects of the Christianity of our times. There has been developed an elaborate system of truth to be believed, an extensive ceremonial to be observed. From every pulpit and in every Sunday-school class is sounded the call to be good. "Yes" many reply out of troubled hearts, "we wish to be good but you do not tell us how. You tell us to trust Christ and to work out our own salvation with fear and trembling, to grow in grace and christ-like character. There is nothing else we so much desire but you do not say how we can get rid of spiritual stress and strain, how we can control temper and appetites, how we can enter into the peace that guards the heart and mind through Christ Jesus."

One of the most remarkable religious developments of our time is that which is finding expression in the New Thought and other kindred spiritual movements. In one of the largest department stores of Brooklyn one can find by searching for them a collection of religious books in an out of the way corner, but can scarcely escape if he would, another section filled with books plainly placarded New Thought. Why have so many people, good people, practical people, earnest people been willing to accept the impossible philosophy, the pseudo-psychology, the crude fanciful interpretations of Scripture which the most successful of these religious movements has propagated so widely?

What Breaks Their Nerves?

I know of but one answer. A real human need has been met for many people more effectively than the orthodox churches have been able to help them, by offering a technique of living that emphasizes healthy spiritual thinking and a positive rather than a negative approach to the problem of sorrow and sin. "What do ye more than others?" said Jesus to his disciples, clearly implying that Christians ought not to live live ordinary men. And yet we see them breaking down with nervous prostration, yielding to anxiety and worry, losing faith under misfortune and fearing death, just like those who profess no acquaintance with Christ. We need ministers, need more of them, need them desperately who have a background of spiritual experience and psychological training to show inquirers how to grow like the lilies of the field into beauty and grace.

3. THE GUIDANCE OF RELIGIOUS THOUGHT FROM OLD CONCEPTIONS OF TRUTH TO NEW ONES

There is no task pressing upon the ministry today more urgent and important, more delicate and difficult than this. An old religious issue has been acutely revived in our time, the question of spiritual freedom. Two rival attitudes toward faith and freedom are contesting for supremacy and the very nature of Christianity is at stake. Is it a garden walled in, to use a figure of Dr. Fosdick, or an open road stretching out through fields and forests toward the sunrise? Is it a pool or a flowing river? Is it a finished system or a living spirit continuously creating a new earth? Is the Bible a literally exact, verbally inspired, utterly inerrant book in all its parts or is it a progressive revelation of God in which we are led on from lower conceptions to higher ones in a path that shineth brighter and brighter unto the perfect day when God is at last fully known in Jesus of Nazareth our divine Lord? Truly the facts of our faith are unchanging and unchangeable but are the interpretations of those facts which the best men attained to in a more primitive time to prevent our acceptance of new light which the living Spirit may give to earnest seekers after truth in a later day? Around questions like these, controversy is raging today. The issue for spiritual freedom is as critical as when Martin Luther contended against a papal bondage of the spirit of man, or Paul of Tarsus urged the Galatian Christian to resist those who would put off the fetters of their souls and stand fast in the liberty wherewith Christ had made them free. For such a time as this we need a ministry whose love abounds in knowledge and all discernment, who can distinguish things that differ or as Moffat puts it, "have a sense of what is vital," well instructed scribes, as Jesus said who bring out of the treasure house of truth things new and old.

4. THE APPLICATION OF THE GOSPEL OF JESUS TO THE SOCIAL ORDER

This is the hot spot in the churches' work today, the one Christian issue that supremely challenges the faith and courage of the church and calls for a leadership that only able men can give. What a host of hard questions are called up by the present international situation and the widespread social unrest?

When Germany introduced poison gas into warfare the civilized world was horrified, but listen to this, a news item dated Chester, Pa., June 4, 1921:

"A new warfare gas, in liquid form, three drops of which will with-in thirty seconds kill the person whose skin it touches was described here today by Captain L. D. Hutson, U. S. A., speaking before students of the Pennsylvania Military College. Captain Hutson came here to perfect plans for a night gas attack, to be staged in connection with the college's centennial commencement exercises on June 13. "Imagine what will happen to a city," he said,

Greetings From Sweden

Rev. K. O. Broady, the "grand old man" of Sweden, and known and loved by Baptists all over the world, still retains his citizenship in the United States for which he fought during the Civil War, attaining the rank of colonel. He has done a remarkable work for Swedish Baptists. He sent the following greetings to the convention:—

Honored and beloved Brethren:

Only a few words—Great has been your work in Sweden, and, allow me to say it, great has been its results. We thank God for it—We thank you profoundly. The last day will bear witness in a way we now cannot express, that our God in heaven, through Christ, has indelibly put his seal on it. We Baptists in Sweden have no other call, and seek no other, than the making of Christ great in the hearts of all the people here. His blood has bought us—His reign will crown us—Heaven waits to receive us all—The room there is great, and the glory eternal.

Your aged brother in Christ,

K. O. Broady.

Stockholm, Sweden, May 26, 1921.

"when air squadrons begin spraying it with that terrible substance. In the next war machine guns and artillery will be out of date—the weapons will be gases and chemicals, and the humblest noncombatant will be exposed to attack. Entire populations will take the chance of never awakening when they go to bed at night. It will truly be a war of extermination."

Shall there be no one to cry out effectively against war in the name of Christ, since this is what it has come to mean?

Industrial workers have come to despair of the churches' having or uttering any message for such a time as this and for the most part they have turned away from us. Manufacturers and employers in many cases are sure that we have no word of wisdom for such an hour and they are commanding us to keep hands off, sometimes threatening the withdrawal of financial support unless we let such questions alone. When industrial radicals foment class hatred and seek the overthrow by violence of our political and industrial order what shall the minister say? When the Wall Street Journal speaks words of brutal frankness like these, shall the minister be silent?

"When the real adjustment comes the unskilled worker finishes where he belongs—at the bottom of the list. He will be able to live on two dollars a day when he is lucky enough to get that amount regularly. Wages which in the spring before the panic of 1873 were eight dollars a day fell to two dollars in the autumn of that year, with employment hard to find. The cost of living will adjust itself. The Labor Bureau will give up publishing nonsense about $2,600 a year minimum for a fancied "family of five." The unskilled worker will thank goodness that he has no family of five, or indeed anybody but himself to support."

A Question We Must Face

We do not need political economists in our pulpits and the minister is unwise who without scientific or political training invades the field of the specialist in these departments. But the minister has a speciality too. He is or ought to be able to give expert advice in the field of human relationships. He is a specialist in the things of the Gospel an interpreter of life speaking with the authority of experienced and eternal truth. Professor Coe puts the question directly and clearly:

"Is a system in which one works for wages and another for profits fundamentally Christian, anti-Christian or neutral? Are its motives Christian? What is the effect upon character of the repeated exercise of its motives? What is the actual outcome as respects the relation of man to man? Here we are concerned with the meaning and value of life. Our question leads straight back to Jesus and straight forward to any vision that we dare indulge concerning the coming of the kingdom of God. It is the great parting of the ways for the Christian ethics of society. The ministry must take upon this question an open stand that is definitely Christian or lose its soul. We have needed guidance on this point—O how sorely!—for years. . . . And the Christian ministry is looking on."

And the editor of THE BAPTIST comments wisely in these words:

"Now there are just two possible ways in which the Christian ministry can meet that challenge and save its soul. One is to deny that it has any concern with the fundamental ethics of the existing industrial system and to justify that denial on the deepest religious and ethical grounds. The other is to accept the moral responsibility for a decision on the issue as stated, and to say openly what that decision is."

God give us men for our pulpits who are brave enough and wise enough to accept the challenge of such a task.

5. FOCUSING OF FAITH ON JESUS CHRIST, THE SON OF GOD

This is the paramount task of the minister and the paramount need of the times. All thoughtful people are conscious of the need of salvation. So few look to Him who is the only Saviour. A group of British leaders including Bishops, college principals, titled ladies and other important people recently issued a statement of need and call for help which contains this keen diagnosis and prophecy.

"No student of religion, or morals, or of economics can regard the present trend of affairs without feelings of grave anxiety. Civilization itself seems to be on the wane and everything that makes life really worth the living in process of extinction. The nations are filled with mistrust and antipathy for each other, the classes have rarely been so antagonistic, while the relation of individual to individual has seldom been so frankly selfish. Never was greater need of all those qualities which make the race human and never did they appear to be less manifest," in short, "the world has taken a wrong turn, which if persisted in may lead to the destruction of civilization."

They declare quite truly that "A renewed sense of right is needed, as well as a renewed determination both to do and maintain what is right internationally as well as nationally and individually. Only when statesmen and citizens, employers, and employed assent to this, even when apparently it is against their interests, "can the spiritual and moral health of the nations be renewed, and the general economic well-being be once more established."

This is good so far as it goes, but it lacks power. It is the statement of a fair diagnosis, but only the Great Physician has power to heal society's hurt. Even some of those quoted in the early part of this address who see no way out except through religion fail to see that it is not religion but Christ himself who is the light and hope of the world. The minister's work, and it is a colossal task for colossal men, is to focus the faith of the world on Jesus. Christ and Him crucified can avail now and He alone. It is not a question of a well stated doctrine of Christ's person, not the most perfect theory of the atonement in even a faultless declaration of his deity.—No plan of salvation, not theology new or old, not even the Gospel itself, but Christ the perfect man, the Son of God, Jesus of Nazareth who loved not his life unto death, Himself the Way and the Truth and the Life. Christ in the experience of men can save the world. He must have the preeminence in all of life.

Call the Church's Bravest Sons

These are some of the things that will make the ministry attractive to men who wish to meet the fundamental human need in the most thorough going and radical fashion. To such tasks the church must call her bravest and strongest sons, and I am persuaded that when she is ready to define the position and function of the ministry after this fashion, and to follow her spiritual leaders as they follow Christ, there will not only be more men, but what is more important there will be more Man in the ministry.

Let's Applaud Him

SOME time ago, on an ideal autumn afternoon, I witnessed a number of athletic games and races. Fully ten thousand people were seated around the circle in which the contests took place. The chief event of the afternoon was a five mile race, and eight fine looking fellows received the plaudits of the crowd as they started on their long run. For a time, they kept well together, but after several laps, one of the runners began falling behind; and while the others received cries of encouragement from their friends, no one seemed to pay any attention to him until he seemed well-nigh out of the race. Here and there thoughtless persons were heard to taunt him, and soon all around the circle people began laughing at him and calling out witty things at his expense. He was plainly discouraged and distressed and was falling rapidly behind.

Just at a time when he seemed to be hopelessly beaten, I heard one gentleman say to another: "It's a shame to treat that poor fellow so; he needs encouragement. When he comes around again, let's applaud him."

On came the runner, and the two gentlemen clapped their hands vigorously as he passed. He looked up quickly and appreciatively. He seemed to realize that he had found some one who was interested in him; the thought put new speed into his dragging limbs and his pace quickened perceptibly. Goodness as well as evil is contagious. Others caught the meaning of the applause, and saw its effect. They, too, joined in, and as the flying runner with ever-increasing speed, sped around the track, one after another became interested in him, until the entire crowd was on its feet yelling and shouting as one man. It was a moment of thrilling excitement; and the incident furnished one of the best illustrations I have ever known of the power of encouragement. With a speed that seemed marvelous the runner drew nearer and nearer to the others, and finally, at the end of the race, but one man had beaten him by a few feet. Had it not been for the encouragement he received, he would have been hopelessly defeated; as it was, he came in second, and won a handsome reward.

The moral is so plain, that it seems almost useless to point it out. Life is a race, and all about us there are those who seem to be hopelessly beaten—beaten through lack of appreciation of friends, of encouragement. Shall we not watch for these discouraged runners; shall we not withhold our taunt and sneer; shall we not give our word of cheer and praise; and shall we not now and then speak kindly of them to others, and say, "Let's applaud them!"—Selected.

Baptist Phoenix Rises to New Life

Colleges and Seminaries are vindicated—Eighty-five new foreign missionaries under appointment—Committee will investigate trust funds—Budget of $12,500,00 adopted—All unite behind the New World Movement and THE BAPTIST—Mrs. Montgomery, the new president.

Last week's report of the Northern Baptist Convention at Des Moines closed while the educational program was in progress, Thursday evening, June 23. The report of the Board of Education, read by its executive secretary, Rev. Frank W. Padelford, contained a mass of interesting information from which extracts only can be reproduced here.

"For the first time in our history education has become a subject of denominational interest. Many Baptists have given their lives to building up our educational institutions and many generous minded men have given largely of their wealth. At times a whole state has assumed a definite interest in some institution of its own, but as a denomination Baptists of the North have never before assumed any definite responsibility for the education of the nation. All this is changed now."

In ten years the number of students in Baptist institutions of learning has increased from 20,000 to 34,728; teachers, from 1,259 to 1,972; value of lands and buildings, from $21,890,986 to $44,715,771; endowment, from $30,222,359 to $57,203,135; university pastors, from 2 to 34.

"The church cannot hope to duplicate in extent the educational system of the state. It does not need to. But it must maintain a sufficient number of such institutions to permeate the whole educational system with the spirit of Christianity. The state is doing for our youth what the church could never do, but the church must maintain its work on a sufficiently high level to control the spirit of the whole educational system in America."

Our Schools Are Safe

"Our schools and colleges have been under a severe storm of criticism during the past year. The attacks have had a most serious effect in undermining the confidence of our people at a time when they were beginning to take a new interest in the education of their children. If the attacks prove to be unwarranted incalculable harm has been done to the whole present generation. * * * We know that the charges that have been made are largely false. * * * We also know that if our people could understand the real situation, their hearts would rejoice within them. * * * We would rather have our children in these colleges during their critical years than in any other place. * * * It seems to us little more than criminal to undertake to undermine the faith of our people in colleges like this (referring to one which had been specially criticized). When the facts are known they are the glory of the Christian church."

The work of Dr. Allyn K. Foster and Miss Frances P. Greenough in promoting the religious life among the students received specific commendation. Miss Greenough was hindered in her work some time by ill health. But Dr. Foster has been at work over sixteen months, and the report says:

"The work of Dr. Foster is, in our judgment, the finest piece of specialized religious work that is being done among American students today. We make no exceptions. Dr. Foster is interpreting Christianity to students who are trying to find their way through science and philosophy. He is thoroughly at home in both of these departments. He has a keen perception of the problems that have been raised in students' minds by their studies. He has a strong evangelical faith. He is undyingly loyal to the great fundamentals of the gospel. He believes that there is no real antagonism between the Christian faith and the discoveries of science, and he is giving himself to their reconciliation in the minds of students."

The report was accompanied by a comprehensive sketch of the plans for the Department of Missionary Education.

In addition to the illustrated lecture of Dr. Padelford, as noted last week, Dr. Foster spoke on "An Eye Witness in Baptist Colleges"; Miss Jessie Burrall of Stephens College spoke on "The Christian College as the Teacher Sees It"; and Rev. Bernard C. Clausen of Syracuse, N. Y., closed the evening's program with an address on "Religion at 21."

Dr. Aitchison Calls for $20,000,000

Friday was a day of quiet. General Director Aitchison reported for the General Board of Promotion, and some of his points of emphasis follow:

"One of the most perplexing periods in the history of Christian missions," is the way Dr. Aitchison characterized the fiscal year just past, declaring that the scarcity of money, the "tremendous reaction from the splendid idealism which carried us through the war," and the "relapse to the former spirit of individualism and selfish interests in national and international affairs" has not failed to affect Christian work. Nothing but the splendid response from Northern Baptist churches toward their New World Movement during the year had saved the denomination from having to curtail its work seriously, he said, "at a time when the world most needed the ministries of all Christian agencies."

"During the year the General Board of Promotion has united the promotional programs of seven national, thirty-four state and ten city organizations. Its chief task is a present to our constituency a unified vision of world-wide responsibilities which we as a denomination face, to the end that the various institutions and enterprises created by the denomination for the administration of missionary, philanthropic and educational work may be fully comprehended, and adequate funds be secured to enable those organizations to do their work."

Under the co-ordination of the General Board of Promotion, the Northern Baptists accomplished striking results during the year, Dr. Aitchison said. Northern Baptists were the first of any of the great denominations to pay off their inter-church guarantee of $2,500,000.

Important features of the year included the holding of 120 missionary conferences in various centers of the country, under leadership of the Departments of Conferences and Conventions, of which Dr. Hugh A. Heath of Boston is executive secretary.

The total subscriptions to the $100,000,000 New World Movement Fund reported by Dr. Aitchison now aggregate, including $5,000,000 which has been subscribed conditionally upon definite amounts being raised, $57,824,299.85. This is less than was reported at Buffalo a year ago, owing to the fact that over $12,000,000 given by a generous friend to three organizations participating in the New World Movement was designated by the donor for endowment purposes only, and cannot be included as a part of the Hundred Million Dollar Fund.

Dr. Aitchison said that the total receipts for the year totaled $12,596,694.48. Of this amount $778,268.18 was income from matured annuities, legacies and invested funds, making the total contributions from living donors $11,818,426.30.

"Northern Baptists are confident of their ultimate success in raising the $100,000,000 fund."

"The expense budget of the Board of Promotion for the past two years was $1,900,000. Of this sum, the printing bill aggregated $306,072.53 for that time."

Other departments of the Board of Promotion upon which Dr. Aitchison reported were: The Department of Survey, Literature and Publicity, with Dr. Frank W. Padelford as executive secretary; The Department of Life Work, Dr. R. M. West, executive secretary; Department of Prayer and Stewardship, Dr. E. M. Potat, executive secretary; The Department of Special Gifts, Dr. Aitchison, executive secretary; Department of Conferences and Conventions, Dr. Hugh A. Heath; and the Business, Dr. H. R. Greaves as executive secretary. Special mention was made of the work of the treasurer, James C. Colgate of New York.

Women Among Strongest Assets

Dr. Aitchison particularly praised the work of the Woman's American Baptist Home Missionary Society and the Woman's American Baptist Foreign Mission Society, as among the "strongest assets of the denomination." The responsibility and leadership of women is to be vastly greater in the new order of things, he said.

"The Convention will be asked to approve a budget for the coming year of $20,000,000," Dr. Aitchison stated. "Anything less than this will be unworthy of us in view of the needs of our organization, and would not be in keeping with the temper and ability of our people."

Following this report came the opportunity for discussion of the reports on the denominational schools. There was, however, no argument and without discussion the two reports were received and ordered filed and the committee discharged with thanks.

The program of the Woman's Home Mission Society, which had been crowded off the program by the debate of the previous afternoon, was given the right of way in the afternoon.

The session was called to order by Mrs. M. G. Edmunds, second vice-president. Mr. D. C. Shull gave the report of the finance committee as follows:

A Budget of $12,500,000

"The Finance Committee have thoroughly examined the combined budget, received by it from the General Board, and have made numerous changes and now presents and asks this Convention to approve the combined budget as follows, for the year 1921-22, subject to adjustment of details by the Adjustment Committee: A. B. F. M. S., $1,928,287; W. A. B. F. M. S., $669,769; A. B. H. M. S., $932,839; W. A. B. H. M. S., $483,404; A. B. P. S., $327,417; M. & M. B. B., $291,100; Board of Education, $200,000; B. Y. P. U. A., $15,000; Northern Baptist Convention, $35,900; Thirty-four State Conventions, $1,585,624; eleven City Mission Societies, $555,489; Schools and Colleges, $2,644,537; Amount borrowed to cancel obligations of Inter-church, $1,022,400; Foreign Speaking Conferences, $46,804; Board of Promotion, $736,750; Board of Promotion, (last year's account), $100,000; Federal Council of Churches, $35,000; Historical Society, $5,000; Adjustment, $889,680. Total, $12,500,000.

The budget so reported was adopted.

The college quartette sang and were recalled. Dr. F. L. Anderson, chairman of the foreign mission read the report of the society. The year was the best in the history of the society. We now have 833 missionaries, 200,000 members, 2,237 schools of all grades, twenty-four hospitals and in these hospitals and dispensaries 365,000 treatments were given last year. There were more than 11,000 baptisms. The society believes as heartily as ever in medical missions and as heartily as ever in our educational work. The work of evangelization is always stressed. When Dr. Goodchild made his report on the schools there had been during the year thirty-seven conversions in our college at Shanghai. There has been another revival and the number is now eighty-seven. The aim in all our work is self-supporting and self-propagating churches. There are today more self-supporting Baptist churches in Burma than there are in Massachusetts.

Where the Tide Rose Highest

No single session in the convention reached such a height as that in which our foreign visitors and workers were introduced. When the war broke out in 1914 there were two young men in Rochester Seminary preparing themselves for the ministry. They immediately left for France and enlisted. One of these men was Robert Farrelly. He served five years. He brought greetings of Christian fellowship and told how some of our Baptist churches through our gifts are being rebuilt. Henri Vincent was the other young man. He said that the money we're spending in France was good seed and that France was good soil. Dr. Barbour told how universally these young men were loved by faculty and students alike.

Saturday brought up for reconsideration the question of receiving gifts with creedal conditions. Judge Freeman's resolution as adopted at the close of Thursday's debate, June 23, read as follows:

"Whereas, a member of one of our constituent Baptist churches recently offered a gift to the American Baptist Home Mission Society of the approximate value of $1,750,000 in trust and upon the conditions that no part of the income from said gift shall ever be used in paying the salaries and expenses of any colporteur or missionary who does not believe in:

"1. The inspiration and supreme authority of the Holy Scriptures.

"2. The deity of our Lord Jesus Christ, His incarnation, His atoning death, His bodily resurrection and His return.

"3. The church on earth composed of the redeemed who are commissioned to make their chief business the evangelization of the world.

"And, whereas, The Board of Managers of said society have accepted said gift upon the conditions stated; and whereas the donor since the acceptance of said gift has signified his willingness or desire that the third paragraph of said condition may be modified so as to read as follows:

"3. Baptist churches composed of those who have been baptized into fellowship on a confession of their faith in Christ as their Redeemer and Lord, and commissioned to make their chief business the evangelization of the world.

"Now, therefore, be it resolved:

"1. That the Society in annual meeting assembled express to the donor their profound and grateful appreciation of this magnificent gift.

"2. That the action of the Board of Managers of the Society in accepting said gift be affirmed and in all respects commended.

"3. That said Board be advised to accept and affirm the proposed modification of the third paragraph of said condition, as herein set forth."

Subject of the Great Debate

The substitute resolutions proposed by Prof. Vaughan Thursday follow:

Whereas, The Board of Managers of the American Baptist Home Mission Society has accepted a gift from an unknown donor to which the following conditions are attached—

3. Said trustees shall not use any part of said income in paying salaries and expenses of any colporteur and missionary who does not believe in

(1) The inspiration and supreme authority of the Holy Scriptures.

(2) The deity of our Lord Jesus Christ, his incarnation, his atoning death, his bodily resurrection, and his return.

(3) The church on earth composed of the redeemed who are commissioned to make their chief business the evangelization of the world.

4. If at any time it shall be proved that the officers and Board of Managers of the American Baptist Home Mission Society are not in sympathy with the beliefs stated in paragraph number third of this agreement said trust fund shall be transferred to—

Be it resolved by the American Baptist Home Mission Society in annual meeting assembled—

1. That we express our appreciation of the generosity which has prompted this gift and our sympathy with the donor's desire to preserve the blessings of the evangelical faith to future generations. We avow our unswerving loyalty to the gospel of Christ as it is interpreted by Baptists and our earnest purpose to make it known to all mankind.

2. That we cherish as a priceless possession our freedom in Christ from creedal bondage even with respect to the truths which we firmly hold. Our standard of doctrine, to which all our missionaries are responsible, is the Word of God as it is interpreted in every generation by believers, and not a written, mandatory creed whereby dead hands control living men. We, therefore, declare it to be the policy of the American Baptist Home Mission Society to receive and to hold no funds to which creedal formulations are attached as conditions of fellowship and service. The doctrinal provisions of this gift we regard as creedal in character, inasmuch as the service of some of our workers, generation after generation, is conditioned upon conformity to a fixed, written statement of belief filed in our archives.

3. That a committee of three be appointed of which the executive secretary shall be a member to negotiate with the donor for the removal of these conditions.

4. That we send the following communication to the donor:

Dear Brother in Christ:

The Baptists of the North assembled in annual meeting at Des Moines, are deeply touched by the evidence of your generosity and devotion to the gospel of Christ in your recent munificent gift to our work.

It is our unflinching purpose to be loyal in all our missionary agencies and activities to the fundamental doctrines of the evangelical faith. We feel that specific creedal statements, such as those which accompany your gift, however true and sincerely believed by us, embedded in trust funds as conditions of service, do not accord with our historic Baptist principles of liberty. We request you, therefore, to consent to the opening of negotiations whereby assurances may be given that the great evangelical interests which you have at heart may be conserved and yet without the imposition of creedal tests. We pray that the highest blessings of the presence and goodness of God may ever abide with you.

Sincerely,

The American Baptist Home Mission Society.

How Saturday Settled It

The following resolution was presented by President C. R. Brock, of the American Baptist Home Mission Society, and seconded by Professor F. L. Anderson, of Massachusetts; Professor R. M. Vaughan of Massachusetts, Secretary C. L. White, and F. W. Freeman, of Colorado:

"Resolved, that the Northern Baptist Convention refers to the Boards of the co-operating organizations and the Ministers and Missionaries Benefit Board, and the Board of Education the whole subject of recommending to the Convention a policy in regard to receiving, holding and administering any gifts or trust funds to which doctrinal conditions are attached and that said Boards report at the next meeting of the Convention; and that the Board of the American Baptist Home Mission Society be requested to convene the Boards here in named for the consideration of said subject."

The resolution was discussed by Rev. R. A. Williams, of Ohio.

The following amendment was presented by Rev. Joshua Gravett of Colorado:

"Be it resolved that the Northern Baptist Convention place itself on record as opposing the reception of any gift with a creedal test contrary to the New Hampshire or Philadelphia Confessions of Faith or any confession of Faith which may be adopted by the Northern Baptist Convention.

The amendment was discussed by Rev. Joshua Gravett, of Colorado, and F. W. Freeman of Colorado.

On motion of Prof. F. L. Anderson, of Massachusetts it was voted that the amendment be referred to the Boards named in the resolution, for their consideration and report on it be made to the next Convention.

Rev. F. E. Taylor of Indiana presented the report on evangelism as follows:

"It has probably been the greatest year we have ever known in evangelism. From almost every State come such heartening words as these: 'Never such a quickening among the smaller churches; we shall report the largest number of baptisms in our history'; 'Nearly twice as many accessions as in any preceding year'; 'Since October, fifty series of revival meetings, with converts more numerous than usual'; 'Never in a decade such an outpouring of blessing, or such an ingathering'; 'State Convention missionaries never did so large a work'; 'State-wide campaign, with baptisms double those of any similar period'; 'The number of new disciples is far above the average'; 'Practically every church has held special meetings, with very fruitful results'; 'The churches have pushed their own evangelistic program throughout the year, making it the best we have ever experienced'; 'More baptisms at Easter than at any Easter season in our State.'

"For this increased fruitage we are deeply indebted to the Department of Evangelism, the worth and work of whose General Superintendent, Dr. H. F. Stilwell, we here whole-heartedly commend. His report shows that inspirational conferences and schools of methods have been conducted in twenty States, and that in eleven of these States an organized effort was made to arouse every church to this supreme task. We fervently hope that his constructive program, which contemplates the issuing of an adequate literature and the placing of a superintendent of evangelism in every State not now so provided, may be speedily realized.

Propose Intense Evangelism

"A policy of 'Progressive Evangelism' has been effectively worked out in Oregon. One of their evangelists enters into agreement with a group of churches to assist them in doing their own soul-winning. From two to four campaigns are thus carried forward at once, the number depending somewhat on the time which the local church desires for preparation. Then in each case the evangelist comes for the closing week, to help the pastor in his final appeals. It is expected that a detailed statement of this plan will soon be in print for our use.

"Special attention is called to the thorough, systematic program adopted by the Minnesota Convention. Stirring, helpful literature, such as 'A Call to Prayer' and 'Studies in Personal Evangelism,' was distributed among all the churches. October was utilized for preparatory work, such as community surveys to ascertain definitely who should be reached; the training of workers; and the perfecting of plans. November was selected as the month of enlistment and special ingathering. During December emphasis was placed on the conservation of results. January and February were devoted to the extension of the habit of intercessory prayer and of the family altar; and in March another protracted effort was made for the winning of new converts, culminating in evangelistic services at the Easter-tide.

"Pastors of the Southern California Convention have set an example which is well worthy of imitating. They began their evangelistic season last September with a three-days' retreat. Seventy per cent of all the pastors attended. The time was spent largely in prayer. It is planned to inaugurate their campaign next fall with another such retreat. More than ever there will be waiting upon God for the manifestation of his Spirit and power.

"With all the passion of yearning souls, we repeat the recommendation made last year, namely, that at least two periods be sacredly set aside for this primal task of our churches, preferably the weeks centering about Thanksgiving and Easter. Other dates, such as Christmas and New Year's and June Sunday, offer specially inviting opportunities.

Set Every Church Ablaze

"That we shall never succeed in any large Convention-wide degree until every local church is aflame with a passionate zeal for souls is a conviction which we desire to reiterate and emphasize anew. This is but returning to the New Testament method—a method which in our own day the Korean Christians followed and thereby were blessed with a nation-wide ingathering. There ought to be a personal workers' organization in every church. Every Bible school teacher ought to be impressed with the supreme purpose of his holy calling. Every father and mother ought to be constantly reminded of the unspeakable privilege of turning the hearts of their children to Christ. Every pastor and every layman, recalling that seasons of refreshing can come only from above, ought to kneel daily before the Pierced Feet, saying, 'Lord, teach us to pray.'

"In the drought-stricken district of North Dakota, which has not seen a crop for five years, there was a small rural church which (before the holding of a recent revival meeting) consisted only of women, whose husbands were bitterly opposed to the church and all its activities. Before the meeting closed, every one of these husbands was won to the Saviour. The whole community has been transformed. Home circles have been re-established. Neighbors that formerly were enemies are now friends. If a crop is harvested this fall, this heroic group, aided by the State Convention and the Home Mission Society, will build for themselves a new church home. Is any kind of work more worth while?

"Let the unrepealed command and commission of our Lord, who came to seek and to save the lost, 'oblige us to live like the children of God, that we may be able,' as Bunyan said in his last pulpit utterance, 'to look our Father in the face with comfort another day.'

The report of the Social Service Committee emphasized the immediate importance effective action with regard to the temperance, the industrial situation, recreation and moving pictures, disarmament and peace. Salient passages are:

"The adoption of the Eighteenth Amendment is by no means the end of the fight. Now comes the struggle to secure a fair and adequate enforcement of the law and to ground the prohibition principle deep in the thought and custom of the people. At present the country is passing through a period of reaction, and this has some dangers for the cause of prohibition. Wide-spread and concerted efforts are being made to discredit prohibition and to secure a change in the law. There must be a systematic and continuous education of the people in the evils of alcoholism; continuous publicity showing the beneficial results of prohibition in society, business, civic morality, and public peace; the selection by election and appointment for public officials; men who are in sympathy with prohibition and have the courage to enforce the laws; such an amendment to the enforcement codes, both Federal and State, as will make the enforcement of the laws possible and easy.

"Human values are at stake in every industrial situation. Human relations underlie all such questions as labor and capital, hours and wages, and these relations must ever be considered. Men are to do the will of God and serve his kingdom. Industry is here that it may serve man; its function is service, and its method is association. Industry, like every other interest of life, is a field for ethics and religion. It is for us to find the ethical values that are at stake in every situation, to interpret and to apply the principles of Christ in all industrial relations, to develop a body of ethical standards which shall guide our conduct and measure industrial action, and to develop an active and discriminating conscience in the people which shall make them quick to feel the inequalities and evils of our present system. It is for the church to impress upon its members the necessity of nothing less than a fundamental change in the spirit and working of our economic life.

Watch Dance-halls and Pictures

"The dance-hall, even under the best of conditions, needs constant watching; but in recent times in most communities it has undergone a marked change for the worse. It may not be possible to suppress these entirely; but they must be carefully watched; and a determined effort should be made to eliminate the more objectionable features.

"Moving pictures, as abundant evidence shows, are steadily growing worse. On all sides it is admitted that the movie, as now conducted in many communities, as a grave moral menace. The pictures are often gross and suggestive; they portray crimes, such as highway robbery, assault, and murder; many of them caricature ministers and make light of religion; they suggest licentious ideas and contain constant incitement to sex curiosity.

"In view of this there must be censorship that really censors; and there must be an organization of the moral forces in each community to close objectionable places. Beyond this our church-people can declare a united strike on the movies themselves till the films are really cleaned. Here is a special task for the Brotherhoods and Adult Classes.

"The hope of the Scriptures is the program of the Christian. One of the chief tasks before the churches and the nations is that of bringing peace on earth and preventing the recurrence of such disasters as the World War. Several things are vital. It is necessary for us to recognize the fact that war has causes and these are within the control of men. We must therefore know whether men and nations are sowing the causes which lead to war; we must create an active conscience among nations which will lead them to remove these causes.

"We must discourage the expenditure of vast sums of money in military preparations. We must create a public opinion in the nations that refuses to be misled by passion and duped by misrepresentation. We urge the people of our nation to petition our Government to join with other governments in a world agreement in behalf of disarmament, either through the League of Nations or in a special conference called for that purpose."

Dr. C. H. Sears made the report on City Missions, recommending enlargement in the scope of city missions, and of the committee to fifteen members; that the city missions organizations be called uniformly "Baptist unions;" and offering much valuable statistical information:

"Protestantism's increase, however, did not keep pace with the growth of population, and the religious leaders of the world's largest city face the solemn fact that, from 1906 to 1916, while the city gained 1,033,000 in population, the enrolled membership of all religious bodies decreased to the extent of 46,878 persons.

"This loss is due not only to the decrease of Roman Catholic membership but to the static conditions of Judaism, which, while it numbers from 1,500,000 to 1,750,000 persons in the population of Greater New York, has less than 100,000 with regular synagogue connection.

"To interpret evangelical Christianity to Roman Catholics from all countries of the globe and to interpret it to Jews, who as yet fail to recognize that Jesus internationalized Moses, the Protestant churches of Greater New York have a task severer than that of the churches of any other large city of the nation.

Protestant Showing in Cities

"The percentage of the population of the eight largest cities of the nation in the communicant membership of their Protestant churches in a comparison of 1906 with 1916 is as follows:

Baltimore 22.36, 24.47; Philadelphia 17.89, 18.56; Pittsburgh 16.90, 23.57; Cleveland 15.07, 12.69; St. Louis 13.55, 13.83; Chicago 11.92, 11.20; Boston 11.03, 10.89; New York 8.47, 7.68.

"Facing the greatest Roman Catholic and greatest Jewish city of history, the evangelical communicants of Greater New York are only one in every thirteen of its population, and while, as yet, registering no decrease in the aggregate of their church rolls, are certain to do so within a short time unless two things happen."

In the Publication Society session, Mr. Frank Robinson of Pittsburgh called the society to order, saying, "The remnant of the American Baptist Publication is now in session." Dr. Gilbert N. Brink gave the ninety-seventh annual report of the society. Nothing less than a volume can tell all of the manifold activities of this wonderful organization which is constantly forming into the churches a stream of information concerning its work. The report opened with a fit notice of Dr. A. J. Rowland, former General Secretary, who died within the past year. The society's income is now more than $2,000,000 a year.

West Virginia won the fine silver cup on account of the hand work done by its Sunday-schools. It will hold this cup until some other state surpasses it in this work.

Rev. H. E. Tralle delivered an address on "Conditions of Progress in the Church School."

After greetings by representatives of Canadian and Southern Baptists the convention adjourned for a Saturday half-holiday of recreation.

The young people's session was held Sunday afternoon. The thought for the afternoon centered around "fellowship." The session opened with messages from young people of other lands to the young people of America. Representatives were heard from China, Japan, India, Norway and Denmark. In the absence of Dr. J. H. Franklin, these speakers were presented by Dr. P. H. J. Lerrigo, candidate secretary of the American Baptist Foreign Mission Society.

General Secretary J. A. White of the Baptist Young People's Union of America presented Dr. W. J. McGlothlin, president of Furman University, Greenville, S. C., who spoke on "Baptist Young People and World Fellowships." This same subject will be the topic for discussion in young people's societies the latter part of January, 1922. Dr. McGlothlin's splendid address will be printed and may be secured by writing to B. Y. P. U. of America, 125 No. Wabash Ave., Chicago, Ill.

The young people's session again demonstrated the interest of Baptist young people in the cause of Christ and their denomination. On call, more than twenty came to the platform representing those who had made decisions for Christian service prior to the Convention. When the chairman asked if there were those in the audience who had responded to the call of God during the session, fifteen others came forward.

Sunday night, a stereopticon lecture by W. P. Lippard brought before us European conditions and some of the persons whose lives and service are helping to remake that country. In the absence of J. H. Franklin, Mrs. M. G. Edmunds, the second vice-president, asked F. L. Anderson to introduce the speakers for the evening. Charles A. Brooks declared that the history of European Baptists will for generations to come be divided into the period before the London Conference in July 1920 and since that time. The conditions in Europe are appalling and seriously affect our churches. In fact the churches have suffered more than any other social institution in its morale—its spiritual resistance. We must not forget that more than the map of Europe has been changed. New constitutions have been written, new liberties found and new rights asserted. The story of Czecho-Slovakia is an epitome of Europe. When the population carried out the great revolution in which there was not a drop of blood shed, the Stars and Stripes was placed with the flag of the new republic. Dr. Brooks described the contrast between his recent experiences in Prague and those of a former visit seven years before. "The dream of John Hus has again come true. In Poland a few months ago the new constitution which was in the making provided that the president must be a Catholic; it now provides that he must be a Christian. In France the greatest spiritual harvest has followed the relief work."

Religious Conditions in Boston

Dr. Austen K. de Blois has recently completed his tenth year of ministry with the First Baptist Church of Boston, Mass. He took advantage of the occasion to preach a sermon in which he reviewed religious conditions in that city as he had seen them during the period of his ministry. His general conclusions which are summarized as follows will have much interest outside of Boston. "Every creed and cult is represented here. Unitarianism has gone backward; Congregationalism has made no perceptible advance; Methodists have gained in the suburbs; Episcopallians are stronger; Roman Catholics control the city; Christian Science is losing ground; the various cults are about the same way; the Christian association are doing a much greater work than ten years ago; the Baptists are not gaining much apart from Tremont Temple."

Monday morning was given over to the business of the convention. The report of the committee on denominational journals was read by Mr. F. W. Ayer of New Jersey, and was adopted with its recommendations. This report follows:

At a meeting of the Northern Baptist Convention held in Buffalo, in June, 1920, in connection with a discussion of the report of the General Board of Promotion, the following vote was taken:

Re Denominational Journals

"That the report of the Board of Promotion be adopted with the exception of that section relating to denominational journals.

"That the whole question of denominational journals be referred to a special committee, to be appointed by the President, composed of all elements and views held among us, and to report to this annual meeting of the Convention."

The committee thus provided for was duly appointed and at a late session of the Convention brought in its report as follows:

"We recommend:

"1. That the General Board be instructed to continue the publication of THE BAPTIST along the lines projected last November.

"2. That the Convention approve the paragraph of the report of the General Board of Promotion referred to this committee.

"3. That a representative committee of five be appointed to present to the Convention of 1921 any supplemental report deemed necessary by said committee."

This report was adopted and in accordance with its recommendations the committee of five members was then appointed by the Executive Committee of the Convention.

The committee did not immediately begin to hold meetings. Because of the fact that the appointment of the committee had resulted from a discussion of the advisability of continuing to maintain THE BAPTIST as a denominationally owned journal it was felt that further time should be given for a demonstration of the advantages accruing from such a journal and of the attitude taken by the denomination toward the paper which it had established.

At a recent meeting of the committee facts were presented for its consideration which threw light upon the second of these questions.

Within the last few years there has been an alarming decrease in the subscription lists of many, if not most, of the religious journals of the United States.

In spite of the fact that many denominations are able to bring great pressure to bear upon their constituency for the securing of subscriptions to their denominational publications, the circulation of most of these journals has at best remained practically stationary or has fallen off to a noticeable degree. This is true both of the papers which are denominationally owned and of those which are under private control. The committee is reliably informed that at such a time and under such conditions there are two religious journals which have shown a decided gain in circulation during the past year, and one of these two is THE BAPTIST.

At the time THE BAPTIST was established, it took over the subscription lists of The Standard, Zion's Advocate, The Journal and Messenger, and The Pacific Baptist; these combined lists numbered 18,898. The first issue of THE BAPTIST was that of January 31, 1920. In the fifteen months elapsing between that date and May 1, 1921, the subscription list increased from 18,898 to 31,602. This was a net increase of 12,704 or a gain of 67% in the number of subscribers.

Such a Showing Shows Something

This increase in circulation, somewhat remarkable in the light of some of the facts mentioned above, would seem to indicate that THE BAPTIST has commended itself to the members of the Northern Baptist Convention and has won for itself a place in denominational life.

The budget of the General Board of Promotion adopted by the Board and by the Northern Baptist Convention at Buffalo in June, 1920, contained an item of $25,000 for the denominational support of THE BAPTIST during the year closing April 30th, 1921. The committee is informed that the expenses of the paper were kept well within this budget allowance, that the paper now has a working capital, and that no denominational appropriation has been received or used for May or June of the present fiscal year. Furthermore, the item included in the budget of The General Board of Promotion for the expenses of THE BAPTIST during the year 1921-22 is $5000 less than that included last year.

Without entering into any discussion of the benefits accruing to the denomination from the ownership and control of its own religious journal, since this subject has heretofore been so well covered in reports submitted to the Convention and to the General Board of Promotion by other committees, this committee simply wishes to record its conviction that THE BAPTIST may ultimately be conducted without subsidy, and become of enlarging and effective service.

The committee has given some consideration to the distinction which exists between a denominationally owned and a privately owned religious journal. The former is and should be a forum in which all phases of denominational life and thought are recognized and given an opportunity for expression. The latter, according to the judgment expressed to the committee by the editor of an influential privately owned paper, is and should be "an advocate pure and simple." The privately owned paper is a pulpit from which the editor gives to his audience of readers utterances for which he alone is responsible and which are colored by his personal opinions and beliefs. It is the judgment of the committee that there is room in the denomination for both types of journals and that each may make a valuable contribution to de-nominationnal esprit de corps, unity and harmonious co-operation.

We also wish to commend Missions and Watchmen-Examiner for their valued service to the denomination and urge our constituency to give them loyal support.

In closing, the committee would recommend that the Convention urge its members to put forth an earnest, united systematic effort to increase the subscription list of THE BAPTIST, in the assurance that the result of such an effort will be not only to reduce still further appropriations which the paper will find it necessary to receive from the denominational treasury, but far more important and more vital, to bring about a systematic understanding of each others' point of view.

Respectfully submitted,

Signed:

The report of the executive committee was read and discussed and the recommendations generally adopted except that the matter of biennial sessions was laid on the table until next year.

The report of the committee on the place of the next meeting was read by Mr. H. H. Kendall of Mass., and by a practically unanimous vote it was decided to meet next year at Seattle, Wash. The question of having the convention meet in May rather than in June was referred to the executive committee and a report will be had next year.

The report of the committee on interdenominational relations was read by Dr. C. A. Barbour. The recommendations involved an appropriation of $35,000 to the Federal Council of Churches, in place of the small sum heretofore contributed, provided other denominations enter into the new plan of financing this organization and the soliciting of individuals cease. Significant portions of this report follow:

Reaffirm Denver Resolutions

"At its meeting in Minneapolis on the first day of December, 1920, a Committee on Interdenominational Relations was appointed by the General Board of Promotion in accordance with the Buffalo resolutions, to report to the General Board of Promotion for such action as the General Board of Promotion might report to the Northern Baptist Convention at its meeting in 1921.

"At the anniversaries of the Northern Baptist Convention held in Denver in May 1919, a statement prepared by a Convention Committee was unanimously adopted. In part it read as follows:

"The Baptist denomination is a collection of independent democratic churches. Not one of these churches recognizes any ecclesiastical authority superior to itself. They are grouped in associations, state conventions, and a national Convention, but none of these groups has any control over a local church beyond that which lies in common faith, practice, and service. The denomination, in so far as it has unity, is a federation of independent democracies. In the nature of the case, therefore, anything like organic union of Baptist churches with other denominations is impossible. There is no centralized body that could deliver Baptist churches to any merger or corporate unity. If Baptist churches do not have organic unity among themselves, they obviously cannot have organic unity with other denominations. By the very nature of our organization, we are stopped from seeking organic union with other denominations.

"This situation does not arise from any desire on our part as Baptists to withhold ourselves from fellowship with other Christian bodies in the pursuance of Christian work. Nor does it arise from any desire to impose upon them our own convictions. We grant to others all rights that we claim for ourselves. But the liberty of conscience and the independence of the churches which characterize our position are involved in our fundamental conception as to the nature of the Church and of its relation to the religious life.

"We believe in the complete competency of the individual to come directly into saving relationship with God. We hold that a church is a local community of those who have consciously committed themselves to Jesus Christ. The only Church Universal is, in our belief, spiritual fellowship of individual souls with God. We do not believe in any form of sacerdotalism or sacramentalism among Christians, who are all equally priests of the Most High. We reject ecclesiastical orders and hold that all believers are on a spiritual equality. With us ordination is only a formal recognition on the part of some local church that one of its members is judged worthy to serve as a pastor. The fact that such appointment is generally recognized in all our churches is simply a testimony to denominational good faith.

We Cannot Yield Here

"We cannot modify these convictions for the sake of establishing a corporate unity with other denominations. Any compromise at this point would be an abandonment of structural beliefs.

"We heartily believe in the necessity of a combined impact of Christian forces upon the evil of the world. Such impact, however, does not depend for its efficiency upon organic union of the churches. We are convinced that our fundamental conception of the Church, the nature of our organization, the democracy which is the very basis of our denominational life, make any organic union with groups of Christians holding opposite views unwise and impossible."

"From the above statement it will be seen that there is little likelihood that the churches of the Northern Baptist Convention will participate in a movement toward organic church unity. The task before the Church of today, however, is so vast, so impossible of accomplishment by any one denominational body or by all the denominational bodies acting as separate units without co-operative planning and endeavor, that there is every warrant for saying that the Northern Baptist Convention will participate in such co-operative planning and endeavor fully and loyally, in every way consistent with its principles and polity."

After enumerating several particular phases of interdenominational co-operation now successful and well established, the report took up specifically the Federal Council of Churches and offered the following analyses and recommendations:

"It may be said for the Federal Council that:

"1. It has inspired and promoted a co-operative state of mind. Prior to its organization the Protestant denominations of America had never entered as denominations into a definite and continued co-

Interpretations of the Des Moines Convention

Three Things

By E. M. POTEAT

Three things:

1. The Convention marks a distinct recovery of the sense of our mission to give Christ to the whole world. We are middle-of-the-road missionary Baptists. Extremists retired from the foreground of attention and missions and missionaries had their innings.

2. The convention idea is still in solution: it has not yet precipitated in definite outline. The habit of "anniversaries" is still strong upon us. I do not know what legal obstacles deter us; what it is that requires the annual business meeting of a "society" to displace the convention—inviting the president to vacate the Chair to allow a few formal votes to be taken by the same people under another presiding officer. But it is surely an incongruous proceeding. And when the Northern Baptist Convention gets to be a convention—that is, becomes the organ of the organized life and work of Northern Baptists, we shall all be happy to see all our societies abandoning their anniversary mass meetings, and conceiving themselves as the servants of the convention, reporting to it their work and awaiting their instruction at its hands.

3. Intellectualism and reactionism were distinctly rebuked. Our chief interest is not and can never become the interpretation of our message. Christ is infinitely more than our interpretations of him. And when comments about him—whether made by intellectualism or reactionism—take the place of witnessing to him we are untrue to our commission to be witnesses unto Him unto the uttermost parts of the earth.

So-called fundamentalists can never carry the Christian mind back into the middle of the fourteenth century: as well try to put the eagle back into the egg! And they may as well abandon the outcry against the new insights, the new vitalities of Christian loyalty which are the fruits of the scientific and literary studies of the past half century.

Similarly, the so-called liberals will never carry the Christian mind to the end of the road which radical criticism of the Gospels has traveled. See Schmiedl, for example, with his nine sayings of Jesus still surviving the attention of the critical method.

No; the great body of Northern Baptists are loyal Baptists; they will continue in this character, and the late convention furnished of this a complete and highly gratifying demonstration.

The Convention of Conciliation

By JOHN A. EARL

I was impressed at the convention held in Des Moines by the absence of ecclesiastical machinery, the presence of the divine Spirit and the evidence of spiritual progress. The machinery which has been very much in evidence since the Denver meetings was largely kept out of the convention at Des Moines. The General Board of Promotion had long sessions at Hotel Fort Des Moines; but aside from the excellent report of the committee on correlation and the equally excellent report of Dr. Aitchison that part of the machinery was kept in the background. The presence of the divine Spirit was seen in the wisdom which finally prevailed in referring the policy of receiving gifts for missionary and educational purposes to the societies and boards of the convention to report at Seattle, in the apparent desire of the brethren to get together as Baptists and not as radicals or conservatives, in the high type of addresses given by the speakers, and in the goodwill which prevailed throughout the convention. The evidences of progress were eloquently presented in the Jubilee Pageant, in the large place given to missionary demonstration in the program, in the statesmanlike report on our schools and colleges, and in the reports of all standing committees. If the Denver convention was the highest ever held, then the Des Moines Convention was the hottest; but despite the heat the convention of 1921 will go down in history as the convention of conciliation.

Impressions of the Convention

By GEO. W. TAFT

Suspicion, whether unuttered or expressed, for fully ten years has been our convention bugbear. It has no theological, sectional, missionary society or school bounds. It has been distorted and exaggerated but has usually arisen from some real cause. It is characteristic of our changing age and our changing individuals. Moreover, all of us realize that suspicion must recede into the background before the N. B. C. can have aggressive unity, and accordingly, alas for human nature, desire that the other men should first trust us.

Whenever a person, an institution or an organization is under suspicion, the only Baptist way to dissipate the same is to make a frank, open, sincere and non-evasive statement of the point under controversy. Baptist liberty must not be prostituted by becoming a coward's castle. Dr. Goodchild's report and statement of facts did more to allay suspicion and create confidence than hundreds of general affirmations or denials.

A denomination and a democracy groping for unity and seeking a common Baptist platform for aggressive service and a marked advance.

Too much perspiration—too little inspiration.

Remembering that Baptist schools should remain Baptist schools and that if they ask Baptist support, they ought to be willing to give an honest, unequivocal statement of the things for which they and their teachers stand, the majority of the denomination seemed to think that a genuine, consistent and Christian working of the present school machinery furnishes adequate denominational control of the schools, without the superimposing of a national hierarchical system by the Northern Baptist Convention.

A largely growing conviction that when a man is no longer a real Baptist, common honesty demands that he should retire from Baptist leadership.

The creedal statement applied to the Home Mission Society gift, which a large majority of the convention seemed to approve, is practically a brief statement of the belief of evangelical Christians from New Testament days up to the present. It or some one of its items has been denied by Arians, Socinians, Unitarians, modern Rationalists and those Mystics who have magnified the "inner light" and "Christian consciousness" above the author of the Scriptures. Baptists, since they have been known historically as Baptists, have always advocated those stated principals. When any member of a Baptist church has forsaken any one of the items mentioned in the so-called creed, he or his spiritual descendants have soon been outside our fellowship. To the writer it looks as though the test of the gift resolved itself into the fact that those who receive and administer it should remain Bible-believing Baptists.

Philadelphia

July 1, 1921

By ARTHUR C. BALDWIN

To me much of the Northern Baptist Convention at Des Moines was a great disappointment. We missed the high, prophetic note. We were suffocated in an atmosphere of suspicion and conflict. The days of reconstruction have brought to the churches a peculiar challenge. The whole world faces problems which demand moral power. Disarmament, a right internationalism, the "rising tide of color," industrial injustice and unrest,—these and many kindred questions affect the temporal and spiritual welfare of men. Can religion give the wisdom and spirit for their solution?

The New World Movement faced them fearlessly and with faith. It spoke with a vision and assurance that gripped. The convention, however, did not. Aside from some reports that few will read and some resolutions that will be forgotten, an onlooker could not have known that such questions existed. Instead, we had petty denominational politics. We wanted to see our Christ, high, lifted up, militant with an all conquering grace; but we saw instead earnest, able men dissipating their strength in creedal arguments with their brethren. We wanted to have the open door of God's opportunity interpreted to us and to hear some heroic soul call us to the crusade to do the visible spoken will of God; but instead we were reminded of the day when the Lord's reproach was, "Ye make void the word of God by your tradition." It was the Christ of yesterday, the one sufficient to our fathers, not the Christ of today who has advanced before us and bids us take new things out of his Word. It was traditionalism, not a living reality; a church wasting itself on profitless discussion when the great world calls for salvation.

Yet not altogether did we miss the prophetic note. In the missionary programs we saw again the living Lord and felt his power. Then we sang "Take the name of Jesus with you," and we sang it with enthusiasm and found again the unity we had lost in theological controversy. What a pity after some such moments that the fog had to shut us in again and whispers run about the assembly, "Is he sound?"

God forgive us. There was too much passion, too much suspicion, too much talk of loyalty and too little real loyalty to his spirit. Next year may we have business in the morning, conferences on great matters in the afternoon, and great inspirational programs in the evening.

Chicago Churches Seem Scarcely Moribund

Easter reports to the Chicago Federation of Churches gave the following table of accessions:

53 Baptist churches.....	1,710
62 Congregational churches.....	1,407
3 Church of the Brethren.....	22
15 Disciples churches.....	381
100 Episcopal churches.....	1,686
11 Evangelical Ass'lation churches	185
1 Friends church.....	12
180 Methodist Episcopal churches..	6,500
52 Presbyterian churches.....	2,923
6 Reformed Church of America..	94
3 Reformed Episcopal churches..	40
12 United Evangelical churches....	138
2 United Brethren churches....	15
29 United Lutheran churches.....	1,253
6 United Presbyterian churches..	98
5 Union and Community churches	155

540 16,619

The number of accessions to church membership during the recent months in the nine hundred Protestant churches of the Chicago area based on this average must have passed the 25,000 mark.

Idle Cars Mean Idle Men

"Idle freight cars in the United States now number 423,000 and more than 3,500 locomotives are stored. The carrying capacity of this idle equipment is greater than all the freight equipment of the railroads of any foreign country.

"Only six months ago there was a shortage of 146,000 cars.

"These idle cars and engines mean that an investment of more than $600,000,000 is producing nothing.

"But this heavy investment in equipment and facilities—greatly in excess of the need in times of light traffic—must be made by the railroads in order that they may have a reserve to draw upon when the tide of traffic rises. Even with this costly but necessary insurance, a car shortage is inevitable at the peak of an industrial boom."

—Federal Council Bulletin.

Catholics Can See Through It

The National Catholic Welfare Council recently issued a statement from which the following is quoted:

"While unemployment is intensified by the world-wide dislocation of industry following upon the war and the ensuing difficulties in Europe, it is not too much to say that recurring periods of unemployment are part of the scheme of things. Just as famine was periodical when transportation facilities were slight, so now unemployment is periodical. It does not strike all workers at any time and large numbers of workers escape it entirely. But all the time (except during such emergencies as a great war) there are many who are out of jobs not because they want to be, but because they cannot get jobs. And besides this, every few years there comes a period of grave unemployment. It is as common as the changes in the seasons."

The statement closes with a quotation from "The Christian Democrat," organ of The Catholic Social Guild, concerning the situation in the mining industry in England:

"Our whole industrial system is provocative of recurrent social crises, which are a perpetual menace to our national life. The system is wrong because it depends upon self-interest as its motive power and economic force as its weapon."

Mother Beats the Brindle Cow

Studies made in many different countries have demonstrated that the death rate among artificially fed babies is at all times higher than among breast fed babies; that where for any reason breast feeding is the custom, the mortality rate is low in spite of other unfavorable factors; and that when for any cause breast feeding is increased in a community the infant mortality is lowered. Studies made in over-crowded and poverty-stricken districts of New York, Chicago and other large cities indicate very clearly that where by race or custom it is the practice to feed infants at the breast the infant mortality rate is relatively low. It has been further shown that the good effect of breast feeding is manifested not only in infancy but in later childhood and even in adult life.

This Strikes Them Where They Live

The Philadelphia Yearly Meeting of Friends maintains a General Social Order Committee and six vocational groups which are continuously engaged in the effort to apply the Quaker message to modern life. These are the Business Problems Group, the Farmers Group, the Property Group, the Women's Problems Group, the Educators' Group and the Social Workers' Group. It would be difficult to find any religious body in America which is undertaking in so serious and thorough going fashion to find out what Christianity means in terms of human institutions and associations. In its report for 1920-1921 the Social Order Committee proposed that the following query be circulated among the members of the fellowship:

"Are we, as employers and stockholders, mindful that (as the name of our Society suggests) we are called to be friends and brothers of all men, and are we vitally concerned that the conditions of work of those in our employ should be such as we would desire for our own brothers and sisters? Are we earnestly endeavoring to secure for our employees the wages and the leisure that will be sufficient for the comfort, education and full development of themselves and their families; to free them from the distresses of unemployment, and to give them opportunity for self-development in their work? In order to provide these advantages, are we willing, if necessary, to simplify our own lives, and accept smaller financial returns for ourselves?"

Paroles That Pay Seem Popular

The Texas Board of Pardon Advisors in January, 1919, reported on the operation of the indeterminate sentence law in that state that the principle motive impelling the parole of convicts seemed to be "to obtain able-bodied men who are capable of rendering good service either as a farm laborer or as a mechanic, at comparatively speaking, a low compensation." The report continues: "The longer the term the convict has to serve the more desirable he is to the applicant for parole. We have had frequent letters from men under parole stating that they are overworked and asking, in some cases, that they be returned to the penitentiary if they cannot be paroled to some one else or granted a pardon."

"Wobbly" on the Wind Jammer

Art Shields in an article on "The New Turn in the I. W. W.," finds a record of a change of policy on the part of this outstanding group of radicals. Their paper, the "One Big Union Monthly" has been re-baptized and now appears as the "Industrial Pioneer." It is dropping the familiar cant of the class struggle and is taking up industrial facts. Similarly the paper "Solidarity" is changing its tone. A bit of doggerel in a recent issue indicates the drift:

"The wind jammer jams and he jams all day

While workers upbuild in a skilful way;

The windy one rides through a metaphor cloud

While builders stride through the working crowd."

—The Socialist Review.

Holding Our Own

The debt of this country is now $24,000,000,000. The ratio between the per capita debt and the per capita wealth is about the same, as it was at the end of the Civil War. At that time the per capita debt was $68 and the per capita wealth $719. The per capita debt is now $223 and per capita wealth $2,322.

English in German Schools

Halle-On-Salle.—The Congress of German College and High School Teachers of Modern Languages adopted a resolution that henceforth English be taught in all German public schools, except the elementary schools, and that as much time be devoted to English as to French.

Are Japs a Declining Race?

Population figures that prove the population of the Japanese empire over 1,000,000 less than it was estimated in 1918 were given out by the bureau of national power investigation here recently. Practically every city shows a large decrease as compared with the incorrect figures of 1918, Tokyo alone being 190,000 less than its semi-official figures indicated.

The population of the empire, according to these figures, which are the result of months of labor on the part of the bureau officials, is 77,005,510; that of Japan proper, exclusive of Korea, Formosa and Saghalien, 55,961,140.

Both of these figures are less by more than a million than the figures given in 1918. The population of the empire, then estimated from a compilation of old registers, was given at 78,261,856, or 1,235,346 more than the census of 1920 gives. The decrease for the Japanese empire, therefore, is 1.6 per cent.

If Dollars Made Sense

In the Chicago Daily News Mr. P. P. Claxton, U. S. Commissioner of Education is quoted:

"In 1918, the last year for which complete reports have been compiled, we spent in the United States for public education, elementary and secondary, $762,259,154; for normal schools for the training of teachers, $20,414,689; for higher education in colleges, universities and professional and technical schools, whether supported by public taxation or privately endowed, $137,055,415. The grand total was $919,729,258. In the fifty years from 1870 to 1920, we paid for public elementary and high schools $12,457,484,563; for normal schools, $291,111,232; for higher education in tax-supported and privately endowed colleges, universities and technical schools, $1,504,200,272, a total of $14,552,796,037 for the fifty years.

"For the years preceding 1870 $2,000,000,000 for public elementary and secondary schools, $3,000,000 for normal schools and $150,000,000 for higher education would be very liberal estimates. Adding these to the totals given will make a grand total of about $14,500,000,000 for public elementary and secondary schools, $295,000,000 for normal schools and $1,950,000,000 for higher education, approximately $16,645,000,000 for public schools, elementary, secondary normal schools and higher education in schools of all kinds from the beginning of our history until 1920.

Proselytizers Among Methodists

The worst enemy in the Argentine, a missionary writes, is not, as one would imagine, the Roman Catholic Church, it is Seventh Day Adventism, "and why it should be recognized as a missionary society is beyond me. Their work is not so much among the unconverted, it is proselytizing among believers, and urging upon them the claims of the law. At the present their method is to go around with three or four tracts in a Number 1 packet of a series. The tracts deal with subjects such as the creation, the flood, and temperance, and are without doubt very good, beyond suspicion. In a little while Number 1 is collected and passed on to others, and Number 2 is left to be read, and so on; and you may depend on it the poison is given in small doses with the good, and the believer who is not well educated or taught in the Scriptures runs a great risk in reading them."—Epworth Herald.

Preacher Becomes a Film Star

Dr. Russell H. Conwell, the well known Baptist minister of Philadelphia, has written a story called "Johnny Ring and the Captain's Sword." The story is now to be reproduced on the screen. The proceeds from the film will be devoted to the work of Baptist Temple among poor boys. The story is that of a boy in the Civil War ridiculed by his captain for his habit of evening prayers. The boy rescues the captain's sword at the risk of his own life and this results in the conversion of the captain. Dr. Conwell and some of his deacons will supply the dramatis personae of the film. Rev. James K. Shield wrote the popular motion picture scenario, "The Stream of Life," but this is the first time a well known minister has himself become a movie star in a religious film.—The Christian Century.

Chinese Education in America

When the United States remitted a large share of the Boxer indemnity that was due this country, China gracefully reciprocated by setting aside the fund for the education of Chinese youth in America. That fund has made possible the maintenance of Tsinghua College in China and an educational mission in the United States. Now the Chinese Government has appointed a permanent commission of three, composed of the American minister, the Chinese minister, and the vice-minister of foreign affairs, to assume the direction of the fund, and an enterprise that originated in one nation's generosity and another's courteous response, is insured in perpetuity to the incalculable advantage of both countries.—The Congressionalist.

Southern Baptists Want Disarmament

The Southern Baptist Convention, at its last annual meeting, held in May, adopted the following resolutions:

"WHEREAS, The matter of the reconstruction of the world upon a permanent peace basis, is the supreme question of the present, and

"WHEREAS, The adjustment of the perplexing world problem which is filling all nations with unrest, can only be made by the use of those spiritual forces that have been especially committed to the churches, and

"WHEREAS, The ethical principles of the Gospel of our Lord are the changeless truths both for personal and national life of the whole world, and

"WHEREAS, There is a widespread expression that it would be wise and timely to call a conference of representatives of the leading nations to discuss in a friendly way, the question of disarmament.

"Resolved, First, that, as a convention of Christians, we are glad to join other bodies in an indorsement of this seemingly practical movement toward disarmament with the hope and prayer that our torn and bleeding world may be restored to peace under the guidance and benediction of the Prince of Peace.

"Resolved, Second, that a copy of this resolution be sent to the president of the United States and to the Secretary of state."

When Will the Volcanoes Erupt?

Physically there are more than a hundred volcanoes in Japan. Spiritually there are—who can say how many or how soon they will go off? This incident is a symptom: A year ago last September about 16,000 laboring men went on a strike. Article 17 of Japanese Law notwithstanding. An observer says that these men were desperate and that the authorities were decidedly not at ease; there is no telling what the hair-trigger-temperament Japanese will do, once they decide to act together. For about two weeks they refused to work at the Kawasaki dockyards down in Kobe. Then suddenly their employers gave in. The dockyard workers won a 50 per cent increase in wages and an eight-hour day—a victory for liberalism in Japan far more significant than appears on the surface or in the papers. For it has demonstrated to laboring Japan how much power the anti-militarists and the anti-exploiters have.

Soldiers Colonize Land of Mystery

When the present writer was a boy in a London school he learnt some wonderfully weird things about Australia. For instance, the birds had no song, the flowers no scent, the fruit grew with the stones outside, and the rivers ran inland from the sea. I have just returned from a holiday on the River Murray, which is over 4,000 miles long and has a navigable length of over 3,200 miles. Along the banks of this magnificent waterway, returned soldiers are being settled by the government of South Australia on irrigation blocks of ten, fifteen and twenty acres. Most of the men are doing well, and the blocks are applied for more rapidly than they can be made available. It is magnificent land and a matchless climate for fruit-growing—apricots, peaches, grapes, oranges, etc., all doing equally well.—Cor.

Get Them While They Last

At a meeting of the Executive Committee of the Northern Baptist Convention held in Des Moines, Iowa, June 22, 1921, it was voted that all publications of the Northern Baptist Convention now on hand should be freely distributed to our Baptist constituency through State Convention Secretaries upon the basis of Baptist membership in each of the States. There are over seven hundred copies of the last Annual, a valuable book, a large number of copies of pamphlets containing the very important documents on Organic Church Union prepared from the Convention in Denver, and a few copies of Annuals of previous years. Baptists who desire these documents should write to their State Secretaries who will be in charge of distribution in their several States. I should be thankful if you would give this notice a place in the columns of your paper.

Yours sincerely,

W. C. Bitting.
Corresponding Secretary.

International Uniform Lesson for July 24

PAUL PROCLAIMS JESUS AS THE CHRIST
Acts 9:19-30. Golden Text: Matt. 16:16.

BY JOHN A. EARL

The Lesson Text

After his conversion to Christ, Saul remained for some time in Damascus with the disciples there. But a man of his temperament could not be long idle or inactive, so Luke tells us that "straightway in the synagogues he proclaimed Jesus, that he is the Son of God." This was in reality the beginning of the Christian ministry of Paul which extended over a period of twenty-nine years, divided as follows: seventeen years in Damascus, Syria, Cilicia; seven years in Asia Minor and Europe in intensive missionary work; five years in prison. Of course it amazed the Jews to hear Saul of Tarsus pleading the cause of one whom he had regarded as an impostor and whose followers he had bitterly persecuted. Their amazement soon disappeared taking the form of a conspiracy to kill the preacher. But Saul was protected by his friends. In fact this lesson gives us the whole life of Paul after his conversion in epitome.

The Lesson Taught

Paul preaching, persecuted, protected, epitomizes the whole life of Paul, and suggests the teaching points of this lesson.

Preaching

It would be well for much of the preaching of the twentieth century if it could return to the idea of proclamation. Paul began his preaching ministry by proclaiming that Jesus is the Son of God. This was his message to the Jews because they contended that Jesus was not the Son of God and the Messiah. By his conversion Paul had been convinced of the truth that Jesus is the Christ, crucified but raised from the dead, and declared to be the Son of God with power, according to the spirit of holiness, by the resurrection from the dead. (Rom. 1:4.) His later message to the Gentiles was adapted to their needs. He proclaimed to them the living God because they were worshippers of dead idols; he proclaimed to them a holy God thus arousing their conscience because they were dead in trespasses and sins; he preached to them a loving God made known in Jesus Christ in whom God was reconciling the world to himself because they needed an atonement. But Paul's message to the Jews was Jesus the Christ. His proclamation was backed up with proof. He confounded the Jews of Damascus by proving that Jesus is the Christ. Basing his proof upon the Scriptures of the Old Testament he corroborated it by his own wonderful experience. This is the best kind of preaching. In fact nothing else is preaching. The Scriptures must be incarnated in Christian experience if they are to live. The scribes proved to Herod from the Scriptures that the Christ was to be born in Bethlehem; but the scribes were not preachers and never could be, because the truth of the scriptures had not been translated by them into conviction and passion and vital experience. Paul's preaching to the Jews was testimony based upon personal experience and burning with the passion of a great conviction. A teacher may be pardoned for being academic, but a preacher, never. The preacher must be a flaming torch burning himself out in order that he may bring light to all who sit in darkness and the shadow of death.

Persecuted

Real preaching always results in either persuasion or persecution or both. It never results in indifference. There is something seriously wrong with preaching that is treated with indifference. Preaching should be so positive, direct, personal that the hearers would either accept or reject the message. Paul's first preaching was so earnest, logical, personal and direct his hearers were moved to kill him. He could well appreciate their spirit and motive because he had been one of them only a short time before. But he did not intend to fall into their hands if he could escape. So while they watched the gates day and night to intercept him if he should attempt to leave the city, he with the help of his friends was lowered in a basket over the wall. The preacher must never court persecution; if it comes he must use all strategy to escape from it without relinquishing his principles; but if there is no escape he must be brave and strong and sweet under it. There came a time in Paul's life when there was no basket handy, and he was compelled to meet his Lystra and Philippi and Jerusalem and Rome; but he was never happier or more helpful to his converts than when he was in bonds for Christ.

Protected

Paul had a hard time getting started because not only did the Jews conspire to kill him but the leaders of the church in Jerusalem were suspicious of him. When he tried to get into the inner circle he found the door shut in his face. What his feelings were we must imagine. Certainly he could not complain because he had brought it upon himself by his persecution of believers. It is hard for a man to get away from his old life even after his conversion. The shadow of it remains a long time. The converted criminal must not lay it up against society if he is not received with open arms. The Jerusalem disciples are not to be blamed for being afraid of Saul. Their fears were reasonable. It is always a relief, however, to find a Barnabas who is unafraid. No wonder Paul and Barnabas became fast friends and made the first missionary journey together. Of course Paul would have gone on independent of the church at Jerusalem because he did not have much in common with the narrowness of their spirit; but it was well that he should have an opportunity to give his testimony in the city where his work as a persecutor had begun and where he was well known. Barnabas was the protector of Paul at a time when he needed a friend. Ananias in Damascus and Barnabas in Jerusalem did not do a spectacularly brave deed when they introduced Paul to the society of believers in Christ; but it took courage of a high order to risk their reputation and possibly their lives with a persecutor who had no other credentials to their confidence than his own testimony that he had seen Jesus and had accepted him as the Christ. Let us not forget when we think of Paul's incomparable contribution to Christianity that the contribution would not have been made without Ananias of Damascus and Barnabas of Cyprus and the men who held the rope when Paul escaped from the city in a basket. Let us give due credit to the obscure auxiliary agencies of life.

Beginning at the Beginning

BY S. L. ROBERTS

The finished product of all our religious educational efforts is not an institution, a "saved" soul, a doctrine or a saint in glory, but a full grown man or woman who can lift more than his own load in Christian living and Christian work. The more he can do beyond his own religious needs the better specimen he is and the more certain will he fit in to every right relationship in this world and have an abundant entrance into the glories and rewards in the world to come.

How are such people who are both willing and capable not only to bear their own burden but also to help others in every possible way, produced? Not suddenly, though great crises and sudden transformations may mark their career, not without effort both on their part and on the part of others, not in a spiritual vacuum, but in human relations and institutions, not apart from the grace of God, but as the highest expression of his grace in the individual life.

Some months ago while making observations in a number of Baptist churches in order to give intelligent advice to guide their church school work, the observer was attracted by the frequent recurrence of the same family moves in different departments of church work in each of the churches studied. This aroused curiosity and a detailed study of the relation of Christian workers to family and home life was made. The study covered all types of Baptist churches in all kinds of places and all people doing regular church work in each church studied were included.

The study yielded the following interesting results:

Total number of individual workers .....	3,019
Isolated individuals (One only from a house) .....	663-21.3%

The Chimney Corner

Bits of Nonsense

"A Little Nonsense Now and Then Is Relished By The Wisest Men"—

AT LEAST, so it seems, judging by some of the letters which have been reaching the Chimney Corner recently! One naturally thinks of Baptist men as serious folk, yet here they are, writing in approval of poems such as the one in April in which every stanza dismally ended: "Some little bug will get you some day." And in the kindness of their grateful hearts, they have even contributed some of their favorites in similar vein, which you are herewith invited to share as a bit of light summer reading:—

A Boy's Composition on "Breathing"

Breathing is made of air. We breathe with our lungs, our lights, our livers and our skin—if it's not all stopped up with powder. It it wasn't for our breath we would die when we slept.

Our breath keeps the life agoing through the nose when we are asleep. Our noses were made for breath and our mouths for food and to talk with.

Women that stop in a room all day should not breathe. They should wait till they go out of doors.

People in a room make bad, foul, unholy some air. They make carbonic. Carbonic is poisoner than a mad dog. A heap of soldiers was in a black hole in India and a carbonic got into the hole and killed nearly every one before morning.

Girls and women kill the breath with corsets that squeeze the diagram. Girls can't holler or run like boys because their diagrams is squeezed too much. If I was a girl I'd wish I was a boy, so I could run and holler and breathe lots of air and have bright eyes and rosy cheeks, a good appetite and a good diagram.

"Give me air or give me death!"—"Good Health" Magazine.)

A Foursome

Why is a lover like a caller?

- (1) He comes to a door. (adore).
- (2) He gives the bell(e) a ring.
- (3) He gives the maid his name.
- (4) If he doesn't find her out, she takes him in!

She Was From Missouri

Once an elderly lady was being shown over Nelson's ship, the Victory. As the party approached the spot where Nelson met his death, the attendant pointed to the brass plate fixed in the deck and said, "There is where Nelson fell." "No wonder," said the old lady, "I nearly tripped over that thing myself."

This department is conducted by Miss Margaret T. Applegarth. Communications to her may be addressed in care of THE BAPTIST.

"O Zion (Ill.) Haste!"

An after-dinner speech should be like a modern skirt; short enough to be interesting, long enough to cover the subject.

If the Shoe Pinches

"No," said the old man sternly, "I will not do it! Never have I sold anything by false representation, and I will not begin now. It is an inferior grade of shoe, of an uncomfortable design, and I will never pass it off as anything better. Mark it 'A Shoe Fit for a Queen' and put it in the window. A queen does so little walking."

Accept No Substitutes

"You're a rather young man to be left in charge of a drug store," said the fussy old gentleman. "Have you any diploma?"

"Why-er-no," replied the shopman, "but we have a preparation of our own that's just as good."

Two Plus Two Equals Ten

PROBABLY as soon as you heard the title of this story you began smiling all over your face. "Oh but two plus two doesn't equal ten at all! It couldn't since it always, always equals four. I guess I know my arithmetic tables."

Well, you do, of course. Yet just this once two plus two really did equal ten, as you will now hear.

For once upon a time there were two little Sunbonnets under a bush. And under the Sunbonnets were two little girls, which is all that sunbonnets are good for, anyway—to cover little girls, and overhear their secrets.

Now one little Sunbonnet girl was saying: "All I know is, that this man wrote it down in black and white that if every church member invited someone else to join their church this year, then every single person in the whole United States would be going to church before the year was over. So there!"

Sunbonnet number two was quiet for a while, then said very solemnly: "Mary Ann, if that's true, we haven't a minute to lose, for it's September now, and we've only got one, two, three, four months left before January. Our living in the country makes it awfully hard to find anybody to ask, people who aren't church members seem terribly scarce around here. I don't know how to begin, do you?"

Mary Ann wrinkled her nose in doubt. "Well, Susan Brown, if they won't come to church, we'll have to carry the church to them!"

"What? Steeple and all? Why? Mary Ann, you're crazy!"

"No, I'm not, for it isn't the outside of a church that matters, it's what goes on inside that God sees. Now why couldn't we carry Sunday school to the Homer twins, for instance?"

"Oh, you wouldn't dare go there," cried Susan, turning pale, "why the farmers down at the postoffice say that Ephriam Homer swears perfectly terribly and doesn't know a thing about running a farm. And that Mrs. Homer is the strangest person, who lets the children run wild, and she even slammed the door in the pastor's face when he went to call. We just couldn't begin on them, Mary Ann!"

"Susie, it's the very best place in the world to begin, I'm surprised we didn't think of it sooner. Just think how surprised the pastor will be when we bring a twin apiece to church with us."

And he was surprised, you may be sure! Because it was not only Molly and Polly, the twins, who came, but also Mr. Ephriam Homer, and Mrs. Ephriam Homer, Horace and Morris, their oldest sons, and Ruben and Ruth, the in-between children—all eight of them came trooping into church one December Sunday, stamping the snow off their shoes.

The pastor stared and stared. And the congregation stared and stared. But

Mary Ann whispered to Susan: "Two plus two usually makes four, but you and I have made it ten!"

So you must be wondering what they did back in September when they started their new little plan. It was really too simple for words, for they just went to the Homer's farm and swung on the broken gate calling to the twins: "Hello, Molly! Hello, Polly! We know an awfully nice game to play."

"Come in and play it," the twins called back, in a cheerful duet.

So they went in.

And they all played Sunday school. This is the way they did it:—They picked nasturtiums for the scholars: you can see for yourself how very much like sunbonnets the little flowers look! The nasturtiums sat in rows with a Mr. Astor to be superintendent and a Miss Peony to teach the girls' class. Mr. Aster announced what hymns to sing. Molly and Polly did not know a single hymn when

Wildflowers

BY MARY JANE HEITMAN

*I went into the garden
To hear the Larkspur sing,
But the wild beasts I saw there
Would frighten even a king!
The sly Foxgloves were lurking
About the gentle Phlox,
And tawny Tiger Lilies
Crouched among the rocks.
Bold Dandelions were stalking
Out of their leafy den,
And fiery, fierce Snapdragons
Lay in wait for men.
I was so very frightened,
And longed for mother mine,
So I climbed Jacob's Ladder,
And blew the Trumpet Vine!*

they started to play, but because Mr. Aster had to teach the words to his nasturtium scholars, Molly and Polly couldn't help learning too. They learned golden texts in the same way. And Bible stories. Yet it was all playtimes. The offering was interesting, too, for each nasturtium laid the pedal of a golden glow flower on the collection plate (a green leaf of course). But Molly said: "Now where will all that money go?"

So Mary and Ann hurried over and engaged a certain little yellow Miss Chrysanthemum to speak. A Miss Chrysanthemum supposedly from Japan, of course, whose name in Japanese is Kiku San. Mary Ann helped her to bow with true Japanese politeness, then she told the nasturtium scholars about her pretty home in far-away Japan where everyone worshipped idols until a Miss Missionary came to tell them about the real God. She thanked each and every nasturtium for giving their golden glow to send Miss Missionary to her. Which was the clever way that Molly and Polly learned about missions and idols and God.

"Come and play again, won't you?"

they begged wistfully when it was time to stop. And Mary Ann and Susan promised to come.

Again and again they came; then one day Polly and Molly said to their mother: "Oh ma, won't you scrub us up on Sunday, and let us go to church?"

"Church?" gasped Mrs. Homer, "why, whatever put that notion in your heads when there hasn't been a Homer inside a church for years and years? And what's more, there ain't going to be one now, either, so quit your begging."

So they stopped begging, but they kept on playing. You see, Mary Ann and Susan were bringing the church to them. They played make-believe church social and make-believe church suppers, and prayer meetings, missionary meetings, Christian Endeavor, Sunday school,—everything. Not a single church thing was left out, until by and by Polly made a splendid pretend-teacher, and Molly made a wonderful make-believe missionary.

"We've filled them full to the brim of church," laughed Mary Ann.

"And they're just crazy to go to a really-truly church. They love it so much sight unseen, that they're curious to come and see it for themselves. I'm sure they'll be allowed to come soon."

And you already know how they did come, not only Molly and Polly but all the other Homers who never, never, never went to church—until now. No wonder everybody stared. Then when the service was over everybody was especially friendly, and Mrs. Homer told the pastor she was sorry she had slammed the door in his face. Would he please forgive, and come again.

He did! The very next day, in his little sleigh, and the sleigh-bells jingled with extra jingles because it was going to be such a pleasant errand.

Yet you know, and I know, that this might never have happened if two little Sunbonnets had not planned a plan way back one September afternoon. So all I have to say to you now is: Why don't YOU play church yourself sometimes, for maybe you can carry your church to a family that has forgotten all about it!

Dear Young Reserves:

There are two more names for our Home Gardeners—Alice Greyson and Avery Kidder, both from Iowa. Do you suppose it is because the Northern Baptist Convention is meeting in Des Moines, Iowa, that they are stirred up to raise vegetables for missionary money? Next week watch for a New Price Contest to keep you busy all summer, I hope. Peggy is having a little vacation, as you may have noticed—not on a canal boat this time. (I suppose you still remember her "Log of The Flying Pig," don't you?) She will write you some stories later on.

Wishing each of you a wonderful summer,

Your friend,
Margaret T. Applegarth.

THE PERIL OF MATERIALISM

1 John 2:15-17

By C. T. HOLMAN

"Ill fares the land, to hastening ills a prey,
Where wealth accumulates, and men decay."

1. What is materialism? The Bible speaks of two kinds of fools;—one says there is no God, "The fool hath said in his heart there is no God." The other acts as if there were none. To the one who says to his soul, "Soul, thou hast much goods laid up for many years, take thine ease, eat, drink, and be merry," God says, "Thou fool!" The second fool is your typical materialist, dominated by the lust of the flesh, the lust of the eye, and the pride of life, and the love of the Father is not in him. "The love of the world," the placing of a higher value on "the things that are seen" and "are temporal" than on "the things that are not seen" and "are eternal," living as if the enjoyment of pleasure, the exercise of power, and the accumulation of riches were the true ends of life, is what we mean by materialism.

Notice that it is the "lust" of the flesh, the "lust" of the eyes, and the "pride" of life, that the apostle forbids. This earth is not evil, but to use it merely for selfish gratification is.

2. What is the peril of materialism?

The first peril is that is the love of the world we shall lose our love of the Father.—"if any man love the world the love of the Father is not in Him." We are so constituted that we must love something. The choice is not between love and not-love, but between a higher and lower affection, and the tragedy of many a life is that of misplaced love. Those who give their hearts to the world will learn the transiency and hollowness of the delights it offers; while those who love the Father will find their lives wonderfully enriched, beautified, and satisfied.

And the second peril lies in this very "transiency of all that which 'the world' typifies,—'The world passes away, and the lust thereof.'" The materialist must witness every treasured possession slip away from him some time, and the enjoyment of it even sooner than the treasure itself.

3. How shall the peril of materialism be overcome? In the first place, "by setting our hearts on things above." While the world and the lust of it passes, "he that doeth the will of God abideth forever." Nothing in this world is permanent save Christian life and character. And notice, it is he that doeth the will of God—for Christian life is not feeling, nor speculating; it is action—; and it is he that doeth, the doer rather than the deed, that abideth forever.

This page is for all Baptist young people's organizations. Send news items on activities, organizations, plans and methods of work for publication in THE BAPTIST to James Asa White, General Secretary, 125 N. Wabash Ave., Chicago.

And secondly, the peril of materialism, the love of the world, will be overcome by the love of the Father. "The expulsive power of a new affection" will drive out the lower love.

"Happy the people who are in such a case,

Happy the nation whose God is the Lord."

The Spirit of the Northern Baptist Convention

By JOSHUA GRAVETT

In the quiet of my study I have tried to feel the spirit and hear the voice of the remarkable gatherings at Des Moines. Four words seem to best describe what the convention and its pre-meetings say to me.

Conviction. The outstanding feature was the message, heard in lobbies of hotels, in vestibules of the Coliseum, in the "show of hands" or the stentorian "Aye" on "Nay," that our Baptist folk believe that there is a body of truth held by our churches and that the churches believe that they, not so-called leaders or societies, are pillars of the faith. I often thought in the meetings of Paul's words about certain prominent brethren at Jerusalem who "seemed to be pillars." The word spells healthy growth to our denomination.

Illumination. The evangelistic conferences, the precious services when our young people going out under our Foreign and Home Societies eloquently testified to their willingness to carry the faith we hold, that the world might know and be saved by the Savior we love, to earth's darkest fields, told us of eyes opened to see spiritual harvest fields.

Patience. Whilst it was admitted that some in our fold are teaching things out of harmony with our historic Biblical faith, it was made plain that it was the will of the denomination that such should be lovingly disciplined to possible correction by magnifying of things surely believed among us. Elimination by restoration is preferable to excision. Paul says it takes omnipotence to make us patient. We believe God delivered in some trying situations.

Determination. Our people will not permit differences of views concerning faith and policy to keep them from zealous endeavors to "carry on." I predict that the coming year will reveal a "steadfast, unmovable" attitude toward imperative faith, and a resultant "abounding in the work of the Lord," because we know that "our labor is not in vain in the Lord."

Some Impressions of the Convention

By CHARLES A. FULTON

I had the pleasure of being present at almost every session of the convention, as well as at the morning and afternoon sessions of the Conference of Fundamentals. My impressions were so many and so varied that it is not easy to state them briefly and at the same time in a form that will adequately sum them up.

It is all too evident that there are serious divisions in the body of the convention. What is still more to be regretted, there is mutual distrust. There is also the danger that each side to the controversy may lose sight of the great objects for which we come together and may make partisan victory its immediate goal. On the other hand, this grew upon me as we passed through session after session—that we are engaged in a great work which is going forward with more of push and power than ever before. The scenes connected with the Women's Jubilee brought this home to us; there was a splendid unity in service manifest among those who would no doubt differ much in their intellectual conceptions.

The same thought was borne in upon me as I witnessed the presentation and consecration of the new recruits for home and foreign service, as I heard the addresses of those who had come back to us from the home and foreign fields, and as I listened to the reports from the various missionary organizations and from the Board of Promotion and the committee on the Five Year Program.

Certainly the work in which we are engaged is of supreme importance, and certainly the blessing of God is accompanying our labors.

The careful report upon our schools, and the appearance of the numerous recent graduates of these schools among the missionary recruits made it quite evident that many of the fears which had been expressed concerning the schools were without any adequate foundation. Moreover some of the leaders who had been most vigorously assailed had evidently been leading us on diligently in the work to which we are committed.

Taking note of these things, the conviction grew upon me that the work in which we were engaged was so great and so worth while that neither God nor those who love him would suffer it to be brought to an end nor greatly hindered by unhappy division of our forces.

I have seen the Susquehanna River with its broad and shallow stream in northern Pennsylvania broken by the rocks into turbulent streamlets; I have seen this same river flowing in deep and tranquil majesty to join the bay and thus make connection with the sea. The feeling grew upon me that our course would be like that as we moved onward to fulfill God's high and holy purpose.

IN each state the director of promotion is an agent of THE BAPTIST. Unless some other person has been designated, as in a number of states, news items intended for publication should be sent to him. This does not deny the privilege always belonging to churches of sending matter direct to the office. In either case condense your material. Unless reporting some unusual event, make no item longer than six or seven printed lines. You can save our blue pencil.

Atlantic Coast

MAINE

CAMDEN recently entertained the Maine Baptist Convention with an attendance of about 500, the largest in the history of the convention. On the Sunday following some unknown donor placed in the hands of Pastor Griffith, in consideration of the excellent entertainment served by the church to the convention, a note for $1000 to apply on the church debt.

AT THE FRENCH BAPTIST CHURCH a military funeral was held when the body of Forrest Perry, son of Mr. and Mrs. Marshall Perry was brought home from France. Young Perry was an ardent Christian and was among the first to enlist. Pastor H. J. Tetreault spoke eloquently and tenderly of the life that had been given. This church sent thirteen men into the service. Perry was the only one who made the supreme sacrifice.

BETHANY CHURCH, Skowhegan, is making steady progress. Pastor George Merriam is one of those ministers whose pastorates however long, show always increasing fruitfulness and wider recognition. His salary has recently been increased $300. He renders service to a wide area in its home joys and its home sorrows.

Hebron Academy Commencement

The 117th commencement program of Hebron Academy, Hebron, Maine, was of unusual interest this year. The prize debate Saturday evening, June 18, the sermons Sunday, Class Day exercises Monday, the Monday evening entertainment, the graduating exercises Tuesday, all upheld Hebron's tradition and high standard.

Principal Sargent, who suffered a paralytic shock last January, was not able to be present. For thirty-five years he has devoted his life to the work of Hebron Academy.

President Stanley announced at the Alumni dinner that the trustees of the Academy had elected Dr. Sargent principal emeritus with a salary that would be adequate for his needs, also to grant him the use of a house, and to meet any special emergencies that might arise in his case. The trustees felt that since Dr. Sargent had given such self-denying, heroic and successful service to the academy for thirty-five years, it was due him to be cared for by the academy without embarrassment to himself or Mrs. Sargent. Dr. Sargent's monument is not merely the buildings that have been erected by him, it is a living monument in the men and women whom he has inspired to noble and Christian ideals of life.

Dr. and Mrs. Sargent will occupy the part of the John D. Long cottage, made vacant by the removal of Prof. and Mrs. Marriner.

Prof. Marriner, for five years the head of the English department, retires from teaching to go into business. He has accepted an important position with Ginn & Company. His loss to the academy is greatly to be regretted.

It is interesting to note that the principal-elect, Mr. J. D. Howlett of Medford, Mass., is a Baptist, a man of deep piety and pronounced Christian convictions. It is safe to predict that the high ideals of Christian education, for which Hebron Academy has stood in the past, will be fully upheld under Mr. Howlett's guidance.

MASSACHUSETTS

THE FIRST CHURCH, PITTSFIELD, is rejoicing at the triumphant conclusion of a campaign for $150,000 to be used towards a much needed new building. The undertaking was in anticipation of the church's one hundred-fiftieth anniversary which will be observed next year. The church was fortunate in having the leadership of Dr. F. H. Divine and responding loyally made possible this victory. His guidance was characterized by tact and spiritual power. With the sale of the present site and including the funds now pledged, the church would have about $300,000 for the new edifice in a more favorable location. This church, as is its wont, sent its pastor, Rev. Maurice A. Levy, to the Northern Baptist Convention at Des Moines.

HAROLD L. WILSON, that live young Baptist layman from West Somerville, who has so efficiently led our "Massachusetts Baptist Minutemen," has been appointed by the U. S. Government, Director of prohibition in the state. With Harold on the job there will be something doing in Prohibition.

UNDER THE LEADERSHIP of our State Director Reid an extended evangelistic movement in the churches will be inaugurated in the fall. The plan is to back the pastors and fire up the people for evangelism and efficiency.

CONNECTICUT

CULVER RAYMOND BENJAMIN, graduate of McMinnville College and of Yale Divinity School and religious work secretary of the New Haven Y. M. C. A., was ordained at the First Church, New Haven, June 13.

WESTERN PENNSYLVANIA

MR. HENRY ERICKSON of the Swedish Church, McKeesport, appeared before a meeting of the Permanent Council last Monday at the Sandusky Street Church and was examined by that body with a view to determining his fitness for ordination to the gospel ministry. Mr. Erickson is a young man of unmistakable gifts who has largely worked his own way through college and seminary. He received the unanimous recommendation of the council. After attending the meeting of the N. B. C. at Des Moines, he will sail on July 15 for the Belgian Congo.

BRADDOCK CHURCH, Rev. W. G. Carl, supply, reports payment of $300 on church debt leaving only $950.

FOUR WERE BAPTIZED at a recent Sunday night service at the Knoxville church by Pastor F. W. Stanton. The church is already planning for an evangelistic campaign in the fall.

OHIO

ZANESVILLE, FIRST, celebrated its centennial anniversary during the week of June 12-19.

Denison University Increases Assets

Gifts to Denison University amounting in the aggregate to $791,000 were announced by President Clark W. Chamberlain at the Commencement Exercises on Wednesday, June 12, Granville. Ninety-seven bachelor's degrees were conferred, in addition to five Conservatory diplomas, three master's degrees, and the honorary degree of Doctor of Laws, the recipient of which was Dr. William E. Castle, '89, professor of Zoology in Harvard University, an alumnus of Denison and speaker of the day.

The degree of Master of Arts was conferred on Rowland A. Sheets, instructor in the Mathematics department, and on Itsuji Kawai, who holds a similar degree from the Imperial University of Tokyo. The degree of Master of Science was conferred on Dwight M. Moore.

President Chamberlain announced the following changes in the faculty for next year: Raymond N. Crawford of Judson College appointed to be assistant professor of English; J. H. Nunemaker of Colgate University appointed to be instructor in Modern Languages; Alice Rosemand appointed to be instructor in Modern Languages; Herschel B. Lemon instructor in Mathematics; Evelyn Gathcart of Wellesley College instructor in Biology and Physical Education; Frederick W. Anderson of Bowdoin College, grandson of former President Anderson, instructor in English; Frederick G. Detweiler promoted from associate professor to professor of Bible; Annie M. McNeil promoted from assistant to associate professor of English; Rowland A. Sheets promoted from instructor to assistant professor of Mathematics.

The following gifts to the University were then announced by the President: from the General Education Board, for general expenses, the second of three yearly gifts of $20,000; Board of Education, Northern Baptist Convention, $120,000; Mrs. Y. R. Harris, Manlius, N. Y., to Shepardson College, in appreciation of instruction received by her daughter, $1,000; Col. E. A. Deeds Fund, additions during the year, $250,000; total received during the year, $391,000. The Col. Deeds Fund now amounts to $500,000. In addition to these gifts, the $400,000 offered by the General Education Board on condition that the University raise through its friends and alumni $800,000 is now available, pledges to the Interchurch World Movement being counted by the Board. Money now paid in makes possible collection pro rata of $200,000. The grand total for the year is $791,000.

KANSAS

REV. J. W. BAYLES of Salina has resigned to accept the pastorate of the Westside Church, Wichita. The change will be made about the first of August. Mr. Bayles has been at Salina something more than two years, and has done a constructive work.

REV. J. FRANK MOORE of Paola is leading his people in extensive improvements on their church building. They are constructing a basement under the entire building, and will soon have it completed.

PASTOR W. W. SEARCY of Olathe is just now entering upon the fifth year of his work. The church has had a steady growth in all departments during that time. About two years ago the country church in the Eureka community about eight miles out was merged with the Olathe Church with the understanding that the Sunday school would be kept up and occasional services held at the country point. The plan seems to be working nicely. On July 10 an all day service will be held with the Eureka branch of the work. Pastor Searcy and wife were sent to the Northern Baptist Convention at the charges of the church.

CHURCH VACATION SCHOOLS in the state are progressing nicely. The school at Morrill has an enrollment of 114; Wichita First Church, 208; Topeka, 124; Ottawa, 333. Several others will be conducted in July and August.

MICHIGAN

PASTOR L. B. GRICE of the First Church, Marcellus, a graduate of Hillsdale College, was ordained to the ministry, June 14.

PASTOR-ELECT JAMES G. STEWART of Howard City was ordained June 25. He is a graduate of Moody Bible Institute and pursued special study in the Northern Baptist Theological Seminary.

THE DANISH TENT is now being used on the Walworth field. Rev. C. H. Bolvig, colporteur missionary, and Rev. J. R. Brigger of Tyler are conducting the meetings. Already there is much interest, and they have hopes of a large ingathering.

THE REPORTS RECEIVED from most of the English-speaking churches in the state indicate that there has been about 50 per cent increase in the number of baptisms last year. Reports are incomplete as yet, but this number is sure and will probably be increased.

QUINCY CHURCH has a boys' class of thirty members, ranging ages from ten to fourteen. They are cutting a figure in athletics under the leadership of the pastor. HERE'S THE BUNCH AT QUINCY, MICH.

OVID congregations are larger than usual, the Sunday school is growing steadily (107 present May 15), finances are in fine condition. Baptized twenty-three since the first of February. The church entertained the Shiawassee association June 8 and 9.

LANSING, FIRST.—When allotted $97,600 there was subscribed $100,300. Before the end of the first year there has been paid in more than $25,000. Besides funds are coming in on the Baptist community building fund for the First church and for improvement in buildings for the two branch church organizations, Olivet and North churches. First church is now ready to contribute $1000 a year from her current expense funds for the purpose of aiding to provide a pastor for each of those churches. In the last eleven months 144 members have come into First church and the two branch churches, of which number 70 came by baptism. Due largely to the work of the associate pastor, Donald T. Grey, thirty-seven have been baptized from the two branch churches this winter. Easter Sunday at the morning service the church and school were combined. Fully 1500 people packed our auditorium to the limit. The pastor, Clarence W. Kemper, baptized twenty-six recent followers of the Master. Among these were his oldest child and in the same group recently received were two children of our missionaries to China, Dr. and Mrs. C. H. Barlow who are now at home on furlough. In the afternoon in the same building there were baptismal services of the Olivet, North and First German churches.

Central Association B. Y. P. U.

The fourth annual convention of the Central Association B. Y. P. U. was held in Owatonna, April 29, 30 and May 1.

There were over one hundred delegates representing Austin, Blooming Prairie, Lansing, Brownsdale, Clarks Grove, Albert Lea, Alden, Owatonna, Clinton Falls, Faribault, Morristown, Waterville, and Northfield.

Rev. R. A. Jensen of Mankato gave a splendid address on "The Dignity of Service." Dr. F. A. Agar gave three very fine addresses as follows: "The One Who Abused His Trusteeship," "Slaying the Lion," "The High Cost of Loving." Rev. J. McFarlane of Austin gave a very good address on "Personal Evangelism."

R. N. Crawford, a missionary from Rangoon, Burma, gave a missionary address, telling about his work among the Burmese. Rev. A. J. Hansen, state director of religious education, gave several very fine talks.

The Lake Harriet Juniors with their leader, Miss Mabel Ravey, were present during the convention and added much to the interest and enthusiasm of the convention.

Officers for years 1921-1922: Pres., Miss Marian Balch, Faribault; vice-pres., Mr. Fred Hauser, Owatonna; sec., Mr. Fred Ebersole, Northfield; treas., Mr. Lester Peck, Austin. Chairmen: daily Bible-reading, Miss Aldine Philbrook, Albert Lea; titling, Miss Frances Dies, Faribault; junior supt., Miss Grace Mahachek, Austin; standard of excellence, Miss Genevieve Morrison, Clinton Falls; educational, Miss Fern Lyle, Owatonna. ### NORTHERN CALIFORNIA

DAILY VACATION BIBLE SCHOOLS are in session in the following churches: in San Francisco at Central Church and the Chinese Church; in Oakland at Eighty-fifth Ave. (colored), at Twenty-third Ave., Bethany, Golden Gate, Tenth Ave., First Church, Elmhurst, Melrose; in Berkeley at First Church; at Tulare, Visalia, Orland, Albany and at the Chinese Mission, Sacramento—a total of sixteen schools, against ten of last year.

IN FEBRUARY A CHURCH was organized at Chowchilla, with a membership of fifty-nine. On Sunday, June 5, twenty-five new members were added to the church, with a prospect of as many more in the near future.

CHOWCHILLA is one of the many new towns of Northern California, that are in need of churches being organized if they are to be possessed for Christ.

AT LAKEPORT, under the leadership of Paul L. Offenbiser, a student from the Berkeley Baptist Divinity School, the congregations have more than trebled in seven weeks, and the Sunday school has doubled in attendance.

THE FIRST CHURCH of Turlock, Rev. C. R. Eastman, Pastor, is having Sunday evening congregations that tax the seating capacity of the auditorium, and necessitate the use of every available chair in the building. The Bible school has outgrown the building, and two grammar school buildings are being used to relieve the overcrowded conditions.

operative relationship. The idea had to be implanted and a favorable state of mind created.

"2. It has united in effective co-operation thirty-one evangelical denominations which had previously enjoyed little fellowship or association and no common vehicle for action or expression. These bodies number about 150,000 churches and nearly 20,000,000 communicant members.

"3. It has promoted general fellowship and friendship among the Protestant bodies forming its constituency, bringing their leaders into personal acquaintance and relations of sympathetic understanding, thus exercising an immeasurable influence upon the denominational spirit and life, making for true Christian fraternity.

"4. There has been developed a democratic association of the evangelical churches for co-operative purposes, without encroaching upon the autonomy of any constituent member or lessening denominational loyalty.

"5. It has given to the denominations a medium of expression through which they can voice their convictions regarding moral and religious questions when occasion demands. The value of this cannot be overestimated. When a united Protestantism has a message for the nation and the world, it can command a hearing which no denomination speaking singly can secure.

"6. Through its Commissions it has banded together in co-operation the denominational Commissions where these existed, as in the realms of Evangelism, Social Service, Temperance, Christian Education, etc. Beyond these it has promoted the common welfare through its Commissions on Interracial Relations, International Justice and Good Will, and others. Along all these lines it has enabled the churches of Christ to do together what it would have been impossible for them to do apart, as separate denominations.

"7. By the fact of its existence and its past accomplishments in co-operation, the Federal Council was able to render great service to the Government when emergency came—a service freely acknowledged by those in authority. When war was declared the Federal Council inaugurated the General War-Time Commission of the Churches, which came to the support of the nation, not only in connection with the army and the navy, but in presenting to the people the moral aims of the war.

"To the Federal Council, as representing the churches, was given the responsibility of supplying Protestant chaplains to the army and the navy, and to its influence and effort was due the securing for chaplains their proper recognition and opportunity.

"The volumes issued by the General War-Time Commission show the character and the amount of this service to the nation. Without such a body as the Federal Council it would have been impossible for the churches to have proved themselves so invaluable to the country.

"The need of watch-care at the Capital of the nation is evident. Questions constantly arise requiring prompt attention and action, so that the interests of the churches need to be represented there, not by a lobby, but by thoughtful consultation and contact. Representatives of the Government have frequently expressed their appreciation of an opportunity to learn the mind of the representatives of the churches on affairs of moral concern to the nation.

"8. The Federal Council has brought together into a co-operative relationship with it and with each other, agencies such as the Foreign Missions Conference, the Home Missions Council, women's organizations for Home and Foreign Missions, the Sunday School Council of Evangelical Denominations and the Council of Church Boards of Education, thus making it possible to plan together, to avoid duplication, and to render mutually helpful service.

"Such work cannot be fully tabulated. It is only necessary to compare the present relations of the denominations with that of a quarter of a century ago to realize that great advance has been made, and the Federal Council has been a very large factor in that advance.

"Certain ideals which seem to us eminently desirable have not yet been fully attained. We believe that the denominational bodies constituting the Federal Council should have complete financial and administrative control, which includes the desirability of having all financial contributions to the work of the Federal Council denominational, not individual. If this means a delimitation of the Council's field of activity, such a result might not be an unmixed evil. It is a time to study economy and retrenchment. There should be no undertaking of tasks already being done by other recognized interdenominational agencies. There must be no ambition to spend huge sums of money. All departments should be entirely responsible to the duly authorized representatives of the churches, not to individual contributors, however generous and devoted.

"If there is to be actual co-operation there must be continually close and genuine contact with the denominations, contact not nominal but real. We have had warning enough. We must guard against the Super-church. The Council should not undertake administrative functions save where it has been charged to do so by much more than a majority vote of the denominations represented, and it should be understood that each denomination has the opportunity to register its protest, even to the extent of withdrawing its co-operative relations, at any time it deems such withdrawal advisable and warranted. We believe that we are voicing the convictions of many beyond our own denominational constituency when we say that the greatest usefulness of the Federal Council is dependent upon the most complete and vital relationship with the denominations which constitute its membership.

"We have no right to urge these considerations unless we are much more generous in our financial support of the Federal Council than we have been heretofore. For some years the Northern Baptist Convention made an appropriation of $1,200 to the work of the Federal Council. Last year the appropriation was raised to $2,500, still a pittance compared with the amount required as our share of adequate denominational support. This year a strong effort is being made by authorization of the Quadrennial Conference of the Federal Council to secure from the denominational bodies such amounts as will reach or approximate the complete financing of the Council by such denominational bodies.

"In view of the considerations herein urged your Committee recommends:

"1. That the spirit and practice of interdenominational co-operation in the field of Foreign Missions, Home Missions, the Sunday School, Education, etc., be continued and strengthened, always reserving to ourselves and to our brethren everywhere the unimpaired right to witness to the truth as we understand it, without any embarrassment whatever. The method and extent of participation must be left largely to the local churches in their individual communities, and to the Societies where they are serving, in community, state, national or other fields. It is imperative that wise statesmanship, as well as the spirit of brotherhood in a common task, shall characterize all such participation by local churches and by denominational Societies.

Thirty Federal Council Delegates

"2. That thirty delegates to the Federal Council be elected by the Convention upon nomination of the nominating committee of the Convention, the term of office to be one year, and that no substitution be made in this list during the year save by the Executive Committee, acting for the Convention.

"3. That on the condition that appropriations, such as are asked, are made by other denominational bodies from which relatively large support must come, we recommend to the Northern Baptist Convention for recommendation to the Convention, an appropriation to the Federal Council of Churches of an amount not to exceed $35,000 for the fiscal year of 1921-1922, the sum of $35,000 being the full amount asked of us as our share of the amount necessary fully to finance the Federal Council by the constituent denominational bodies.

"4. That the determination of the definite amount of the appropriation be left to the Administrative Committee of the General Board of Promotion, with the approval of the Finance Committee of the Convention, with the instruction of this Convention that careful scrutiny be first made to ascertain whether work undertaken by the Federal Council overlaps that undertaken by any other interdenominational agency, and with the further instruction that absolute guarantee be furnished, under legal counsel, that the financial responsibility of the Northern Baptist Convention to the financial obligations of the Federal Council shall not exceed the amount of our appropriation to the work of the Council.

"Our action in future years will naturally be determined by the work done by and through the Federal Council, and by the progress made toward the attainment of the ideals as set forth in this report. We are so fully convinced of the potentiality of this agency for wise and effective co-operative service that we would manifest our faith by our works."

Various conferences were held on Monday afternoon. That on Boys' Work issued the following statement:

"We believe that it is a high duty of our Churches to support every wholesome activity in local, community and world circles designed to foster the full and rounded development of our boys.

"We believe in Scouting as a wholesome program under this characterization and that its training and character influences should be made available for every lad.

Boys and Camp Oswegatchie

"We believe in the men who compose the Staff at National Scout Headquarters as competent leaders, with vision and consecration, worthy of our loyal support.

"We believe that our Boys' Work Conferences are exerting strongly helpful influences throughout the Northern Baptist Convention in calling attention to the important interests of our boys and in providing a clearing house for mutual helpfulness in ideas and comradeship. And we believe that these Conferences should be continued.

"We believe in the ideals of Camp Oswegatchie as being developed under the direction of our Brotherhood by our Home Mission Board and Publication Society and would seek to call its opportunities and privileges to the attention of all our parents and Churches."

One of the most thrilling sessions of the entire convention was that of Monday evening, Prof. Henry B. Robins of Rochester, who has recently returned from a year's visit to our mission fields in Japan, China and the Philippines, gave a vivid account of these missions. Especially did he emphasize present conditions in China which he characterized as a nation which is the victim of irresponsible local militarism, but which is full of promise.

Secretary Robbins then gave an illustrated address in which, by the use of the pictures of our great missionaries of the past, he sounded the call to the present enlistment of life.

Greet the New Missionaries

The new missionaries, under appointment by the general and the woman's boards then came to the platform and were given a rousing greeting. In introducing the appointees of the Woman's Board, Miss Prescott stated that since the New World Movement began two years ago, seventy new missionaries had been appointed. Of these forty-two have already sailed for their fields and twenty-eight will sail this fall. Miss M. M. Goldenburg spoke a few words for the group of six who were present.

The new missionaries of the general board were introduced by Dr. Lerrigo. He stated that a total of eighty-five (of both societies) will sail for the field this year. Of the new missionaries under appointment, fifty-seven have sailed or will sail at once, and thirty-nine were present. Representatives of the group going respectively to Burma, South India, China, Assam, the Philippines, the Congo, Japan, and to the English-speaking work in Burma, spoke and thrilled the audience.

The service closed with a fervent prayer of dedication, offered by Prof. F. L. Anderson, chairman of the board of the Foreign Mission Society.

The names of those under appointment by the two boards follow:

The morning was filled with reports except for one notable address by Dr. J. M. Moore, which in an early issue, we shall, at the request of the Convention, publish in full.

The report of the committee on enrollment showed that the total number registered was 2189, of whom 1184 were pastors, 302 laymen, 676 women, and 27 visitors. Of this total, 1009 came from the five states of Iowa, Illinois, Nebraska, Kansas and Minnesota.

The report of the committee on chaplains was presented by Dr. Batten and followed by a short address by Chaplain Rideout of Fort Leavenworth, Kansas.

and also one by a representative of the chaplains of the late war to whom there was presented on this occasion the medals made for them by the Federal Council of Churches.

By vote the administrative committee of the Board of Promotion was authorized during the year to borrow money up to the sum of $1,500,000 if that should become necessary.

President Tustin took the chair at 10:40 and introduced Mrs. W. A. Montgomery as the next president of the convention. Mrs. Montgomery responded with a short speech in which she pledged to the work the best that is in her. "Cannot," she said, "we get together and put over the greatest task we have ever faced? I have a pride in my heart that we Baptists who have talked much of democracy should be the first great denomination to put our belief to the test." She spoke of the heartening effect of such action on women in other parts of the world especially in countries where they are greatly shut in.

In his report for the Ministers' and Missionaries' Benefit Board, Secretary Tomlinson said that the board had made more grants this year than ever before, and that the assistance of the needy was the first care of the board.

Resolved, Almost Everything

The committee on resolutions brought in a report in which it urged a great multitude of things. It expressed thanks to the people of Des Moines; gratification at the presence of our foreign guests; a desire that all possible assistance be given the suffering Armenians; commended the Near East relief; expressed gratitude at the adoption of the 18th amendment and urged that the churches continue a campaign of education and enforcement; expressed itself against prize-fighting; urged governmental action looking towards the suppression of the fighting Chinese "tongs" in the United States; bespoke modesty in the dress and demeanor of our Christian girls; asked that pastors warn their people against attacks on the Sabbath by motion picture concerns; had something to say on divorce; expressed appreciation of the work of the American Bible Society; urged education in tithing; approved week-day religious schools; deplored the statement by Ambassador Harvey that the United States went into the war for its own sake; urged action to stop the traffic in narcotics with China; urged that the government should in connection with the settlement of relations between nations use all efforts to secure religious freedom for all; deplored any movement which should destroy the good relations existing between the United States and Great Britain; expressed appreciation of the spirit of Christian conciliation manifest in the convention; urged on the churches a campaign of evangelism; called attention to the need for boys of some organization which should do for them what the World Wide Guild does for girls; urged a reduction in armaments by international agreement; suggested the value of a national department of education; asked that a committee consisting of the president of the convention and others shall present to Washington all matters asking government consideration, and pronounced in favor of the Boy Scouts. If any good thing were omitted, it would seem that it was only by accident.

On Tuesday afternoon, there was held a joint session of the Home Mission societies. In the foreign field, Rev. A. C. Hanna spoke for Baptist work in Burma;

Rev. R. B. Longwell for Assam; Pres. F. J. White of Shanghai College for work in China; Rev. W. H. Leslie for the Belgian Congo, and Rev. R. C. Thomas for the Philippines.

In the home field, Mrs. Westfall presented fifteen new appointees of the Woman's Home Mission Society, and Miss Beatrice E. Sliter spoke for them. Mr. E. R. Brown spoke concerning the 2,000,000 Mexicans who are now in the United States; Miss A. Bischoff told of her work in New York City among the Spanish-speaking people there; Miss Laura Thompson and Miss Lydia Huber told of the work in Porto Rico, and Miss May Covington told of Porto Rico. In this most impressive afternoon service, Mrs. Geo. Caleb Moor of New York offered the prayer of dedication for the young women who are just entering upon their tasks. All of these young women are graduates of the Missionary Training School.

The convention closed with two notable addresses, although by this time great numbers of the delegates, exhausted by the continual work and the intense heat, had left for home. The first address was by Rev. W. H. Geistweit on the theme "Baptist Co-operation in Bringing the Gospel to All Mankind." The second was by Rev. W. E. Woodbury of Minneapolis who had as his theme, "The Dynamic for the New World Movement." We shall hope later to present fuller reports of these addresses.

Number from homes where every member of the family old enough to be so engaged was doing some kind of Christian (church) work...1,542-51.1%
Total number of families reported .....1,733
Families producing more than one worker each.....1,070-62%
Another interesting feature developed as the study progressed.

Occasionally a church would show more isolated individuals as workers than those from family groups. In each case where this was true as further study of the situation showed that these particular churches had for a number of years lost their hold on their respective communities and were disintegrating, some quite rapidly.

It is evident from this statistical study that in order to produce the type of Christian people who are willing and able to lift more than their own weight the church and home must co-operate. In this co-operative christian task the first opportunity and the primary obligation rests with the home. If we would succeed best in our religious educational work we evidently should as church workers begin at the beginning; not with the child but with the home into which the child is to come and by which its religious training for good or bad, for gain or loss will be largely directed.

It is not enough that the church supplement the religious training which the home gives the individual child. If we are to produce in large numbers the best type of Christian people who are both the highest product of religious education and the most perfect expression of the grace of God—the church must see to it that Christian homes are founded and that the family life of its people back up and multiply the individual inclination and ability to live the Christian life. The Christian home and the Christian church are inseparable partners.

If either fail the other is wrecked. The church must begin its efforts to help the individual by doing all it can for the home.

NEW JERSEY

A NUMBER OF NEW JERSEY PREACHERS have been honored by their Alma Maters at the June commencement. Rev. William E. Braisted receives the degree of doctor of divinity from Oskaloosa College, Iowa; Rev. Michael Joseph Twomey of the Peddie Memorial Church, "builder of churches, wholehearted servant of man and God, who has known how to reach with tenderness and humor, with delicacy and strength, the unplumbed deeps in the soul of men," has a D.D. from Brown University; Rev. Joseph Robert Wood of Newark, "in recognition for special work as minister of the gospel in a new age," doctor of divinity from Bucknell; the Rev. Clark T. Brownell formerly at the Bridgeton First and the South Church, Newark, now at Brattleboro, Vt., doctor of divinity from Colgate.

THE NEW JERSEY YOUNG PEOPLE'S SUMMER ASSEMBLY opened July 2 at Peddie Institute. The following New Jersey leaders and pastors will serve: Rev. O. P. Laegeler is superintendent; Dr. T. P. Holloway gives the Sunday evening address; Rev. Chas. E. Goodall, pastor of the Assembly; Dr. Harry S. Myers, a normal course in missions; Prof. T. E. Garner, in charge of recreation; Prof. A. T. Davis, "Paul" and "Principles of Religious Education"; Rev. Harry E. Owings, inspirational address; Prof. J. W. Reeves, lecture, "Enoch Arden"; Rev. W. I. Booth, courses on "Vacation Bible School," "Enlistment for Christ"; Rev. A. H. Sutphin, course on the "Rural Church"; Miss Lena L. Pinkham, "Primary Work" and "Child Psychology"; Rev. P. E. Wilmont, "Baptist Principles" and "The Teachings of Jesus"; Rev. Albert Bretschneider, "Epoch in Life of Christ" and "From Survey to Service"; Prof. William A. Barros, "Advanced Psychology" and "The Message of the Books"; Prof. C. Harold Lowden, in charge of the assembly music; Rev. C. E. Tilton, "Old Testament History" and "Home Mission Study"; Rev. George D. Allison, from the Second Church, Wilmington, Del., courses on "Old Testament Literature" and "Social Institutions"; Prof. L. W. Smith, from Kalamazoo, Mich., will deliver the patriotic address and an evening lecture; Dr. F. O. Erb, courses "Young People's Leadership" and "Adult Bible Classes"; Rev. Paul R. Hackett, missionary from Burma, courses in "How and Why of Foreign Missions"; Miss Rosamond Kimball, courses in "Drama and Pageantry." The registration to date is over 300. Delegates were sent from almost every Baptist church in the state.

CONNECTICUT

THE MESSIAH CHURCH, Bridgeport, Rev. Walter Gay, pastor, conducted an evangelistic campaign for twelve days in May which greatly quickened the life of the church and increased its membership. The pastor has received fifty, thirty-one by baptism and twenty are awaiting the ordinance.

REV. W. H. WAKEFIELD, Jr., pastor at First West Haven, received five new members after baptism, on a recent Sunday.

THE WORK AT THE GRAND AVENUE CHURCH, New Haven, is most encouraging. The pastor, Rev. P. L. Cosman, is doing a really constructive work in this part of the city. The pastor's Bible class, which has been meeting Monday evenings, has disbanded until the autumn. At the close of the last meeting, the class presented the pastor with a purse of gold as an expression of its appreciation of his services.

CONNECTICUT was represented at the Northern Baptist Convention by the following: Revs James McGee; Donald B. MacQueen; F. B. Haggard; D. W. Lovett; W. J. Barnes; W. N. Reynolds and Mrs. Reynolds; Mrs. J. D. Rough; Mr. C. S. Carter; W. H. Brackett; Dr. A. B. Coats; Rev. E. E. Gates and H. B. Sloat.

You ain' tellin' nuffin I don' know."

I'd rather hop dan swim, I vow,
An' I doesn't like company much, no-how,

I'se jes bin waitin' f'um day to day
Foh my laigs to grow, to be on my way."

Now frogs is frogs, an' fish is fish,
An' it's nuffin but foolishness to wish
To be changin' round like white folks do
An' dream dem dreams dat can't come true.

So honey, you stay whah you done belong,
And do you bes' an' you can't go wrong.

Keep On—Fishin'

Suppose the fish don't bite at fust,
What be yer goin' tur dew?

Chuck down yewr pole, throw 'way yewr bait

An' say yewr fishin' threw?

Uv course yew ain't, yewr goin' tur fish,

An' fish, an' fish, and wait

Until yew's ketched yewr basket full

An' used up all yewr bait.

It Always Has

The rain it poured,
The sea it roared,
The sky was draped in black.
The old ship rolled,
She pitched and bowled
And lost her charted track!

"Oh dear, oh dear!
Sir, will it clear?"
Loud wailed a dame on deck.
As they heaved the lead
The skipper said,
"It allus has, by heck!"

Beauty

Some folks in looks take so much pride
They don't think much on what's inside.

Well, as for me, I know my face
Can ne'er be made a thing of grace,
And so I rather think I'll see
How I can fix th' inside of me,
So folks'll say, "He looks like sin,"
But ain't he beautiful within!"

PRIZE COMPETITION

To this office have come two announcements that should be of interest to composers, one from the Illinois Chapter of the American Guild of Organists, announcing a Manuscript Festival; the other from Swift & Co., offering a prize of one hundred dollars for the best setting of a poem by Chas. H. Luders. The conditions in detail are set forth below:

Manuscript Festival

Under the auspices of the Illinois Chapter a recital of manuscript organ compositions by members of the American Guild of Organists will be given in Chicago during the week of October 10, 1921. Since a large number of manuscripts probably will be submitted, the following conditions should be observed:

1. All manuscripts must be in the hands of the Secretary of the Illinois Chapter (Miss Alice R. Deal, 4359 West End Ave., Chicago) on or before August 1, 1921.

2. All manuscripts must bear a fictitious name and be accompanied with a sealed envelope containing the fictitious name and the real name and address of the composer, together with the name of the Chapter of the A. G. O., of which he is a member.

3. No composition that has been published or accepted for publication may be submitted.

4. Composers may submit as many compositions as they choose, all compositions to be sent for organ solo.

5. Composers submitting manuscripts must be members of the American Guild of Organists.

6. Compositions to be performed will be chosen and the results announced as soon after August 1st as the judges can examine the manuscripts.

7. The compositions chosen by the judges will be performed by the composers themselves or by organists selected by the composers.

CONGREGATIONAL SINGING

There can be no question that congregational singing has degenerated into a dull and perfunctory thing under the influence of the paid quartet, which has in most cases come to be merely an exhibited thing, turning the musical part of the worship in our churches into a sort of concert. The attendance is asked to sing, and a hymn is given out. It is usually sung quite listlessly, by a few in the congregation. Generally speaking, it becomes a thing to be got over as soon and as inoffensively as possible. It affords no inspiration, and expresses little worship. It is, in fact, but a rudimentary survival of an ancient institution.

That ancient institution, the only musical exercise of our forefathers, had certain strong merits. It certainly cannot be revived in its ancient form, in which the hymn was 'lined out' by the choir-master, and twanged in unison by the congregation. That would be a ridiculous thing in our modern life. Instead of inspiring the joy of worship, it would provoke amusement. But at least the old-time singing was conducted with spirit, and had an emotional basis. Little by little, under the influence of the exhibition of the quartet, the old zeal faded away in the modern dull performance. What is needed now is a reawakening of the old zeal, but its reawakening under competent direction, and with skill and thoroughness. The musical directors of the military service have gained an experience in organizing the choral song of large bodies of men, which should stand them in good stead in the creation of a new manner of congregational singing; but in the application of their experience moderation and prudence are needed, for we do not want for this purpose either the athletics of the college cheer-leader or the humorous vagaries and trashy music of the Billy Sunday meetings.—The Boston Transcript.

FROM THE SCRAP-BOX

If all of our singers realized what sort of a job our choir leaders have on their hands, they would often make it a little easier for them. One of their trials is the thoughtless inattention on the part of some of the singers. When the director turns to the basses for a moment with his remarks, the opportunity is at once seized by some in the soprano section for spirited conversation, and when the director again turns to the choir, he finds only part of it ready to respond. The place is lost, the directions are misunderstood, they do not start together, and the work has to be done all over again, just because a few inattentive ones were not on the job. There is a loss of time, and of energy, and often of good nature, that could and should all be avoided.

The editors recently took occasion to hear a number of cantatas, and there were interesting discussions when they got together again. Just how is such work to be judged? Merely from the artistic standpoint? In that case there was not a little room for adverse criticism. And in so far as the cantata, or any kind of musical composition, is a work of art, those who render it cannot fairly hope to escape criticism from this point of view. Let none of our choirs take this matter lightly. It is up to them to meet the requirements of musical art to the fullest extent of their ability. When the home talent is altogether too limited in its musical, or especially vocal, possibilities, it may often be the wisest thing to secure outside help rather than to risk a performance that will not only bring discredit upon the particular performance, but would be likely to cast a reflection upon the quality of service in general which that church stands for. It is not wise to take chances with the reputation of a church.

Artistic perfection, however, is not the only desideratum. It may not even be the main one. For after all, many a slip is gladly overlooked, if only the cantata has been the means of rallying the singers and the audience, and of voicing for them all the common song in their hearts. Where that has been accomplished, the cantata has served a noble purpose in spite of the blemishes attached to the rendition of it.

Give When the Spirit Moves

THAT donors of gifts to various foreign mission stations perhaps seldom realize the importance and timeliness of their gifts to those stations is indicated in the report of Dr. J. S. Grant of Ningpo. A striking incident of this is the following extract from Dr. Grant's letter:

"In the autumn we had a number of severe cases of pernicious malaria. Many of these had been treated by the native doctors without success. Our good fortune in being able to help many of them brought us quite a reputation. The microscope given by the ladies of the southern New York Association enabled us in these cases to determine the causative factor."

Similarly Dr. Grant expresses his gratitude in another instance:

"At one time during the year when we needed money to pay Evangelist Fong's salary, a letter came with some money from a friend in Camden, N. J. He knew our needs and sent it. Praise His name! Mr. Fong's salary, including traveling expenses, is about $21.00 a month. A little over one-third has been promised."

"It has also been the same way with many of the parcels that came for the hospital. They came at the right time—neither too early nor too late."

THE SILENCE OF NIGHT

HOW calm and cool and still are the northern woods in the moonlight! The radiance of the full moon floods the landscape and paints with the magic colors of a dream the white shafts of the birches and the green spires of cedars silhouetted against the silvery cloud looming beyond the hills. Happy the dweller among the steaming cornfields of the Ohio country, or on the baked pavements of the cities who can run away to rest awhile amid such scenes as this!

Further Impressions of the Convention

This New Baptist Confession of Faith

By ALVAN S. HOBART

Considering the preliminary discussions about it one has a shadow of unrealized expectations, and a sense of realized hopes. Unrealized expectations that the "Confession," said to be a reaffirmation of the "Old Faith" in more explicit terms and with a changed emphasis. A pre-millennial tone was looked for, and a cast-iron chain to bind the brethren to this confession. In all this the prophetic instinct went astray.

The realized hopes are that it would contain nothing of a divisive character, by being too precise, and too dogmatic. Certainly there is the breadth of outdoors. The man who does not accept it all does not feel at home among Baptists. Probably 95 percent of them would have been willing to include more—much more. But this was intended to get us out of an unpromising situation—an irenic endeavor that has succeeded well. No one can complain.

The brethren who have not been happy over the New Hampshire statement that God is three persons in one; those who have been puzzled to know what "deity" means; those who have not yet determined by what process "atonement" was secured; those who do not know "post" from "pre"; those who have been bothered about the details of the incarnation; those who have been troubled over the close communion question—these and some others, find their path all cleared. They can still call themselves Baptist and stay in the procession. And if there are any who have wished there was less philosophy and more room for faith in their Baptist system of doctrine, they must be satisfied at the shrinkage of the old platform planks, and the fewness of those that are here officially declared to be "fundamentals."

These conservative, orthodox, regressive Baptists are certainly a peculiar people, zealous of good work.

Yonkers, N. Y.

The New World Movement a Great Success

By ARTHUR W. RIDER

The rapid changes in the convention from its review of the fifty years with which the convention began, all through the varied emotions to the close, revealed that whenever there was sounded the note of service and our missionary task, the great heart of the denomination beat as one. It emphasized the historic fact that it was our missionary task which first drew our scattered Baptists together. They could not have united in that early day on definitions nor uniformity of statements, but they could unite on their common missionary task. So the consciousness of this responsibility for our task, calmed and steadied through our recent sessions and will continue to hold us in brotherly co-operative relations.

The Women's Jubilee was a victory in which we all had a share, and it was a fitting recognition of their wonderful work which the convention made when it elected to the presidency of the convention the leader of the group, Mrs. W. A. Montgomery. This was an exemplification, not merely of democracy but of the spirit of Christianity of which the Apostle said: "There is neither Jew nor Greek, bond nor free, male nor female." The world has been very slow in according to women their share of opportunity, education, leadership—though leaving the lion's share of the work, toil and sacrifice of the church to them—and this tardy recognition of woman's worth and effort will make the meeting at Des Moines memorable.

The great report of the Board of Promotion of ten and one-half millions raised during the year, and the great exhibit of young people who are to be sent out to fields of service, home and foreign, taken together show that whatever criticisms may have been offered, the Baptist New World Movement has been a great success. No such goals have ever been reached before in our history. Instead of questioning its success, let us thank God it is already a success, and help to make it a greater one!

Los Angeles, Calif.

From Apprehension to Confidence

By GEORGE R. STAIR

The convention began in apprehension, it ended in confidence. There has been a rather widespread fear that our educational institutions were chambers of theological horrors, but the fine and comprehensive report of the committee on investigation very clearly indicated that our schools are both safe and sound in their teaching of the things we esteem to be fundamental to our Christian faith. Any teaching that might be questioned is the utterance of an individual and not the policy of a school.

In the various sessions the brethren exercised their inalienable Baptist right of free speech, but the results of the discussions and decisions were strikingly beneficial. The atmosphere has been cleared, our faith has been deepened and reaffirmed, our confidence in our leaders is firmly established, our plan of organization has been fully vindicated and we return to our churches filled with a new purpose and enthusiasm to preach with a fresh emphasis the glorious gospel of the Son of God.

Brethren, Let Us Quit!

By WILLIAM HENRY GEISTWEIT

Isn't it time that some one said some plain things on the present denominational situation as regards fundamental conferences and our national meetings, and the condition in which they leave us?

The last two meetings of the Northern Baptist Convention have been anything but happy occasions. Last year at Buffalo it was enough to make angels weep; this year it was—well, we're a sorry bunch, and do not seem to be getting anywhere.

Already plans are working to make things "hot" at Seattle. To keep this thing up, to pitch a quarrel on the Pacific Coast (the convention will be mainly a western convention) is nothing short of a crime. I hope the program committee will give us two things and no more: a spiritual uplift, and a missionary outlook. Outside of that the Northern Baptist Convention has no function. We are not set for fine discussions on doctrinal hair splitting. It is a missionary convention. We can declare nothing for anybody—only as we advise. The effort to make doctrinal matters the issue is divisive, is heading the denomination toward pandemonium. We have proven that. Let us stop it.

We have had two "fundamental" conferences preceding the convention. In perfectly good nature and in the best spirit, I want to say—two are enough. In each instance the only thing that resulted was bitterness of spirit, unchristian contention, leaving a brown taste for the convention that followed. We are heading toward a collision if we keep this thing up. Brethren, let us quit it. If such conferences are to be held, keep them away from the convention. Don't hold them within many miles of the convention. We don't need them. One only needs to sit quietly and listen to discover that the whole business is passion-provoking: men turn white in anger, say things they ought not; and speak in such threatening language that middle-of-the-road men (and I believe they are in the majority among us) scarcely know whether it is a Christian body, or a political stockyard. We have had enough of it. Brethren, for the good of the Kingdom, if a fundamental conference is needed, hold it in Atlantic City and let the convention go to Seattle. Hungry men go to the convention; they have worked hard through the year; they long for a vision of God "with all the saints"; they long to know what God has wrought through the missionaries; they go asking "What of the night?" for it is night; they long to hear messages that will stimulate their faith; they want a mountain-top vision for the valley effort; they want to see God!

Beware the Itch of Contention

They will never get a vision in an atmosphere of contention. "The itch of disputing will prove the scab of the church," said one of the old church fathers; and the scabs are appearing. May God make the Seattle meeting a time of spiritual refreshing! Let us quit on the other stuff.

There are some pertinent reasons why this is written. I hold a brief for nobody. I am writing in the interests of the Kingdom. I think I know the general rank and file of our ministers, north and south, east and west. Years in the B. Y. P. U. editorial chair gave me a peculiar advantage. I think I know a great army of men north and south. They are true, faithful, devoted, consecrated men. They long to see the Kingdom come in the lives of men. They came out of the Great War battered in heart, facing upheavals in every institution of civilization; and the churches suffered most for we lost moral, spiritual and numerical strength. About eighteen months ago the tide turned, spiritual life was quickened, souls were again turning to God and these eighteen months were the best since before the war. Instead of coming together for greater spiritual power, larger vision, deeper consecration, men went into each convention with jaws set, eyes ablaze, hearts hard. God pity us! Brethren, let us quit!

Well, "as I was saying," there are some pertinent reasons for this article:

First: We are getting nowhere. Last year the attack was on our schools. What

An Unnecessary Exhortation

It is reported that a brother minister, leading a meeting of most serious import, from time to time exclaimed, "Brethren, let us hesitate to pray." Most of us mortals little need such an exhortation. To pray without ceasing; to always pray and faint not is for most of us an accomplishment of the future. THE BAPTIST has a page devoted to the Devotional Life. We would wager, however, if we believed in the practice, that more people read this Kollum. 'Fess up now. All of which leads us to say, Brethren, do not hesitate to pray."

Killam's Kollum

Won't Stand To Be Counted

Many of our subscribers have on earth no abiding city. For what seems years we have been trying to overtake them but no sooner is a stencil cut for one city than a new address is received. Killam Junior writes from Valmora, New Mexico, and illustrates our situation: "The other day Heine was sent to count the cows in the Sanatorium's herd. I went with him. He had been counting for several minutes when he remarked, 'I have got them all counted but that one over there and he keeps running around so fast I can't count him.' This made me think of some of the subscribers to THE BAPTIST who move so often that they can hardly be counted." Friends can you not make out an itinerary for us? It would be a real help.

Wants More Speed

On July 6, 1921 at 11:16 A. M. we received from a certain state a number of subscriptions to THE BAPTIST. They keep coming although the weather is a trifle warm. On the morning of July 7 we received a letter which registered 120 in the shade. The writer wanted to know by what right we took a man's money and gave nothing in return. He either wanted the paper by the next mail or he wanted his money back. We do not blame the man for his eagerness to get the paper. On this page there appears each week the statement that it takes about two weeks to make stencil changes. It is a mechanical process. We will in spite of the heat try to make more speed.

Hopkins Complains

"Kan you kommand our konfidence in your klaims not to be as bad as your name? Did you not kan- cel and kill the Open Forum, the keenest korner of THE BAPTIST? We konstantly kry for a kom- mittee of the whole where we may konscientiously korrekt the krooks of our komrades. Konfess, my brother." Brother Hopkins, we have an alibi. The editors disclaimed any responsibility for articles in the Forum. Some one had to be responsible. This burden fell on the Publishing Committee. They killed the kollum for the korrektion of krooks.

Great Scott

"Who is the man you have at THE BAPTIST booth" was a question asked again and again at Des Moines. His constant attention to the business of selling THE BAPTIST, his uniform courtesy and good nature were appreciated by the friends of the paper. It was a hard place to see THE BAPTIST. More than two-thirds of the delegates and visitors were already subscribers. And yet out of the less than 500 who did not have the paper, Mr. Scott secured an even 200 subscribers. Great Scott! We could not have done it ourselves. The man was Rev. A. K. Scott, pastor of the church at Nashville, Mich. He works just as hard at his church job.

Religious Education in the Home

BY SELDON L. ROBERTS

"In religious education the home is more influential than the church. It may not be so good, but it is more powerful." So said Harold McA. Robinson, D.D. at the Sunday School Council meeting in January, 1921.

If this be true to the extent that the church fails in guiding the religious ideals of the family, and the religious educational activities of the home from which the people who are to be members of and the working force in our churches come, the religious educational work of the church itself will be weakened and fail. Both home and church must each do its best or the whole task cannot be accomplished. Neither can shift to the other its just share of the load. When either weakens or wavers, therefore, both measurably fail.

What then can the church do to help the religious life and teaching of the home?

Train young people for home making and parenthood. It is too late to begin after the home is founded and the babies are on hand. True ideals of family life, right methods of home teaching and a measure of skill in such work should be given as a regular part of the educational program of the church.

Much of this can be done indirectly. I do not mean in an indefinite way, but without labeling the package or naming the purpose.

All training for Christian leadership that is broadly conceived and that gives insight into the religious nature and needs of people and sympathy with the attitudes and aspirations of children and growing youths will help in home making. Several of the units of the New Standard Training Course are of this nature and many of our young people who may not intend to teach regularly in the church school should take such studies for the sake of their general Christian usefulness.

Example is oftentimes most helpful in fixing an ideal and an attitude especially if the experience has something of newness and of personal fellowship in it. If our better Christian homes would frequently invite less favored individuals of our congregation and Sunday school as guests, it would do much to set right ideals and give new visions and aspirations to those who might not otherwise have opportunity to know what is best in home life.

Pastors and church school teachers can be well chosen, suggestions and illustrations help set the standard of thought and conduct in the direction of right things in home life both of the homes that now are and those that are to be founded.

The church can do much directly to determine the standards of religious education in the home.

Special courses of study may be frankly offered for those who now have or are to assume the duties of a Christian home. If people seek such help for culinary and economic skill, why not give them opportunity to secure it for religious effectiveness and welfare. For that matter, why should not a church give direct instruction in all the fine arts of home making for any who might not otherwise have opportunity for such studies?

A course of study in story telling has very direct application to the religious education of children in the home.

Carefully supervised and enriched social meetings for the young people and children of the church, especially when some of these can be held in the better homes of the church, not only serve a splendid purpose in the immediate religious welfare of those who attend, but will, if rightly planned, have a direct influence upon the future home life of the community and church.

Dr. Russell H. Conwell, pastor of Grace Baptist Church, Philadelphia, and his great church give much attention to the home making of the many young people who come under the influence of the "Temple."

In a recent book by Pastor Conwell on "Effective Prayer," he tells of the many requests for and the startling results oftentimes attending special prayer for husbands, wives and homes.

"Looking back over the marriage records of the Baptist Temple for thirty years, there appear some significant facts concerning home making by prayer. Through those thirty years of record keeping there was an average of sixteen marriages a month, or five thousand and one hundred in thirty years. . . .

Not one case of divorce can be discovered, and only two cases of estrangement."

Prayer in the home is essential, prayer about the founding of a new home is also essential.

Those Lost Lines.

Attentive readers will have observed that in the haste of making the issue of July 2 after midnight, the report of the fundamentals conference at Des Moines has several lines missing at the bottom of page 684. In response to inquiries coming to the office of THE BAPTIST the section containing those lines is here printed in full.

"Finally, while men were clamoring to be heard, and amid great confusion, the chairman closed debate and put the question to vote. A large majority voted for adoption; some voted against it; some did not vote.

"The evening addresses gave a different temper to the conference. Rev. W. B. Hinson presented in a simple but sweetly persuasive way the scripture teaching concerning 'The Return of Our Lord,' with a premillennial interpretation."

Special Meeting A. B. P. S.

At the call of the Board of Managers a special meeting of the American Baptist Publication Society will be held in the Board Room of the Society's building, 1701 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia, Pa., on July 27, 1921, at 2 p.m., to consider and pass upon the election of officers and other actions taken by the Society at meetings held in Des Moines, Iowa, in the month of June, 1921, and to consider such other business as may lawfully be brought before it.

Fresh from the Field

After nearly three years' work as pastor of the Hubbard (Ohio) Church, Rev. Wm. Ryan resigned to accept a call to the church at Dunbar, Pa., near which place most of his pastoral life has been spent. He began his new work on July 1. Raymond H. Tracy is chairman of the pulpits committee of the Hubbard Church.

Rev. George Robert Cairns, of Seattle, Wash., for many years a Baptist evangelist in this country, England and Scotland, died suddenly in Australia on June 23, where he has been holding meetings since April, 1920. He was about to leave for England by way of the Holy Land. His wife accompanied him to Australia. He was the son of Rev. James Cairns, a Baptist minister for more than fifty years. Mrs. Margaret C. Munns, treasurer of the National W. C. T. U., is a daughter.

Following the Des Moines convention, Dr. Frederick L. Anderson has been spending a short time with his daughter in Chicago.

Rev. R. D. Licklider has resigned at Hammond, Ind.

Rev. L. S. Slaybaugh, formerly pastor of the church at Royal Oak, a rapidly-growing suburb of Detroit. He is inaugurating a campaign to put a copy of THE BAPTIST and Missions in every family in the church.

Dr. Edwin O. Excell, song evangelist and publisher of musical books, died recently in Chicago. He composed tunes for the words of many well-known gospel hymns.

The mother of Dr. Grenfell of Labrador recently passed away in her English home at the advanced age of eighty-nine years.

Rev. J. W. Balfour comes to the North Baptist church, Lansing, Mich. The North and Olivet churches were founded as branches of Lansing First Church. During the past year under the leadership of Rev. Donald T. Grey as associate pastor of First Church they grew into larger activity and capacity. Mr. Grey has now become pastor of Olivet church and Mr. Balfour comes August 1, to become pastor of North Church. His coming is full of promise as he is well-trained and had a good pastorate at Oshkosh, Wis. Due to the fact that these two churches are yet strongly supported by First Church, along with the City Union and State Convention, it is confidently hoped under their new leadership they will soon come to be strong, independent churches. Pastor Clarence W. Kemper and First Church organization are doing their utmost to develop these two fields and close co-operation is the method to that end.

The Christian world is the poorer because of the recent death of Rev. G. Frederick Wright of Oberlin, Ohio. As editor of the Bibliotheca Sacra Dr. Wright reached a large constituency and his work in geology and in the Scriptures assured him of a ready hearing. His readers were found among thoughtful people of all schools of science and theology.

The Baptist

Quit Walking on Us

BAPTIST papers of the South, in discussing the Northern Baptist Convention, concede that the Baptists of the North are 75 per cent orthodox. That is very gracious of them, especially when the basis of their observation must be rather mixed voices of a great convention and private conversations and letters which are necessarily limited. Did each one define accurately what he means by "orthodox" the conclusion would be of yet more value. But taking words at their face value, we believe that they have greatly underestimated the fact. We doubt if, on investigation, more than 5 per cent of our churches and pastors will be found to have departed in any essential respect from the evangelical faith as held by Baptists. And we are just a little worried for fear that we are placing even this percentage too high.

Our churches believe in the inspired Book; they assert, the unique character of Jesus, finding him "God manifest in the flesh," "the express image of the invisible God;" they believe in salvation by grace and in a life of good works following regeneration; they hold to the forgiveness of sins, and, although theories of the atonement differ because some stress one of the New Testament suggestions and some another, they yet relate in the most intimate and essential way the death of Christ to this forgiveness; they believe in a real resurrection of Christ and of the believer and in a present, living Christ; they believe that Jesus will come again as he said; they hold to the ideal of the church as set forth in the New Testament, and to the two great symbolic ordinances; they are committed to the missionary program of Jesus and do not cease to pray and to work for the coming of his kingdom. Their whole conception of the church is spiritual and their thought of religion is of something vital and not sacramental. They are devoted to our Lord whose will is their supreme law.

Falstaff's Men in Buckram

Of late the editors of THE BAPTIST have been asking men straight questions like this: "Give to us the names of teachers who, to your direct knowledge, are untrue to the faith commonly held by Baptists." And they will name one or two or perhaps three and then stop, the limit of their actual knowledge having been reached. Then we have asked, "Name to us pastors who deserve the epithets, 'Unitarian,' 'gospel-defying,' and the like." And men generally answer that all the men within their actual acquaintance are sound and true, adding perhaps that they have heard of some man farther off. It is always this man "farther off" who is accused. The men near home are all right. So it is all over the country. Pastors in the same neighborhood often speak a slightly different language, but when they sit down together in a Christian spirit and talk things out, the word of each generally is, "I can love that man because he loves my Lord and his Word."

What then is all this noise about? What of all this talk about modernism? What of the suspicions and accusations? Well, it looks to us about like this:

There is in the denomination a small group of men who are radical in their thought and utterances. The number of their adherents is small. There is at the other extreme a group of able and sincere men who do not hesitate to speak of themselves as "ultra-conservatives." Each of these groups goes much farther in its theological definitions than the great body of the denomination. Most Baptists are untrained in theology; they hold strongly to the evangelical facts but do not often organize their thought of them into a complete system. The radicals suspect all who do not agree with them and call them reactionaries. The ultra-conservatives, in their public utterances, are inclined to classify all who do not use their exact shibboleths as "modernists" or "radicals" or what not. Both are wrong in their generalizations as both are wrong in thinking that they are the only genuine dyed-in-the-wool Baptists. The people in the middle are the real Baptists, holding the faith of the fathers and holding it in a spirit of forbearance and love, refusing to surrender their liberty of conscience or their loyalty to Christ because of some specter which extremists see in the road.

"A Plague on Both Your Houses"

These real Baptists have been the battle-ground over which the extremists have fought. The experience is rather a trying one. They have tried quietly to go about their business and that they have measurably succeeded is shown by the more than 106,000 baptisms of the past year, but their peace of mind has been greatly upset. Are they to live perpetually in this turmoil? Are they to purchase peace only by agreeing to any form of words the extremists place before them? We think not. There are many indications that they are about ready to say to the men at either extreme, "A plague on both your houses. We are done with self-constituted bosses. We propose to govern ourselves for a time."

Suspicion never gets men anywhere. General and reckless charges only make matters worse. Manipulation of assemblies is always followed by a kick-back. Among Christian men no measure gets far unless it is conceived and carried through in a spirit of brotherly love. Emphasize details and you divide men; emphasize great spiritual facts and experiences and you unite men. Call us to renewed devotion to our Lord and to consecration to his kingdom and we will rise as a man. The head may sometimes go a little wrong but if the heart is right, the outcome will be sure and good. As we do the Lord's will from the heart we come to know of the doctrine, whether it is of God or not. Baptists have always held in excellent balance the evangelical faith and the right of the individual to liberty in spiritual things. The great body continues to believe in both of these things. The churches made up of this vast majority of middle-of-the-road Baptists are tired of talk and anxious above all things to face this new day, with all its perplexing problems, with their hands free to preach the gospel of the love of God in Christ without let or hindrance and certainly not under the handicap of endless theological debates. They know that Christ is not served by faction or quarrel but by men and women who are filled with his love and who have a great compassion for their fellowmen.

Brethren, let us have peace. Let us understand each other. Let us refuse to be falsely labelled. Let us bear glad witness to our faith and tell extremists of every sort to go about their own business. We do believe the faith held by the fathers and we do what the fathers did, namely, express it in the language of our own time. And we have before us accomplishments and tasks greater than any of which they ever dreamed. The story of the past year is one of the most wonderful in Baptist annals. But it is only the beginning of yet greater things, provided we can give ourselves to fighting the real enemy instead of drubbing each other. The cross of Jesus has gone on before; it is for Baptists of all people to follow on, without doubt or fear, and with a determination to act in their day and generation worthily of their Lord.

Where Are the Mid-Victorian Liberals?

MR. SIMEON STRUNSKY in the Atlantic Monthly for the current month laments, or at least remarks with some air of desolation, upon the disappearance in politics of the old-fashioned liberals. He notes that now "liberal," "red" and "radical" are words of similar connotation. And he does not seem to understand just what has become of his old friends.

We may enlighten him.

Broadly the old liberalism leaned towards the extension of free government in the field of politics; because at that period the democratization of government was having a hard pull uphill against the opposition of Kaiser, Czar and aristocracy the world over.

But the scene has shifted and the issue has changed. So far as forms are concerned, government by a privileged order is dead and the people are striding over it with hobnailed boots. They have so much political power they hardly know how to use it.

A fundamentally new issue has arisen. The vital concern of civilization has shifted to the industrial field. Industrial democracy is clamoring for power now as political democracy used to do. The old liberal finds his occupation gone and is lost in the maze. On the new issue he does not know where he stands. He loses heart and becomes neutral or else he follows his liberal principles into the industrial issue and becomes a socialist.

The papers have been more nearly right than they seemed to know or intend in classing liberals as socialists and radicals; for now that is precisely what they are. Industrial democracy and socialism are convertible terms. Industrial democracy, in so far as it may be adopted, carries with it inherently a radically new type of civilization. Any liberal who accepts the principle of industrial democracy in any mode or measure is a socialist and is properly so called.

John D. Rockefeller, Jr., and those other far-seeing business leaders of his time and type, who have committed themselves to the principle of representation in industry, have thereby placed themselves in the position of leadership in the socialist movement. They will determine largely what direction that movement will take and how fast it will go but they cannot change its character as a movement for the creation of a new social order of industrial democracy, and there is no evidence that they wish to do so. They seem to know where they are going.

But in the presence of such a movement the old-fashioned liberal is as hopelessly archaic as the whigs of 1856 were on the subject of slavery.

"Word and Way" Wants a New Name

AMONG the pleasures of life is that of finding ourselves in agreement with the Word and Way. This hedonic reflection arises out of the fact that our editorial of last week suggesting that Fundamentalism be expunged from the Baptist vocabulary, is supported by the Word and Way for the same date, which contained the following editorial paragraph:

"Since there has been for several years an organization of Fundamentalists with a more or less vigorous propaganda, and since this organization, or movement, is nondenominational, or undenominational, and since it has a rather extreme program, it seems to us very unfortunate that our orthodox brethren of the Northern Baptist Convention who are leading the movement in the interest of orthodoxy and against the liberalism of Northern Baptists, should call themselves Fundamentalists, and their conferences Conferences on Fundamentals. . . . We suggest that our brethren find some other name for themselves and for their movement and program."

This quotation and the whole article from which it is taken are somewhat kaleidoscopic; every time you turn them over they present a new combination. We are at a loss for instance to know who are meant by the phrase "our orthodox brethren." We of THE BAPTIST have been standing rather stiffly for Baptist orthodoxy; but we dare not vaunt ourselves as "leading the movement." Does the Word and Way mean that the editors of THE BAPTIST occupy such a position of leadership? We blush at the possible compliment. But we hasten to assure our neighbor that we have never called our advocacy of Baptist principles Fundamentalism.

Call Us Simply Baptists?

Moreover, we are surprised to find the Word and Way, of all papers, searching for a new name for orthodox Baptists. The old name "Baptist" is ample for all of our conscious needs. What has happened to cause the Word and Way to wish for a new name?

What is "the liberalism of Northern Baptists" in which the Word and Way discovers a foe to orthodoxy? So far as any specific designation of this liberalism is concerned, nothing clearer appears in its columns than this reference to the confession adopted at Des Moines:

"We find ourselves regretting that our brethren, while they were at it, did not commit themselves in a more clear-cut and scriptural way with reference to the church. According to our judgment, they have blundered seriously in article six. . . . If we are to preserve our doctrines in their purity and power, we must preserve the ecclesiology of the New Testament. It is our sober judgment that our brethren have greatly weakened their confession of faith by their lame and unscriptural article concerning the church."

While assuring the Word and Way of our zeal for Baptist orthodoxy, we are compelled to decline a call to join it in warfare against such liberalism as that article six exhibits. We must leave the controversy to be settled between that paper and the authors of the confession, while we concern ourselves about "weightier matters."

Loud Pleas from Wild Throats

IF ANY man is inclined to treat the New World Movement lightly as a matter of secondary importance, let him consider a few sinister facts with which this movement has to deal in a remedial way.

Humanity has at last embarked on the turbulent sea of democracy. For weal or woe this great venture is now begun. God only knows how it will end. If it fails, its failure will be one of the most fearful disasters that ever overtook the human race. Every high interest of mankind is bound up with the hope of successful self-government by the people. But unless it is guided by intelligence and right social principles it will inevitably fail. The New World Movement is an attempt on the part of the Baptist denomination to contribute in an organized way the united strength of the Baptist people towards the dissemination of that intelligence and of those principles on which alone a democratic social order can be successfully maintained.

Conflicts of class against class, race against race and nation against nation, based on self-interest and jealousy, are widely prevalent and growing in intensity and bitterness. If they are permitted to continue and to grow, incalculable disaster is a certain result. But the only way to prevent their continuance and growth is to present to the fighting groups a practical program for the removal of the inequities that give rise to strife, to urge fraternal co-operation in the common interest, and to promote general goodwill and faith among the people. The New World Movement is an attempt to enlist the whole strength of the Baptist constituency for these ends in an actual, comprehensive and practical ministry of reconciliation.

The ideals of socialism are coming rapidly to dominate the thought of the masses in all lands. In the midst of this inevitable trend there is a materialistic philosophy which professes to speak in the interest of scientific socialism, denies the validity of all religions and proclaims a crusade against them. An accepted item in the theses of the Third International is opposition to all religious propaganda, especially among backward peoples; and it is based on the belief that religion is in its very nature antagonistic to intellectual and social progress. This materialistic philosophy proposes to build a new social order which shall discard altogether both the faith and the morals of Christianity; and it has grown to such proportions that millions of people follow it with the zeal of religious fanaticism. Its success would loose on earth all the evils of a faithless, conscienceless, unscrupulous, unhampered reign of selfishness and lust. But it cannot be successfully met by denunciation. Its roots run too deeply into the soil of human sincerity for any such program. In fact, it is largely a reaction of human sincerity against forms of religion which have opposed intellectual and social progress and have allied themselves with oppressors of the people. Hatred towards such religion is a virtue and the only way for any religion to escape such virtuous obloquy is to exhibit a superior seership for human welfare, a heroic devotion to humanity in forms of service that humanity can understand, and a spirit of kindness that will win goodwill. This is a definite objective of the New World Movement, which is trying to enlist the Baptists in demonstrating to materialists the reality of genuine religion and its social value for justice and brotherhood.

Predatory business, reenforced by political and military ambition, is mustering its forces for world domination. It also sneers at the ethics of Christianity, with a sneer that has no single element of moral sincerity. It is pure, stark, ruthless mammonism, the Baal worship of the twentieth century. The only sufficient barrier to its success and to the consequent utter debasement of the industrial and political order of the civilized world is to enlighten the people concerning the evils and methods of mammonism and to array them in an organized movement for its overthrow. Here again the New World Movement is trying to throw the united weight of the Baptist denomination to the support of the principles of stewardship, of service, and of a democratic industrial co-operation for the promotion of the best life for all.

And we must move quickly for wolves howl at the door.

Let Us Rejoice Together

AGAIN and again those who affect the "vice of statistics" have assured the public that the orthodoxy and loyalty of any denomination to the gospel can be accurately gauged by its evangelistic zeal and success.

Whatever merit there may be in the principle so asserted, the report of the committee on the Five-Year Program of the Northern Baptist Convention at Des Moines thunders loudly the fitness of Northern Baptists to endure such a test.

For comparison one naturally turns to the acknowledged exemplar of Baptist groups in both orthodoxy and evangelistic zeal, namely the Southern Baptists. The past year has been one of their greatest years in evangelistic work. They report 175,000 baptisms. They are rejoicing, God bless them! in such marvelous tokens of his approval. They have reason to rejoice and we rejoice with them.

But we may also invite them to rejoice with us, for we report more than 106,000 baptisms. They had at the beginning of the year 2,961,000 members; we had 1,293,000 members. Whereas they rejoice over one baptism for every seventeen members, we rejoice over one baptism for every twelve members. The ratio in our favor is twelve to seventeen.

In the light of these facts, do they honestly think that Northern Baptists are as bad as some of their papers make us? Will those papers pass the tidings along to their readers and ask them to believe that we are not wholly God-forsaken?

Day-Dawn In Europe

*Address delivered at the Northern Baptist Convention
Des Moines, Iowa, on Sunday Evening, June 26th, 1921*

By J. H. RUSHBROOKE, M. A., D. D.,
Baptist Commissioner for Europe

BY NEXT Sunday I expect to be far out on the Atlantic. The voyage across the ocean will perhaps afford leisure to sort out the impressions that have crowded upon me, during two months' stay in your wonderful continent. But this I already know: when I do get my perspective, certain special events and occasions will stand distinct and clear. Most conspicuous will be the unforgettable assemblies at Chattanooga and at Des Moines. They have given me a fresh sense of the strength and spirit of the Baptist people, and of the enormous significance not only for Europe but for the future of the Kingdom of God of their united impact. Yet these outstanding gatherings are but pyramid-peaks resting upon broad bases of awakened and alert Christian sympathy and brotherhood.

Everybody Concerned Over Europe

Concern for Europe I have found everywhere, from the hearer who lately thrust a few dollars into my hand, and was hardly persuaded to tell his name, to your distinguished Secretary of State, Charles E. Hughes and President Warren G. Harding. I recall a very pleasant meeting at a Woman's College in the South, where the young people gave me the warmest of welcomes, and alongside it I place the Ministers' Meeting at Boston—surely unique in the Baptist world. In these very different groups the same temper was manifest. Nor has it been confined to the United States. A flying visit to Canada was the occasion not merely of remarkable gatherings but of decisive action. We have since learned that the Canadian conventions will in the coming autumn be asked to adopt a scheme for immediate and generous participation in the effort for Europe, and concerning their answer there is not a shred of a shade of a doubt. I go back to my work glad and thankful—your debtor for a thousand acts of courtesy and kindness North, South, East and West. I go back profoundly grateful for this above all, that after continuous and intimate contact here with Baptists of every group and variety, I may assure your brethren of the "old continent" that the millions of their co-religionists in North America stand unanimously and whole-heartedly with them.

My duty at this great convention is primarily to give an account of my stewardship. You have heard that a deeply significant departure was taken at the London Conference in July last. That conference was composed of members of the executive committee of the Baptist World Alliance, together with representatives of various missionary boards (including especially those of the Northern and Southern Conventions), of the European countries where Baptist work exists, of Canada and of Australia. This international meeting decided upon a scheme of relief, reached an understanding as to missionary policy in Europe, and furthermore resolved that the Baptists of the world should support and assist the feeble groups exposed to political disability or persecution. The decisions have been put into effect by the action of three of the stronger Baptist executive bodies—the two foreign mission boards on this side and the British continental committee. The Canadian Baptists are soon to take a large part; and closely associated with these are Swedish, Norwegian and Argentine Baptists, who are all assisting "according to their several ability." Even from Congolese Africa, contributions have been sent. We have today a Baptist world-consciousness; we are able to speak of a Baptist world-movement; and the program for Europe represents part of a Baptist world-policy.

This Cannot be Done in a Day

It is with Europe that I have to deal, and with scarcely more than half a year; for it was only in November last that I entered upon my work and began to put into operation the plans of the London Conference. These months have been crowded with tasks and problems. Not in a day could our far-reaching schemes be carried out; indeed, they are still by no means fully realized. So many questions are open, and so much needed to be done quickly, that it is almost with an uneasy conscience that I find myself enjoying your fellowship on this side of the Atlantic instead of working on the other. My consolation is this, that in putting you in possession of information, in seeking to intensify your interest, in assisting the deliberations of your boards, I am serving Europe.

A Story of Beginnings

My story is, as I have indicated, chiefly concerned with beginnings. In one direction alone is it possible to claim that the program drawn up last July is already fully and adequately operative. That program includes a scheme for the relief of material need in ten lands of Europe, the relief to be continued for three years if necessary, but (it is hoped) on a diminishing scale. In the first year about $350,000 were to be expended. Thanks to preliminary investigation for which my most competent comrade and valued dear friend, Dr. Brooks, was mainly responsible, and to the accurate information which representatives of continental countries furnished in London, there was no delay in sending remittances. Before leaving my church to take up my full duties as Commissioner, I had also secured already the appointment of relief committees and treasurers in every country that could be reached by letters, and so was able to forward cheques immediately. As to the countries that could not be dealt with by correspondence, satisfactory contact was established soon afterwards. I have been able in the course of four special journeys to penetrate into all but two of the ten lands receiving relief, and to examine on the spot the use of funds, the methods of distribution, of bookkeeping and of audit, and so forth. The two exceptions are Esthonia and Bulgaria, but from both these countries I have detailed returns including even the name of every recipient and the amount granted in each case. Thus I am able to tell you that, so far as care and honesty can assure such a result, not the smallest fraction of your money has anywhere been wasted or misapplied.

Two points should be emphasized under this head of material relief, firstly the range of our scheme, and secondly the effect of our operations.

(1) As to its range, it was rightly and wisely decided in London to deal with the needs of Baptists and of those who could be reached through our Baptist communities. We were bound to consider first our fellow-Baptists, not only because of our close relation to them, but because we had evidence that in some countries "dissenters" were black-listed in the administration of general relief funds. But we refused to "shut up our bowels of compassion" from others: the London Conference decided that we would also "go in the spirit of Christ with relief for all who suffer, regardless of religious or racial differences." So we have used the knowledge possessed by our people of the conditions of their neighbors; taking every precaution against overlapping, we have entrusted them with such funds as they could wisely administer on behalf of other sufferers, and we have dealt also with the needs of certain clearly-defined non-Baptist groups, such as University students in Vienna, Budapest, Warsaw and elsewhere.

They Know Us Better Now

(2) As to the results, they have been happy indeed. A year ago our people in Central and Eastern Europe were oppressed and depressed by the burden of poverty, and still more by the sense of isolation. They had waited and suffered long, and they could not realize our difficulties in getting into contact with them. It seemed as if we had failed them in their necessity. To-day from the Baltic to the Mediterranean, and from the Bay of Biscay to the Black Sea, they know that our heart feels for them and that brotherhood in Christ is a reality and a power. In countless Baptist homes, of impoverished Hungary and Czecho-Slovakia, of desolated Latvia and Poland, of famished Austria, lives have been saved and health restored. Students in Warsaw and Budapest and Vienna, who had never heard of Baptists, have found that in their struggle with appalling poverty Baptists were mindful of them—they have heard of us now. Farmers in Poland and France, who had lost everything, have been given a new chance with the help of Baptist money. We did not set out to win applause, but to discharge a Christian obligation; yet I rejoice to report the impressions which men of other confessions have received of the spirit of our enterprise. President Masatyk of Czecho-Slovakia, Acting-President Caksta of Latvia, Kultus-minister Wass of Hungary, are but three among many statesmen who have spoken with me of the value of our work. And men that knew nothing of us, or knowing but little despised us, have come to thank God for Baptists.

Where Our Helping Hand Reaches

Pass on to another section of my report. The London Conference adopted a missionary policy of far-reaching import. In dealing with relief (I should have told you just now) we have one common fund to which all who are able may contribute, with over 90 percent of the money coming through the two American boards; but in regard to missionary policy another method was chosen. Here the larger unions or conventions were asked to accept, either separately or in co-operation, direct responsibility for one or more of the European Baptist groups, and to offer such moral and material assistance as shall further the work of the smaller union without impairing its autonomy or enfeebling its sense of responsibility. In this connection considerable burdens have been most willingly accepted by the two American conventions; to save time, I will enumerate only those your own Foreign Mission Society has undertaken. They concern:

FRANCE, with French-speaking Belgium and Switzerland.

CZECHO-SLOVAKIA (here you co-operate with British Baptists).

POLAND (except that the German-speaking Baptists of America will probably care for the purely German work in the land.)

NORWAY and DENMARK.

ESTHONIA, LATVIA, LITHUANIA and NORTHERN RUSSIA (for these countries responsibility is shared with Canada and Great Britain.)

First Comes First

I have already said that only the relief section of the London program is fully in operation. You will readily understand why this is so. To meet physical wants was an immediate duty and a comparatively simple duty. It is not difficult to ascertain the extent and nature of bodily need, and to set up machinery for satisfying it; it is a far more complicated task to formulate a missionary policy for a whole country (especially where conditions are so unstable as is too often the case in Europe) and to decide the amount of support that its various items should receive from abroad. As to the general principles of our action regarding mission work in continental Europe, I have my own clean-cut convictions, and they are in perfect harmony with those of the mission boards on both sides of the Atlantic. Such points as these are clear:

(1) It would be a mistaken policy to send over any considerable number of men; European countries can be effectively evangelized only by their own citizens.

(2) Our task is to develop native leadership, and the very best service we can render—as is abundantly demonstrated in the experience of Sweden and Germany—is to support efficient seminaries and Bible schools in the various lands. For some time to come, perhaps for a whole generation or more, native resources will be unequal to this task.

(3) The present impoverished condition of Central and Eastern Europe calls for financial assistance on an exceptional scale, at all events for a few years, in order to enable our people to maintain ministers and evangelists, to restore places of worship destroyed or damaged during the war, to undertake new building operations, and to maintain and develop a Baptist literature.

A Dollar Worth Half a Cent

If time permitted, I would describe the economic situation in martyred Latvia, a little-known land that has suffered terribly; in Poland, whose money, when I was there three months ago was exchanging at one one-hundred-and-eightieth of its nominal value (imagine your dollar worth little more than half a cent in the international market!); or in Czecho-Slovakia. Terrible impoverishment compelled the relief action I have described; but consider the wider and deeper effects of economic chaos. All available resources are in many parts of Europe exhausted in the effort to maintain bare existence; universities, schools, libraries, museums are starved; there is no money for scientific investigation. Intellectual standards are woefully lowered; the whole mental life of the people—everything that marks human existence as higher than animal—is imperilled. How directly this appears in its application to the churches. Pastors cannot be supported; many have had to seek other means of livelihood; evangelists cannot be appointed; young men cannot be trained for the ministry of the world; literature—even Bibles and hymn-books—cannot be produced. We have to help, and thank God we are helping. In the wide field entrusted to your Mission Society, mission budgets for France, Czecho-Slovakia, Poland, and the Baltic States are drawn up and approved; remittances have already been made to France, Czecho-Slovakia, and Poland, as well as to the less distressed lands, of Norway and Denmark; ere long remittances to the Baltic lands will follow. Before the close of the year four new seminaries will probably be operating in Europe—two in your own special fields, and others are projected. The whole mission program is not yet effective; but I affirm with gratitude to God that more has been done in the interest of our European evangelical work during the past six months than in any quarter of a century aforesaid. Your coming in has heartened the brethren and their prospect today is radiant.

Against Principalities and Powers

I must deal more briefly with the question that comes next. The bad, old tradition of Europe included almost everywhere the elements of religious inequality and disability. New States have now arisen; will the bad old tradition persist or reassert itself? It matters enormously that while these countries are in a plastic condition we shall watch the shaping of constitutions, the course of legislation, the acts of administrators. If wrong things are done they must be challenged forthwith, and not allowed to become precedents. And so a further set of duties is cast upon me as your representative. In general, let me say, the political changes in Europe have enlarged the bounds of liberty, especially of religious liberty. Nevertheless, I have had to approach statesmen in Czecho-Slovakia and Hungary respecting minor grievances, and to associate myself with an emphatic and happily thus far successful protest against the attempt to secure a position of extended privilege for Roman Catholicism in the Polish constitution. The toughest task—not yet by any means carried through—has confronted us in Roumania. There our places of worship have been closed and our people sadly mishandled, until at last intolerance culminated in a decree of the Kultus-ministry so framed as to break up our organization, to make our preaching illegal and impossible, and to leave it within the power of the officials utterly to uproot and destroy every Baptist community.

I cannot tell this evening the whole story—thrilling as it is in many of its details—of what our people have endured and of the steps that in consultation with American Baptists I have taken to help them. The latest facts are these. Just before coming to America, I undertook with Dr. Glover of Cambridge a hurried visit to Bukarest in order to speak with the Kultus-minister and certain of his colleagues. We had two interviews with the minister. At the first, we received from him a document setting forth the most recent developments of the official policy, and we stated our position in regard to religious liberty. Above all I was able to inform him that, comparatively few as were Baptists in Roumania—less than twenty thousand, they were part of a world-force of many millions. Moreover they included men that count. How could Baptists be treated as outlaws or dangerous to good government and sound morals when they numbered in their ranks President Harding and Secretary Hughes of the United States and Prime Minister Lloyd George? The mere mention of these names awakened respect. Before the second interview in Bukarest some correspondence took place. The minister had asked us to formulate our demands in writing. Here is an extract from the letter sent in response:

What Freedom Means to Us

"You have asked us to express the wishes of those whom we represent, that is to say, of the Baptists of the world. The single wish of the Baptists everywhere is for genuine religious freedom. Genuine religious freedom includes inter alia:—freedom of thought and belief; freedom of worship, both public and private; freedom of association for religious purposes; freedom of preaching and teaching, without limitation of place, either in owned or hired buildings or in private houses or under the open sky; freedom for the Baptist churches to exercise their own self-government—i. e. (among other things) to determine their own local and central methods of organization and to choose their own officers."

Our second interview took place only two days after the first, and its issue was amazing. We had come prepared to insist that the Roumanian government must make a fresh start in its dealings with our people, but the minister anticipated us with a declaration of his own. He had consulted his colleagues, he said, and had come to us directly from an audience with the King of Roumania. He would read a statement of policy approved by his fellow-ministers and sanctioned by the King. The statement, sent on in writing a few hours later, included these promises:

The repressive decree to which we objected should be withdrawn.

A new decree should be promulgated granting among other things (a) freedom of worship; (b) freedom of organization; national or regional; (c) freedom of preaching.

The position of the Baptists should be regulated by a special law informing them the rights already possessed by confessions recognized by the Roumanian Government.

A Good Decree is Followed Up

He asked whether such a declaration would satisfy us, and I answered that it was good so far as it went; but of course everything would turn upon details and methods of application. He courteously promised to keep in touch with me while working out the details, and to allow me complete freedom of intercourse with our congregations. The interview ended with a suggestion on his part that I should arrange a visit to the country in September, and be present at the Coronation Festival, to which the government would send me an official invitation.

There the matter rests. Strong in your support, having the right to speak for the Baptists of the world, I have been able to secure this Magna Charta for our persecuted brethren. I am not so foolish as to suppose all is yet in order. There is local bigotry in Roumania; officials will need watching; old, bad traditions do not suddenly lose their power. Some disquieting reports have come from the field since my visit; I expected them. But the central government is openly committed to a policy of freedom; that is the great new decisive fact, and its full significance will be gradually unfolded. Our brethren may still endure hardness, but light has dawned, and the sun of freedom will steadily ascend to meridian brightness. Had nothing else been secured than this (said Dr. Clifford as he heard of the changed attitude of the Roumanian Government) the London Conference would have been abundantly worth while.

Europe's Heart Warms Toward Us

My account of my stewardship is finished, Mr. President but I ask your indulgence for three concluding words:

First: I wish emphatically to acknowledge the splendid generosity of American Baptists. From all the recipient lands, I am enjoined to express the deep gratitude of those you have helped. The heart of Europe is warm towards these States. And

I, an Englishman, am thankful beyond words that by the grace of God, and the generous trust of my brethren on this side of the Atlantic, I have been privileged to act as your Commissioner for Europe and to express to our brethren and for our brethren the mind and heart of American Baptists, yes, of Baptists throughout the whole earth. In bearing the responsibilities entrusted to me, I have been sustained by the un-failing confidence of your Foreign Mission Board and its secretary, my good friend, Dr. Franklin, and not less generous has been the encouragement and support of Dr. Love and his colleagues of the Southern Board. In this matter all are standing together, one in spirit and in action. I cherish the memory of a recent Sunday morning in Dr. Truett's Church at Dallas. By my side on the platform sat Dr. J. B. Gambrell, an earnest listener to the story I have told tonight. At the end of my address the old man rose to his feet. He could scarce make himself heard, yet he could not refrain from utterance, and his speech—it must have been his last in public—contained but one sentence: "This shows what Baptists can do when they are united."

My second word is this: Your brethren on the continent of Europe are worthy of the best you can do for them. You have seen some of them—men and women—during this convention. Were there time I could tell much to the praise of their loyalty, their patience, their heroism; and much also of their success under adverse conditions. In Latvia there is a definite revival; church membership has increased 12 per cent in recent months. In Czecho-Slovakia we are beginning to gather in those who had deserted Rome; forty were baptized in Prague on one Sunday evening a month ago. What say you to news that came to me this last week? The Baptists of Hungary—poverty-stricken Hungary, to which we have had to send food and clothing, and for which we must still do much—heard that British Baptists were appealing for famine-stricken China, and a month ago they spontaneously remitted 55,000 crowns—about 250 dollars—to help China. Truly "their deep poverty has abounded unto the riches of their liberality." Our Southern brethren may well be proud of the privilege of helping such people.

Thirdly and lastly: Do not slacken your effort or lessen your gifts. Your prayers, your counsel, your money, are needed. In some countries definite improvement appears, but distress is still widespread; and before long, when Russia is open, a heavier call than ever will be made upon you. I know you will not fail. Nay, let me enlarge the terms: Britain and Canada, Sweden, Norway and South America are with you in this work. Together we register our vow: we will not fail our God and our brethren. We will stand by them in their struggles for freedom. To their material needs we will not be indifferent. Above all, we will help them, amid the formality and failure of state-established ecclesiasticalisms and of sacramental and sacerdotal systems, to utter our truly catholic, apostolic, evangelical message of the grace of God in the cross of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, whose we are and whom we serve.

Community Church Campaign in Boise, Idaho

BY FLOYD I. BECKWITH

TEN of the Protestant churches of Boise, Idaho, have recently concluded a community church campaign that has attracted unusual attention throughout the Rocky Mountain district.

The campaign had its inception following a union Thanksgiving service last November. The pastor of the First Baptist Church preached the sermon. The attendance was the largest that ever attended such a service in the capitol city of Idaho. The success of this meeting convinced the pastors of the ten leading Protestant churches in the city that Boise would pack the largest auditorium available in any worthy union effort led by her own pastors.

It was accordingly decided to hold union evangelistic meetings beginning Feb. 20 and continuing until March 13. Executive, arrangements, finance, ushers, prayer-meetings, personal workers, music, publicity, and speakers' committees were appointed and the work of preparation begun.

We adopted the slogan, "By Boise, for Boise," as tersely expressing the fact that the meetings were home made, carried on in Boise auditoriums by Boise churches, with Boise speakers and Boise singers, backed by thousands of Boise people for the religious and moral welfare of all Boise without regard to creed, class, party or group; but a common contribution to the good of all churches, all religion, all conscience, all business, all labor, and all life in Boise.

The prayer-meeting committee, under the direction of Rev. J. A. Glendenning, pastor of the First M. E. Church, conducted more than three hundred prayer meetings in all parts of the city. Some of the first converts of the campaign were born in the cottage prayer meetings.

Rev. Jessie H. Baird, pastor of the First Presbyterian Church, headed the personal workers' committee. He divided his committee into seven groups, which in addition to doing remarkable service in the meetings, visited every home in the city with invitations to the meetings and hundreds of talks on personal religion.

A community chorus was organized consisting of the combined singers of all of the co-operating churches, under the direction of Rev. J. George Cunningham, pastor of the First United Presbyterian Church. The "big sing" began promptly at 7:30 each evening, but so great was the interest in the meetings that the great auditorium of the campaign church, the First M. E., was well filled almost an hour before the time set for the opening of the praise service. Some nights it became necessary to hold as many as three overflow meetings.

Beginning with the second week of the campaign, noon day meetings for men only were held in the auditorium of the Y. M. C. A. These were addressed by leading business and professional men of Boise, well known to all citizens, on the theme, "Why I am a Christian." The cumulative effect of these testimonies by men of the highest standing in the community can never be calculated. It is certain to be a permanent asset in the work of the churches in this city.

The Baptist pastor was selected "Bishop" of the campaign, and the whole authority of appointing speakers as well as presiding at the meetings was turned over to him. The job looked formidable. Nobody coveted it, but it became a delightful experience. All personal ambitions were submerged for the good of the campaign. The congregations of the various churches got together by "working together and praying together." The pastors of all of the churches were accepted with appar-

Where the Gospel Had Never Been Preached

These missionary pioneers toured the hills where tigers, leopards and pythons roamed. In large temples they had to lock the doors when the house was full to prevent overcrowding. In a large crowd only one man was able to read.

BY EVERETT S. BURKET

IN obedience to the Macedonian call from across the border of the neighboring province of Fukien, we recently renewed for three strenuous weeks the joy of carrying the good tidings into "the regions beyond." Mr. Wiens, a neighbor of the Mennonite Baptist Mission located three day's journey away in Fukien, was our companion. He gave lantern pictures of the life of our Lord and the writer did most of the preaching.

Rain or Shine, People Came

In chapels, ancestral halls, temples, schools and homes, rain or shine, we found the people gathered in great crowds to hear the gospel and see the pictures. We rode considerably over 200 miles on our little ponies, often arising by half-past three or four in order to get away in time to meet the next appointment across one or more high mountains. Sometimes we were soaked to the skin as we drove along through torrential rains and forded swollen streams. Wet clothes had to dry on us as best they could. Once a bitter north wind suddenly blew up and an almost tropical day was turned into winter cold.

The crowds that came to the meetings were enough to warm the heart and make the trip a constant joy. So great were the numbers at some points, especially in the big temples in the larger centres, that we had to lock the doors after the audience threatened to get beyond our control. Most of the people had never seen or heard of a stereopticon, and we were all but mobbed at times in their anxiety to see and hear all that they could. It was with a singing heart that we turned our pony's face homeward for the three day's return trip across Ma Thein Tung (horse heaven) to Changning and "home."

A "Dim Religious Light"

Several incidents of the trip stand out most prominently. One is the scene on a Saturday night in a room of a little chapel where the missionary was staying over Sunday, preparatory to taking the steep climb over into Fukien. The room was dark and crowded almost to suffocation. The flickering light of the primitive native lamp barely sufficed to bring the many faces into dim relief. We were preparing to give an Easter sermon the next morning, so the conversation was turned into a discussion of the contribution of native religions to the hope for immortality. In the dim light minds and hearts were opened freely. Never before has the writer glimpsed so clearly into native thought of the life after death. As one would expect who is acquainted with the vagueness of the teaching of Oriental "religions" as to the future, the views presented were often obscure and crude.

The substance of the talk that night and the views presented may prove interesting. Those of Taoism were the most confused of all. "Lien tan tshiu kho chhin sien," which translated, means, "prepare the elixir of life and thus accomplish immortality." Just what the nature of this "tan," or elixir, is, not even the educated seem to know.

In Buddhism the road is a trifle plainer, though to the popular mind at least, far from being clearly defined. The desired goal is to become a Buddha. Here the body is preserved and perpetuated for future milleniums to worship and the spirit returns to the land of ghosts, never more to be reincarnated. There it has the power to bring blessing or calamity upon the living. To attain this, there are three indispensable requirements, fong sen, nyam kin and shih tsai. The first is most vague. It literally means to release life. The form which it takes is merely the releasing of a few captive birds and fishes at the great festival time in the fall. The natural interpretation of this doctrine, at least to one with the Christian viewpoint, would be to relieve human suffering.

One Might Eat His Grandfather

But such has evidently never occurred to the Buddhist mind. The setting free of a few thrushes and fishes, bought especially for the occasion, is done with loud noise and a great show of generosity. It is difficult to discover the merit in it in view of the deplorable neglect of human life all about. The second refers to the chanting of the Buddhist liturgies. This is done to the accompaniment of rhythmic drumming upon a wooden fish and repetitious imploring of the name of Amida Buddha. This also has no application to daily life. The third tenet is vegetarianism. Refrain from flesh, for it may be that of a fellow human being who has been degraded to the form of a pig, dog or other animal in punishment for sins committed in a former existence. Very few practice this belief, for meat forms the chief delicacy of Chinese culinary art.

This three-fold path is the way to relief from the burden of sinful self and the attainment of the blissful state of everlasting freedom from the yoke of life in the flesh. (It should be emphasized here that this is written without reference to the many philosophical works on the subject which are sometimes difficult to reconcile with current beliefs of unphilosophical native minds. It is given merely as an attempt to give what was heard from that group of dimly-seen faces and other groups with whom we have talked from time to time).

The most powerful force perhaps in the moulding of China, the ethical system of Confucius, was also discussed that night with reference to its teaching as to the future. There was little to be said as "the Master" was silent on this point, except to say in reply to a question of one of his disciples, "We do not know life: how can we know death?" (Vi chz sen: yen chz si). The only hope that He gives for the future, is, that by right living we may acquire such a reputation and name as will be remembered after we are dead.

Vi Chz Sen: Yen Chz Si

Is it any wonder that after an evening of such discussion as the above, with its revelation of how poverty-stricken and hopeless are the native religions, so-called, with regard to man's inborn desire for immortality, the missionary was able to preach the next day as he had never been able to preach before, on the joyous hope of the Christian as established by that Easter morning miracle long years before? "I am the resurrection and the life: he that believeth on Me, though he die yet shall he live; and whosoever liveth and believeth on Me shall never die." The speaker was greatly astonished when at the close of the sermon the people gave spontaneous expression to their joy in the message in a way that he had never seen these quiet mountaineers do before. The Oriental heart craves assurance and hope for the dim unknown even as does the Occidental.

Another striking incident of the trip was on the following Monday evening. We had crossed the mountain into Fukien. Night was falling fast. There were still several miles to go before we could get to WuPhin Sz, where we had planned to spend the night. Therefore we stopped at a little village among the foothills to ask for lodging for the three of us, carrier, pony and self. At first some reluctance was shown, a foreigner being a distinct novelty in that remote and little-travelled section. Finally a little old lady said she would find room for us. We reined in with much relief, not relishing travel in the dark over an unknown path, where several hills, thickly forested, were to be crossed and where tigers, leopards and an occasional python, roamed at night.

Having eaten our picnic supper and made our bed of straw (on top of a door which the landlady permitted us to take down from its wooden sockets), we were preparing to seek early rest after a climb over the highest and steepest mountain pass in three provinces. But in came groups of villagers and soon the hall where our bed was made was filled with men, women and children. They were friendly and very inquisitive, especially about the foreigner's food, apparel, bedding and the land whence he came. Soon we were asked what our business was. This was what we were looking for, so we got out tracts, Bible and hymn book for a short service. None had heard the gospel before. Interest was intense. It was a great disappointment to find, when we came to distribute tracts, that there was not an educated person in the whole village! Fortunately there was one man who could read a little. We gave him a few of the simplest tracts and he read them aloud, the people standing around listening and making frequent comments, which gave a foreigner a clew to their thinking and a chance to drive home the truth.

Some Ghoulish Gods

The story of a loving Heavenly Father who gave His Son for their salvation, was strange and almost unbelievable tidings. The gods to them are fearful beings who must be propitiated at every turn. The worship of these terrible spirits has no relation to sin or morality. They are only to be implored in case of sickness or calamity. If there are friendly and loving spirits, they may be ignored as harmless. Fellowship and reliance upon a God who loves and cares, is unknown. No wonder these simple folk, hearing the good news of peace and freedom in a Father's love, lingered on so late that the missionary could barely keep his eyes open.

There are countless thousands of these villages hidden among the mountains and scattered over the plains of China. In the vast majority of them, no preacher of the gospel has yet appeared with his saving, comforting message. Chapters are few and far between. Missionaries are so few as to be a curiosity in wide stretches of inland China. Native leaders, the ultimate hope of the Christ in China, are still but a few grains of sand on the shore of the ocean. We must have more workers and better support from Christian lands. There must be greater emphasis laid upon training and inspiring native leadership and native support. Above all there must be a quickening at home and abroad by the Holy Spirit of every heart and every church, until we shall know no rest nor peace aside from whole-hearted devotion to our superhuman task and to Him who is one with us in that task and who laid it upon us.

Changning, China.

ent equal approbation. The plan of the speaking was worked out by the speakers' committee, and was gone over carefully with each man so that when his turn came he knew exactly what was expected of him. Nobody knew who was to speak, except of course the "Bishop" and the man appointed, until the moment of introduction, but the way in which each man measured up to the occasion was truly wonderful. All Boise is proud of its pastors. The perfect harmony, enthusiasm, and teamwork was frequently remarked upon, and "Behold how they love each other" was heard on all sides. Every preacher had the same objective, and while one preacher was delivering the message, his brethren were backing him up with their sympathy and prayers. There was not even a hint of controversialism. There wasn't a sermon that wouldn't have been equally suitable in any one of the ten churches cooperating. Boise has never been so impressed before.

More than 400 were received into the membership of the Boise churches as a result of the campaign. The Baptist pastor has already received fifty-nine, forty-six of whom were immersed.

Union Holy Week services were held in the St. Michel's Cathedral (Episcopal), at which the pastors of five of the down-town churches spoke. The Baptist pastor gave the Thursday address. Bishop Touret requested the Baptist pastor to arrange for these meetings.

A community baptismal service was held in the First Baptist church Easter afternoon. Five pastors took part, four of them taking turns.

A Layman's Notes on Missions in India

Business man contrasts Christian school with Bombay red-light district. Common people of India are industrial slaves. Municipality of Bombay tries out apartment houses—such as they are. "Let's get busy."

By P. A. SNELL

Actual observation of mission schools and churches in the three largest cities of India having an aggregate population of over three million, has proven to one layman that this kind of endeavor, where put over by live, earnest workers is unquestionably accomplishing much for those who come under its influence. It is making many thousands of sincere native Christians who in turn are having a decided influence for good on their neighbors of Oriental religious faiths.

Look at These Two

Personal visits by the writer to quite a number of church services and schools show very conclusively that much of the missionary work pays large dividends in converts to the Christian faith and the general moral uplift of many more. The contrast, for instance, between the squalor and filth of a Bombay red light district and a Christian school of three hundred pupils—only a few blocks away—the appearance of the children in the native quarters where there are no schools or churches—compared to those within or near the school grounds was manifest and so pronounced that one commenced to realize that only the influence of Christ upon and within then could possibly create such vast difference of actions and appearance.

In one of these native Christian services of 225 people, the first surprise was to count about 75 boys from six to twelve years, 25 girls of same ages, 35 more boys and girls between twelve and eighteen and about 90 adults. This large percentage of boys and girls in a strictly church service illustrated the hope of Christianity in foreign fields.

This hope must be realized through the boys and girls of today and tomorrow. It's a great credit to any missionaries' efforts who can produce such percentages in native Christian services.

Fine Clothes no Means of Grace

The second surprise in attending various native Christian meetings was the pronounced quiet and true reverence especially during reading of the Word and prayers also throughout the entire services. During thirty years visits to hundreds of American church services of various denominations the writer has never witnessed better attention or reverence, seldom as good as that shown in most services held by Indian Christians—with particular stress on that of the young people of their audiences.

Whether in a fine church building or under a shed out in the open of a mill section of the city this attention to and reverence of God's word was ever pronounced. Those attending showed plainly that they had come to hear more about Him whom they loved and served. Perhaps it's fortunate that neither the men, women or children can afford fine clothes or hats and that their attention is not distracted by such things from the worship of God.

From their looks one realizes too that they are not hindered by the thought of tomorrow or how they are going to make money by taking whatever advantage of their brother the law might allow—wordly ambitions do not hinder them during the public worship of God.

The third surprise was to hear a native judge, a layman, take the preacher's place and preach a sermon which evidently inspired his native audience and drew them close to Him whom we all love.

At this point, the writer desires to offer this suggestion: viz, that a committee of laymen be appointed to visit all our foreign fields at least once every two years to examine into the real work of mission and make recommendations which shall be the basis of further action and policy of the board at headquarters locally and at home. It is the writer's humble opinion that we shall never make real headway in Missions until the business men of our churches get interested in and get behind of this great work of the Kingdom. We have been passing the real responsibility of it all to the women (God bless them) for so many years that many of us know little of anything regarding foreign missions except that there is such work going on in some part of the world. We Christian people have been merely playing at the great question of Missions and do not realize anything of its importance or great possibilities. Let's get busy and do something really worth while for Him who has done so much for all of us.

Scatters his Betters With a Ford

Let's understand more of our brothers across the seas and do as God has commanded us to and as is our greatest opportunity: viz, to do good to others. Let's make a real business of Missions and show our interest and faith in His ability through us to make His Kingdom come. Far less than half of all people of this old world of ours have had an opportunity of knowing or hearing anything about Him. Let's get busy at the real job.

Contact with actual life in India shows the people can suffer and take white man's abuse and rarely say anything back. They are in many instances and to a large degree industrial slaves of the white man and subjected to laws and conditions over which they have no control or in which they have had no voice. Do not let us forget that such white men come from and are part of the product of so-called Christian lands and civilization. Have not the Christian lands of which America is one, much to prove to their so-called heathen lands (which are not heathen at all) before we can lay any real claim to our great superiority as Christian nations? Have we not much to prove by our every-day lives that our Christian religion is so far superior to that of the Mohammedan or Hindoo or the Burmese Buddhist? One cannot witness the simple driving of a Ford car by a white Christian through a street filled with natives without questioning who is the superior religiously? Cross looks, commands to get out of the way—often profane words and curses, are the common methods connected with this simple passing of a humble Ford along the busy streets of Indian cities.

Rarely does one hear a murmur of complaint for the exceedingly narrow and frequent escapes from being run down. Revise the situation and the black or brown native of India or Egypt would be mobbed and possibly killed in any American or English city.

Rents $1.00 a Month

The municipal authorities in Bombay and elsewhere, to create a better living condition are erecting dozens of apartment houses, each single, no double apartments, renting for 4 rupees equal to about $1.00 per month. Two dark rooms are lighted only by day and with only one opening for a window and air; no water except two or three general faucets in center of hall; no toilet in any apartment; no chimneys for escape of smoke—simply four bare walls, two small rooms opening off a general hall each to accommodate from four to ten persons. The buildings are four stories high, each floor having twenty to thirty such apartments. Two such buildings join at each floor with only four latrines (lavatories), for each floor, combining two sets of twenty to thirty apartments each, making from forty to sixty families compelled to use this set of four lavatories having no doors—women, men and children using them in common. Time and space will not permit further comment on such conditions.

This is a picture of the latest municipal attempt to give the city native a better and modern home to bring up his family in. Do we not need to ask God to forgive and help the white leaders from Christian lands who are responsible for the fact that such conditions exist in this the twentieth century. Low wages of from seventy-two cents and twenty-five cents per day, is the general rule throughout India.

Young Men's Buddhist Associations

The oft-repeated saying that persons or peoples must work out their own salvation seems to be having some practical application in India. One great native religious organization, numbering many more millions among its followers than our Christian religion, has started real welfare work among its own people—gym work, general out door athletics, providing appropriate places to conduct such work and well organized methods, are being put over with good results. The idea is spreading and is bound to gain throughout India and undoubtedly will spread to other countries of the Orient.

It seems a sad commentary on our religious life at home and that of our missionary endeavor that this idea has been left to a native religious organization and among and by those whom we are wont to regard as heathen. These natives have appropriated many of the regular Y. M. C. A. ideas, but unfortunately for the influence of future as well as present Christian effort, the "C" is left out and the native religious association gets credit for doing that which we should have done long ago.

A visit to such a work forces one to think of the great opportunity of contact with nature left which has been lost by us up to the present. The question is, are we going to continue to lose out by neglecting such an important work and its far-reaching possibilities to teach by living Christian principles today. Are we going to sit tight and not come across in such work for our brothers across the seas? Or are we going to get a new and larger view of Christ's work in this fast moving material world and to give of our money and of ourselves as though we really had faith in Him who died to save all men. Just a glimpse into the needs will make us feel how very small have been our efforts and how small has been our faith; also how very selfish is the kind of Christian lives that most of us have been living. God help us for we sadly need His help to see the great opportunities to do as He wants us and has commanded us to do. How can we claim to love Him unless we serve Him?

I could not end this without a strong tribute to those who started and those who are now keeping alive the great and successful Baptist mission in Burma. Nowhere in India or the Orient is any other work succeeding any better and in no other place in all Egypt or India is it being done on such a large and comprehensive scale. We can justly feel proud of those who represent our Baptist efforts in Burma but we cannot longer remain self-complacent as we have been in the past but must go ahead on a larger and still more successful work.

The Sewing Machine Helps Build a College

BY JOSEPH TAYLOR

THE picture accompanying this short article, shows Mr. Liu Dze Ru, the head of the Singer Sewing Machine Co. in Chengtu, West China, seated at a table on the porch of the West China Union University, signing his name for $10,000, Mexican, as a gift for the purpose of erecting a chapel for the Union Middle School under the care of the university. He is putting his name in the same book in which the military governor of the province of Szechuan, the civil governor of that province, and Yuan Shik Kai, the well-known president of China, wrote giving respectively $3000, $3000, and $4000 towards the endowment of the university. This plain Christian business man gives as much as those three officials put together.

Mr. Liu is a member of the Methodist Church in connection with the Canadian Methodist Mission. He is a quiet unassuming man who has helped more than one student through school. He has established schools in his own home district and is bearing the cost of an orphanage. For years he has been business agent for the Singer Sewing Machine Company in Chengtu. He is zealous in all good works, and ever ready to help. A few years ago, he placed several sewing machines in the Union Middle School and his wife came out from the city to teach our students how to use them. At the headquarters here in Chengtu, women and girls can go to learn how to use these machines. In the tailor shops throughout the city, one can see the machines in use, saving a great deal of labor and turning out better work than the clumsy hand-work of the past.

The Union Middle School was the first school started in the West China Union University. It is backed by the American Methodist Missions, the Canadian Methodist Missions, the English Friends Mission, and our own Foreign Mission Society. The principal is a Chinese graduate of Boone High School, Wuchang. The attendance this year at the school is over 200, of which our mission has sixty-two. At this writing the school occupies some ramshackle lath and plaster buildings that are in danger of falling down. In fact, some of them are propped up to prevent their doing so. During the war an American Quaker family gave over $15,000 to put up a new teaching building for the school, but, exchange being bad and builders few and far between, the building was not started until this year. On University Day, (Tuesday of Easter Week) the first brick was laid and now the walls are half way up the first-floor classrooms. It is hoped that the building will be ready for occupation in the summer of 1922. This may seem a long time in which to put up this building; but when one is acquainted with the difficulties of getting materials in West China he is content to wait.

The missionary was the first to intro-

It seems fitting, therefore, that Mr. Liu, so intimately connected with this American firm, should come forward and help the missions to build up a Christian school. It did not occur to any of those early duce the sewing machine to West China. In the first place, his wife brought one with her and caused much wonder and interest when she unpacked it and set it humming in the presence of the servants of her household. Then some progressive Chinese came and saw the wonderful thing and he wanted one. The missionary sent for catalogues and got quotations and then actually sent the money for the machine and it came all the way from America, up the Yangtze, through the gorges, over the rapids and finally landed on the mission compound and was unpacked. The Chinese crowded in to see it taken out of the crate; the owner took it away with the same kind of feeling that some farmer out in the backwoods must have taken charge of his first automobile. It is just possible that the first sewing machine was not a success as a time-saving device, or as a superior substitute; for it was probably bought more as a novelty than as a labor-saving machine. But the tailors began to see the advantage of the machine and came to the missionary asking his aid in getting one up from Shanghai. This aid was freely given and thus step by step, the trade increased until at present, the Singer Sewing Machine Co. is one of the leading foreign business firms in China.

missionaries who helped the tailor to buy a sewing machine that in the year 1921 a Chinese Christian business man would give to a Christian school the sum of $10,000. But they worked on patiently, at times seeing little return for their labor; the tailor did not attend church, but worked at his machine all Sunday. The kindness on the part of the missionary seemed to have been the means of keeping the tailor away from church; but that kindness has grown and borne fruit. This business man's gift of $10,000 is worth more to our enterprise than its face value. The news of this gift will spread throughout this province and other men of wealth will be set thinking of their relation to Christian education. Mr. Liu has given more than he signed for. He has given a worthy example of Christian stewardship; he has given an impetus to Christian giving and he has given new hope and courage to all those who are working and praying for the coming of the Kingdom of God in West China. The day of self-support has been brought nearer by this gift.

What the American Baptists ought to do is to give a young college-trained man to work in this Union Middle School. Who will match Mr. Liu's money with a life?

The Women's Foreign Jubilee

Women celebrate fiftieth anniversary with processional, pageant and prandial joy—Present $1000 to Mrs. Montgomery—Farewell to foreign guests

BY MRS. T. E. ADAMS

"Make it scintillate," says the editor. The Jubilee Celebration in the convention did scintillate. Whether this article does, is another matter. It was a beautiful and imposing ceremony that Wednesday afternoon when through the center aisle of the Convention Hall, was the stately-stepping of the Jubilee Processional.

The Leader—Helen Barrett Montgomery, President of the Jubilee year, and President of The Woman's American Baptist Foreign Mission Society, closing its fiftieth year, preceded the Processional. Following, came the other national officers, Mrs. Andrew MacLeish, Mrs. T. E. Adams, and Mrs. Grant Edmonds, long the President of the Eastern Society.

Then the Asiatic and European guests of the Society, Dr. Ma Saw Sa of Rangoon, Burma, Kahuto Bala Rai, Midnapore, Bengal, India. Kan en Vong, Hang Chow, China, Dr. Y. Nandama of Nellore, South India, Nikaji San of Osaka, Japan, Miss Martha Wenseke, Poland, and Madam Lydia Kolator, Prague, Czechoslovakia. This group in the colorful costumes of their native lands, made a charming picture, and added a rare note of distinction to the ensemble.

After these attractive personalities there came the District and Jubilee Presidents robed in white. These officers carried the district flowers in great profusion and bore the replicas of the Buildings each district is to erect in various parts of the world. This was a ceremony never before witnessed at a convention session.

Marching by the Calendar

After the District Year came the Months, Weeks and Days, even the Minutes and Seconds were not omitted, and each had a part in the grand finale. Our Jubilee Organization was on the calendar plan as you have guessed by this time.

There were many National Jubilee Days at a thousand dollars a day. There were holidays representing from $1.00 to $1,000 each. Mother's Day was a popular day among the holidays. In the Processional marched our executive officers, Miss Nellie G. Prescott, our Foreign Secretary, Miss Helen Hudson, Miss Alice Hudson, our National Treasurer, and Miss Elizabeth Sargent, and our guests of other denominations and foreign boards. Here also was the President of the Woman's Home Mission Society, and all our missionaries on furlough in this country. Altogether, it demonstrated strength, organized ability, lofty idealism, and sacrificial love, held together by an invisible bond which made the entire event so significant in its completeness.

Beginning at the Northwest, the Columbia River District, the procession crossed this great Continent, till every State was represented in its district grouping from the Pacific Coast to New York and all New England on the Atlantic Seaboard. These Districts presented to the Chief, Mrs. Montgomery, their Jubilee Report, Slogan, Song, and each apportioned amount for a Jubilee Offering, disclosing the marvelous result, every appropriation 100% paid, and in several instances almost doubled. The original $365,000 attained the cheerful proportion of $450,000. This was accomplished in six weeks of permitted effort often under almost hostile opposition in a season of unprecedented commercial and national depression. It was a convincing demonstration of ability, of initiative, of accomplishment. The dream of Helen Barrett Montgomery and her associates, Lucy W. Peabody, Martha H. MacLeish and others of a goodly fellowship, come true; their castles in the air becoming permanent buildings in concrete and stone set upon real foundations in many lands. It is a suitable Jubilee Gift, an offering upon the altar of faith, not without effort, not without prayer, not without the exercise of that sublime courage that has been the guiding principle of life back of these women as leaders, and back of the Board of Managers as representatives of the Baptist Constituency.

Jubilee Gift to the Convention

With that superb grace which characterizes all acts of Mrs. Montgomery, she presented her Society's splendid benefaction, to the Convention President the Hon. E. L. Tustin. President Tustin received the gift in a manner befitting the occasion, and in splendid phrase presented it again to the denomination then officially seated in convention.

It was a thrilling moment and some of the more thoughtful afterwards expressed themselves that a group of women so organized, so en rapport as it were, should be encouraged to keep that organized force intact with a task sufficiently large to hold its respect and within its reasonable ability as to performance.

The evening of the same day, despite the almost overwhelming tide of heat, before an audience which crowded the vast Convention Hall from pit to dome, the Woman's Baptist Foreign Society enacted its Jubilee Pageant. The book was written by Mrs. Montgomery, and was a recital of the Call into existence of the Society. Without scenery, but not without beauty of conception, the thought revolved about a symbolic figure, "The Spirit of the Society," who summoned forth history and prophecy, and the demands of the future of the races of mankind for the Christian message. The Nations were represented by our guests, whose personal contribution and impassioned pleas fully justified the Society in bringing them halfway around the world. The Call of the "Spirit of the Society" to the women made another Processional come to life. This showed the forces of our organization, including each department, of District, State, Association and Circle. It comprehended also the young women, the World Wide Guild, and the Children's World Crusade, also those members of Student Volunteers who are at present in various college classes. The beauty of the spirit of the Society, Mrs. H. E. Goodman, the serenity and poise of the President, and the triumphal recessional, will long be recalled as an appropriate panorama of a great adventure of faith and its complete and inspiring vindication. At the same time it was an earnest of what must and shall be in the days to come.

There were sidelights on the women's meeting not in Convention Hall. The regular annual meeting was held upon a veritable hill-top in the beautiful Methodist Church. On that occasion the Districts recited their slogans and sang their songs. It was at this session that many trophies were presented for goals attained, particularly in the reading contests.

The writer of these paragraphs made her little bow at this session and gave her report as Jubilee Publicity Chairman. The report consisted of a very large gold covered volume containing thousands of newspaper notices of the various district jubilees and showed the co-operation of the secular and religious press.

The master stroke of the session was when Mrs. G. W. Doane of South Orange, N. J., a member of our Board of Managers, stepped inside the chancel and addressed herself to the President, Mrs. W. A. Montgomery. In a few choice sentences which conveyed the love of her constituents, she presented Mrs. Montgomery with a golden casket which contained $1,000 in gold. It is difficult to make the public understand that no salary is attached to any woman's missionary office, no matter how imposing the title. Mrs. Montgomery has made great sacrifices in giving her time to great denominational efforts. It was a joy to make her a present for herself which she has so abundantly earned a hundred times.

Banquet and Banqueters

There was a banquet also the Saturday night of Convention Week. This as usual, was shared by the Home Mission Society and Foreign Mission Society. It was a brilliant occasion. The banquet program was in two parts. Mrs. Montgomery and Mrs. John Nuveen making brief addresses in the early part of the evening. The Toast Mistress, Mrs. Frank L. Miner, of Des Moines, introduced various speakers who knew the post-prandial art, and the responses full of devotion to our work, never lost the savor of attic-salt in introduction or in response.

The subject, "Americanization" was the theme, and the secretaries were introduced by Mrs. Laycock. Rarely have we ever had so brilliant a setting forth by an unusual company of young women. The closing toast by Miss Brunson, the Executive Secretary, was a masterly summing up of the entire subject. All agreed heartily with Mrs. Laycock's word in introduction that their Board was glad all the time when they thought of Miss Brunson. It was my duty to introduce in farewell the young guests from afar. It was the ringing down of the curtain upon a continuous activity of several months. They found it difficult to speak, but they left no doubt in the minds of the audience of the sincerity of their hearts, of their vivid appreciation of the American people, and their grief at parting with their friends old and new.

We shall think of Burma in the future, and visualize Dr. Ma Saw Sa, in her lovely serenity, her grace of movement, her clarity of thought, her Christian devotion. We shall never again think of South India without recalling Dr. Nadama, her cheery smile, her fine mind and willing hands. We shall see again the words Bengal-Orissa, but they will recall a slender quick-moving figure, in a rose-colored sari, secured in a fascinating manner over smooth black hair and hear the merry laugh of a young girl from the other side of the world. Who will ever forget Kan en Vong, her engaging smile, her earnestness in presenting the needs of "mighty land of China." When papers are discussing Japanese politics and policies, we shall see the beautiful figure of Miss Nikaji San, and hear her impassioned utterance to bring the Christian message to her flowery kingdom.

Some day I may find at the bottom of my ink well the story of that trans-continental trip. Until then,

"The sweetest flower that grows,

I give you as we part

For you it is a rose,

For me, it is my heart."

The culminating scenes in the Convention came with the report of a nominating committee presented the name of Mrs. W. A. Montgomery, as candidate for the convention presidency. It was practically an unanimous choice, there were a few of the men who still think there is sex in brains, and that the monopoly is held by the masculine persuasion. The women of the Foreign Society felt suddenly bereft of a great leader, but as she is still a member of our Board and the duties of the Convention will last but one little short-long year, we have to submit and look pleasant the while. The nominating committee presented the name of Mrs. Andrew McLeish as President of the W. A. B. E. M. Society; Mrs. Nathan Wood of Mass., Foreign V. P., Mrs. H. E. Goodman of Illinois, Admn. V. P., Mrs. T. E. Adams, of Ohio, was again elected Recording Secretary.

It may interest our constituency to know the present location of our foreign guests.

Madam Kolator and Miss Wenske, sailed in July for Europe.

Dr. Ma Saw Sa is in Johns Hopkins Hospital, Baltimore for a post course.

Kan en Vong is visiting in Toledo.

Khanto Pala Rai is spending July with Miss Daniels in Michigan.

Nikji San is spending a month with Mrs. Geo. Young in Minneapolis.

Dr. Nandama is at Hazleton House, Newton Center, Mass.

Impressions of the Convention

serious charges: all teaching heresy; our young people led astray; modernism (what is it?) undermining the whole Baptist institution; were open charges of infidelity, atheism, etc. A committee of investigation (practically named by those who asked for it) was appointed. There were two reports at Des Moines. The main report was exhaustive, thorough, decent, kindly, and of course, honest. The committee tried to trace the charges, reports of bad teaching, etc., and came back and reported that they found nothing seriously lacking in our schools. Indeed the committee discovered that the men of the past ten years (graduated from seminaries) have had more baptisms to their credit, (and more money raised,) than the men of the previous ten years;—to such a pass have we come that the "vice of statistics" is again fastening its hold upon us; and we ought to be correspondingly ashamed! By this test some of the greatest men of the past would be discredited. The convention acted wisely in adopting or "receiving" the minority report, also.

Nor are we getting anywhere doctrinally. The lovable teacher who gave the "fundamental" position on the Old Testament at Des Moines, caused not a little ear-pricking when he said: "Considering the imperfections (in the Old Testament) which must be found in a progressive revelation given through sinful men—yet they did not cause Jesus to stumble!" Guess that gun is loaded—and we are not getting anywhere!

They Will Not Swallow It

Second: Baptists are restive under the creedal suggestion. They won't take it. We are Calvinists, Arminians, premillennial, post-millennial, and "neither." We have lived in peace, worked together in harmony until the war hit us, opening up the whole old, age-long fight over "last things," since which time we have been in a mess, together with other denominations. All this, coupled with certain declarations on "inspiration," has landed us into confusion worse confounded.

I don't believe our Baptist people will submit to the formulation of a creed. Of course we believe great things—God the Father—Man the Sinner—Jesus the Saviour—the Book the Revealer—but we don't believe it necessary to put these great facts into set language. Our freedom has saved us from heresy trials. This present agitation and insistence on a creedal declaration is much like a man rushing up and in great passion saying that he has a resolution he wants me to sign; that I must sign it to save my neck; that the world is waiting. I ask to see the resolution: "Resolved, that I love my mother!" Well, I didn't know I had to declare it. She knows! No, our position here has been our glory. Most of the people hesitate to have that glory dimmed. I submit that doctrinal, creedal declarations are outside of the function of the Northern Baptist Convention. It is, and ought to be, a missionary body.

It Is Leading to a Split

Third: The whole method of propaganda is leading to a cleavage in the denominations—and Baptists are the special sufferers. In connection with a big conference held in St. Louis during the past year, the Presbyterian end of it was represented by a minister not attached to any church here. In answer to a straight question "What are you fellows after—splitting the denominations?" he said promptly, "We have twenty thousand ready to go with us." And this at the very hour when the spiritual tide is turning and there seems to be a great revival beginning. This whole business is an interdenominational or undenominational wedge driven into the Baptist body. The brethren may not intend this, but it is driving that way. Brethren, let us quit!

It so happens that I represent a church that has equal affiliations with the Northern and Southern Conventions. I attend both. Each convention has something to learn from the other. I hold no office in either convention; I have no axe to grind; I have no brief for "modernist," "fundamentalists," or any other group that segregates itself. If this article needs any defense my reply is, I belong to the larger body of men simply intent on one thing: to win man to God, to build them into Christian characters, helping to bring in the Kingdom of God, for which Jesus taught us to pray. I believe that this whole "conference" business has done us more harm than good, that it leads to confusion rather than clarification, that it generates strife, that it unfairly classifies men. In short, my feeling is expressed in the language of one of the most prominent men in the South: "Very many of our people do not take enthusiastically to these conferences; they think there is an over-emphasis on certain subjects, that there is too much criticizing of schools and theological seminaries, and that there is not sufficient emphasis put on the actual doing of the work."

This is in no sense a criticism of any body. I am simply trying to help a growingly distressing situation. I am not surprised that excellent men refused to go to Des Moines, they have no taste for what they feared would—and did—happen. The men who advocate these pre-convention gatherings are good men. Among them, both ministers and laymen, I count some of the best friends I have ever had: I expect to keep them. I think matters have gone far beyond what they expected at the beginning. They do not want a "schism." Their hearts would break if they were the cause of a breach in the great body of Baptists. I know they will not think unkindly of me when I say—let us quit! I believe we've had enough of the whole business. At least give the convention a chance to do the work for which it was created. It was not created for doctrinal snag hunting; nor should it be a heresy clearing house.

Canaanites Watch Our Folly

Of course there is no compulsion anywhere. There is no way to stop anything. We can destroy our work, distract our selves over matters people have fought over these two thousand years—matters which in my judgment have no relation to salvation, or to the building of the Kingdom of God. Yes, we can go ahead and miss the main business of winning lives to God, and building them into the Kingdom; but it is egregious folly. Let us not do it. Frankly, I am more afraid of the menace of an unbrosly spirit than of the menace of modern spirit. The latter soon finds its level and goes to its own place. But the former is destructive of our very life. Let us give the new year to the threefold job: Evangelize, Christianize, humanize, and see what we can accomplish in the twelve months.

Just this word more: The Canaanite is in the land; he is watching us, and chuckling. He knows we can't fight sin as long as we fight each other—and we know it, too. There is an open path for the New World Movement; God help us to see it, and help take the world for Him.

"Sing No. 90"

By C. M. CARTER

Prologue

Was it the voice of the Spirit—supernatural? Was it sub-conscious impression? If the latter, then so complicated that it is more amazing than to fall back on the supernatural. Or may it have been the voice of the Spirit speaking through the sub-conscious mind, a domain of inquiry not yet thoroughly explored. The experience was real, intensely real. But what the cause? Any way—

The Story

It was in a special prayer-meeting on a week-day morning. The leader was a young man in his first pastorate. At this meeting were a score or more of the faithful members of the church. Present as a welcome visitor was the Rev. Mr. H—, first pastor of the younger man, who was invited to lead the singing. He had formerly taught school in this community, among other things teaching music.

The meeting was moving smoothly without any apparent unusual conditions of any kind. Suddenly a profound feeling startled the leader of the meeting, "Sing No. 90!" It was not an audible voice, but was as clear as if it had been. But this song was wholly off the subject then under consideration, and the pastor hesitated to call for it. After another one had spoken, again came the feeling and still more vigorously, "Sing No. 90!" This time the leader opened the hymn book to see, though it was entirely familiar, whether it had any idea in it which could bear on the general trend of the meeting. There was not one thing. Another hymn was called for by the visiting pastor leading the singing, and the meeting proceeded.

"Sing No. 90!", and this time the order was clear and imperative and left an uncanny feeling that if this was not answered it would be no more repeated, and something worth while would be lost. Timidly, wondering what it all meant, the pastor said, "Let us sing No. 90." The old church chorister, who had a keen sense of the fitness of hymns, muttered "W'y, w'y" to himself. The leader of the singing turned to the hymn, glanced at it and said, "This tune is wholly unfamiliar to me; but wait a moment, and I'll start it. I like the looks of it." He hummed the tune for a moment, and sang it. The people joined in readily, but so foreign to the subject in their minds, though from the Gospel Hymns, that the movement of the meeting was retarded for some minutes. The young pastor felt depressed, wondering if he had acted foolishly in responding to an imaginary voice. Yet he felt deeply that something beyond him had made this profound impression to call for a particular hymn, and one which did not fit anywhere.

A Pastoral Call

The meeting closed not long afterwards. The two ministers stopped at the church door. "I am going," said the younger man, "to call on one of our church members who is a backslider, Brother John M—. He has wandered into a far country, and is now seriously ill, with no evidence of any desire to come back home." "O, I knew Brother M— when I taught here years ago. I'll be glad to go with you," said the visitor. As they went the latter referred to the song he had just sung: "That song was new to me but I like it very much."

The two came to the home of the backslider and were admitted at once. The sick man greeted them cordially, but on his face was a very decided look of defiance. Not by one and most certainly not by two preachers would he be brought to repentance! The callers saw at once that any direct religious appeal was out of the question while he was in this mood, and all conversation was general. As the visitors were preparing to leave the younger man made reference to the fact that his old pastor had once lived in this community. "Oh yes," said the invalid, "I remember him well. You may not think it," he said with a smile, "but I took music lessons of him. I'll tell you I did love to hear him sing!" Instantly, hopefully, but with no exact plan in mind, the pastor replied, "Would you like him to sing now?" "I certainly would," said the invalid. At once the older man opened the hymn book he had accidentally brought with him and turned to a hymn. Naturally, as his mind was so recently led that way, he sang No. 90:

"I left it all with Jesus,
Long ago—"

As the voice of music so sweet and sympathetic rang out a look of utmost amazement flashed into the prodigal's face.—

"All my sins I brought Him,
And my woe—"

Before the second line was finished the fight was on. Each line, almost, through the three stanzas marked a change.—

"From my heart the burden Rolled away—Happy day!"

Between the singing of the first line of the hymn and the last—

"Yet His tender bosom Makes thee room—Oh, come home!"—

As the young man watched he saw a wonderful miracle, no less than the whole story of the Prodigal Son re-enacted.

The Miracle

In the man's face was stubborn rebellion, astonishment, intense attention, awakening, heart-hunger, turning. Clear as if pictured on a screen was the "coming to himself," the fierce battle, and quick decision, "I will arise and go to my Father," the hard tramp back through the desert, the hesitation when he arrived in sight of his old home, the amazement at the wonderful welcome, the ring, the robe, the blessed forgiveness. It was all there, mirrored in the lightning-like changes of his countenance. When the last notes of the song faded a prodigal had made the whole long way from wandering in a far country back to his old home, and was feasting in his Father's house. The tears were rolling down his face. "Praise the Lord, that's all true," he said fervently. Seizing his pastor's hand he added, "I've been wrong, I've been wrong, and I know it! But as soon as I get well I'm coming back to church!" "Make thee room—O, come home!" softly repeated the young pastor. Then they prayed. And return he did, a chastened, patient, penitent soul from that time on. He wandered into a far country no more. Later he was made deacon, and he gained for himself "a good standing, and a great boldness in the faith which is in Christ Jesus." After some years of faithful, useful, child-like discipleship he was not for God took him, and church and community wept, for a prince and a great man had fallen that day in Israel.

Finale

"Sing No. 90!" As far as human mind can tell the singing of that hymn brought that prodigal back home, with results besides no one knows. The hymn seemed to fit the whole situation perfectly. But had it not been sung in the prayer-meeting the visiting minister would not have sung it, for he had never heard of it. As the people prayed the Spirit spoke, but spoke his own mind, and the mind of no one else. He spoke to but one, the pastor, and he did not refer to it until long afterwards, for he was awed into silence. Not by some voice from the clouds, but using His own voice of gentle stillness to reach the mind of one who longed to hear it, and who was already in the habit of listening for it, the Spirit spoke, and then silently and effectually led the way to action.

Whether this is a story of regeneration or of the re-conversion of a regenerated prodigal only God Himself knows. But who can doubt that at the bedside of the sick prodigal as that hymn was sung the angels joined in? For the angels in heaven rejoice over one sinner that repenteth! Oh, that today, while the whole world wanders hungry, weary, and worn, so far from home, the voice would speak more and to more—and listening ears be hearing! Does God still speak? Does he speak to you? Why not!

Keep Your Baptist at Work

Rev. V. W. Dyer, pastor of the Immanuel Baptist Church, Rangoon, Burma, writes us as follows: "I give away my copy of THE BAPTIST and others secured from missionary friends to my people who not only enjoy them but get much help and inspiration from them, as well as Baptist ideals. This is of vital importance here where the Church of England is so strong in numbers and social and political prestige. People here think of us Baptists as a small and unimportant sect; so I am counting on THE BAPTIST to disillusion them. I have already written my friends to send me all of their second-hand but un mutilated copies every week immediately after they have read them. There is almost no good periodical religious literature in the city. There is, however, an abundance of trash all over the city put out by the Russellites, Swedenborgians, Spiritualists, Christian Scientists and Seventh-Day Adventists (the worst sheep-stealers and church breakers in India) and even the Bolsheviki. It is high time we gave them some good literature of our own. Will you therefore ask subscribers to send me the week after they receive them their copies regularly every week for one year? Thus we shall create an appetite for it, so that next year some will subscribe. Already I have sent in two subscriptions. My plan is to put at least 150 or 200 copies into the homes of my members and congregation. Then in the future we will not have so many slip back into Catholicism or into the more popular stately state Church of England through marriage, desire for political or social preferment, but fundamentally through ignorance of our New Testament (Baptist) principles."

How Many Are Mortgaged?

Interesting statistics compiled from preliminary census returns show that more than 6,000,000 families in the United States own their homes, and that there are more owners in this country than in any other on earth. Assuming that the average value of these homes is $5,000, the aggregate investment is approximately $30,000,000,000. More than 15,000,000 families live in rented homes, but it is an encouraging fact that this number is constantly decreasing.

Pipes o' Pan, and Other Pipes

Figures just issued by the bureau of the census of the department of commerce at Washington indicate that in 1919, 1,100 pipe organs were made in the United States, of a total value of $4,134,000. This compares with 1,200 instruments in 1914, valued at $3,620,000. The summary of the census of manufacturers shows sixty-nine establishments which engaged in the manufacture of organs.

It Is Good English, at Least

Harvard university announces that all students who major in English or in ancient or modern languages shall possess a good working knowledge of the English Bible and twelve plays of Shakespeare. Graduation is forbidden without this. The announcement says: "The King James version of the Bible is one of the great monuments of English prose, but any standard version, ancient or modern, may be used." All Bible lovers appreciate this compulsory study on the part of Harvard students. The only regrettable thing is that it is to be studied merely as an example of English literature, placed on the same plane with Shakespeare, George Eliott, or Thackeray. The good to be derived will be determined largely by the attitude of the teacher. Indeed, the Bible can be taught so as to cause less confidence in its integrity and authority. All could wish that it were used as the inspired Word rather than as a mere high-class text in English.—Exchange.

We Prefer to See the Maps

It is said that the school atlases of Germany will not change the map of Europe in accordance with the decisions of the war and the Versailles peace conference. Germany in particular is to be left intact in the public-school text-books, and the purpose easily is discernible. It would be every teacher's duty to tell the pupils that such Germany was, and such Germany has a right to be, and such she expects to be and will be. There is no other interpretation of the purpose to preserve the ante-war boundary lines, so a desire for restoration of country, revenge upon the allies, and everything else that goes along with it will be the rule in these next years. With this spirit manifested, how the world can avoid another conflagration is pretty difficult to figure out. The spirit of Jesus Christ having full control of the human heart here and there will make the right kind of a country, but purposed war, as this clearly implies, has little promise of peace and tranquility.—Exchange.

Can Love Knots be Tied by Law?

The National Reform bureau has made a study of divorce court proceedings in United States. Nevada stands at the bottom in this clearing house of immorality with 652 legal divorces to every block of 100,000 people. The road to Reno has been the goal of many alleged marital misfits, and the easy laws of separation have been used by many who have given way to the pull toward unfaithfulness. We used to think that Japan had the worse record, but twenty-four of our own States are worse—from Nevada down to Vermont, the last showing 153 divorces to every 100,000 of population. There are other States still lower, Maine recording only 112 to every 100,000 people. In Japan, in 1916, there were 109 to the same number of inhabitants, while in all our own States there were 136 to the same number. There is need for uniform divorce laws, so that, under the guise of unfaithfulness on the part of wife or husband, the other might not use mere uncongeniality or something hidden in his own life to bring about family separation with all the evils carried along. It is no credit to this country to permit divorce proceedings, much of it under the false plea of a domestic safety valve, when in reality it is but a rebellion against ordinary domestic duty.—Exchange.

Whence Came Our Foreign-Born?

The foreign-born population of the United States in 1920 totaled 13,702,987, an increase of 268,442, or 2.6 per cent, over 1910.

Dancing is Taboo in Albuquerque

The First Baptist Church of Albuquerque, New Mexico has made it a part of its constitution and by-laws, that no person who attends or even sanctions the dance can hold office or teach in the Sunday school or any organization of the church or even sing solos. They further provide that any member of the church who dances in a mixed company of men and women, by that act, automatically cancels his or her church membership.—Baptist Advance.

Nothing Glorious about War

"First of all, there is nothing glorious about war any more. We used to think there was. When we were children, with tasselled paper caps and tin guns, marching to a beaten drum, we incarnated in our boyish pride the ancient fallacy that there is something glorious about war. . . .

"One of our young men came back from France and like many others would not talk. One day his father took him apart and rebuked him for his silence. 'Just one thing I will tell you,' he answered. 'One night I was on patrol in No Man's Land and suddenly I came face to face with a German boy about my own age. It was a question of his life or mine. We fought like wild beasts. When I came back that night I was covered from head to foot with the blood and brains of that young German boy. We had nothing personally against each other. He did not want to kill me any more than I wanted to kill him. That is war. I did my duty in it but for God's sake do not ask me to talk about it. I want to forget it.' My friends, that is war—the quintessence of it at the central point of its self revelation. There is nothing glorious about it any more."—Harry Emerson Fosdick.

How Long Can Britain Stand It?

National expenditures of Great Britain are compared by the Baptist Times and Freeman thus:

In 1913 the total national expenditure, to be provided for out of revenue, including interest on debt, was £197,000,000. The principal items, apart from the service of the debt were:—

Army .....	£28,000,000
Navy .....	£48,000,000
Civil Service .....	£45,800,000

For the current year the expenditure is estimated at £1,216,500,000, the chief items being:—

Interest on Debt .....	£345,000,000
War and Old Age Pensions .....	£149,000,000
Army .....	£106,000,000
Navy .....	£35,000,000
Air Force .....	£19,000,000
Civil Service .....	£460,901,000

Riding Through College on a Pig

The new president of Northwestern University, Dr. Walter Scott, had two pigs given him while he was in school. He accepted the two little squealers gratefully, and fed the two orphans with a nursing bottle until they were old enough to eat corn. They grew into fat hogs, which the boy traded for a calf. He fattened the calf till it became a heifer and then swapped it for a well-bred colt. He trained the colt to be a fine buggy horse, sold her for $175, went to his mother with the money in his pocket and told her he was going to attempt a college education. He bought a ticket for Northwestern University, where he has been most of the time since, working his way up from student to president.—Baptist and Reflector.

How Brooklyn Cares for Its Blind

Brooklyn has a unique way of caring for its blind. Once a year an entire week in the month of April, called "Blind Week," is devoted to their interests by all the women of the city. In the large ballroom of the Academy of Music the work of these unfortunates is on exhibition and on sale. The various forms of handwork taught them are here demonstrated for the edification and interest of visitors. Here one can see blind men making brooms, brushes, caning chairs, weaving baskets, etc., and the women weaving rugs, doing beadwork and sewing, typewriting and other accomplishments whereby they are taught to maintain themselves. Orders are taken and thus these handicapped members of society are assured of remunerative work for months to come.—The Lutheran.

Europe Still an Armed Camp

Two and one-half years after the armistice Europe still presents the appearance of an armed camp, more than 3,000,000 men being under arms. Of this number, according to reports recently received in Washington, France controls nearly two-thirds through agreements, treaties and understandings. Countries included in this classification are Belgium, Czechoslovakia, Yugoslavia, Poland and Roumania. Conservative figures place the strength of continental armies as follows:

Austria, 30,000; Belgium, 105,000; Bulgaria, 33,000; Czechoslovakia, 147,000; Denmark, 15,400; Finland, 35,000; France 809,652; Germany, 100,000; Greece, 250,000; Hungary, 35,000; Italy, 300,000; Jugoslavia, 200,000; Netherlands, 21,400; Norway, 15,400; Poland, 600,000; Portugal, 30,000; Roumania, 160,000; Spain, 190,715; Sweden, 56,200; Switzerland, 200,000.

Would Souse Sandy Hook

The district attorney's office in New York has begun proceedings to acquire title in the name of the state of New York to liquor worth $50,000,000 at bootleg prices, which has been seized by the police since dry law in that state went into effect. After condemnation the liquor probably will be towed in garbage scows to a point off Sandy Hook and dumped into the ocean. The district attorney's office says that the law provides for the destruction of all liquor except some of the very highest grade which may be sold to hospitals or for other legitimate uses.—American Issue.

Make Opinion Liquid

Speaking before the New Jersey State Bar Association on June 18, in Atlantic City, Mr. Henry W. Taft said (as quoted in the press):

'Discontent with our courts will undoubtedly arise again in some other form, as it has already arisen on their treatment of the subject of free speech. The best way to meet it is to discuss it, to make opinion liquid as water, free as air, and not by oppression to freeze opinion into prejudice.

"In times of peace we must exercise patience and try to believe that in the long run, substantial error will be detected and truth and sanity will prevail. During the late war, patience was not always possible. The emergency did not permit delay. We could not depend upon time and free discussion to eliminate error and vindicate truth.

"It became necessary, as one of the despairing critics has said, to conscript public opinion, as men and material had been conscripted. But conscription in any sense of the word, is no longer necessary. The technical continuance of the state of war affords little reason for retaining laws to prevent the obstruction of the operations of our military forces or of our recruiting service. Now that the war is over and such propaganda cannot weaken our military resources, I believe that Communism can best be fought by argument and not by repression. There may be discontent and occasional disorder, but if the American people will seriously concern themselves to combat such heresies, they will wither away and we will have a most healthful exhibition of the power of unrestrained discussion."

Which Proves—What?

The net gain for all of the churches in 1919 was 44,000, while the net gain for 1920 was 712,000. The Presbyterians turned a net loss of 46,459 into a net gain of 43,031. The Baptist group gained 129,283 instead of losing 11,108, and the Methodists (of all sorts) arose from their defeat of 1919 (net loss of 75,951) to the greatest gain in their history, 237,127, bringing their total to 7,705,258. The gain of the Methodist Episcopal Church alone was 191,000.

For an Unguzzled New Zealand

New Zealand had a local option law which provided for local no-license when three-fifths of the voters so decided. Under that law twelve of their seventy-two electorates adopted no-license, although over forty had given a bare majority in favor of the reform.

A nation-wide vote has now been substituted for the local option plan. This vote is taken triannually on the same day as the general parliamentary election. Three issues are submitted: (1) Continuance of the present system, (2) Government ownership; (3) and national prohibition. To carry either of the two latter issues a majority of the total votes cast is sufficient. The first vote on these issues was taken in December, 1919, when the vote resulted: 32,000 for State ownership, 240,000 for continuance and 270,000 for prohibition. Although having a majority of 30,000 over continuance, prohibition was short of a majority over both other issues by about 2,000 votes.

The next vote will be taken in 1922, when it is confidently asserted the natural increase in the prohibition vote will more than make up the 2,000 deficiency of the last vote.—Exchange.

International Uniform Lesson for July 31

Acts 11:19-30, 12:25. Golden Text: Acts 11:26
SAUL TEACHING AT ANTIOCH

BY JOHN A. EARL

The Lesson Text

The lesson is designed to show how and when Paul began his ministry to the Gentiles. Luke in his account of the development of the church shows three streams flowing out of Judaistic Christianity toward the ocean of universal Christianity. Philip the evangelist preaching in Samaria is the first attempt to take the gospel outside the boundaries of Jerusalem; Peter catching for a moment the vision of spiritual democracy and going to the house of Cornelius in Caesarea with the good news that God is no respecter of persons is the second evidence of the growing consciousness of the church toward the evangelization of the world; the unnamed disciples from Cyprus and Cyrene preaching the gospel to the Gentiles of Antioch in the face of the narrower interpretation which restricted it to Jews only is the third demonstration of the great commission of Jesus to make disciples of all the nations.

The Lesson Taught

The lesson centers around three cities,—Jerusalem, Antioch, Tarsus.

Jerusalem

Jerusalem was strictly Jewish. Its location, traditions and institutions kept it largely immune from the world influences of Rome. In fact, Jerusalem, despite all the impact of Assyrian, Macedonian, Roman and Moslem civilizations, has remained loyal to its Hebrew inheritance. It has been and still is an isolated and conservative city. In the purpose and providence of God Jerusalem was isolated in order that it might be the cradle of the Christian religion. Here Judaism was nurtured with such care that it withstood all the assimilating influences of a gentile world for generations, in order that, in the fulness of time Judaism should give birth to Christianity. But when Christianity was born, Jerusalem wanted to keep the child in the swaddling bands of Judaism. It therefore became necessary, if Christianity was to become the religion for the world, for something to happen that would transfer it from a Jewish to a Gentile center. Jesus began his ministry in Judea, but soon had to transfer it to the more hospitable Galilee. The Holy Spirit began his ministry in Jerusalem with Pentecost; but soon it was transferred to Antioch in Syria because Jerusalem was too narrow and hidebound for the great work of the Eternal Spirit. We should never forget, however, that Jerusalem was never designed to be the progressive center of a great world movement. It has been the mother of Kings, Priests, Prophets, and with true maternal instinct it tried to keep them tied to the proverbial apron strings. This conservative service on the part of Jerusalem should have its true appraisal by every student of history. The poet inspired by the maternity of Jerusalem sang, "O, Mother dear, Jerusalem! When shall I come to thee?" We owe much to Jerusalem; but it took Antioch and Tarsus to make the religion of Christ democratic and universal.

Antioch

Antioch was the third city in the Roman empire, ranking with Alexandria and Rome in population, commerce, wealth and general importance. At the time when Paul began his ministry there the population was probably half a million. Situated on the River Orontes a few miles from the Mediterranean it was the great Roman port of Asia Minor. Three hundred years before Christ the city had been founded by Seleucus Nicator, one of the generals of Alexander the Great. It steadily grew in importance until it became the New York of the ancient world. Jews and Gentiles mingled freely in this great commercial center thus furnishing an opportunity for the evangelistic work of the church which could never have been found in Jerusalem. Antioch was the very antithesis of Jerusalem. Occupied with commerce and pleasures, Antioch was indifferent to the questions about religion which limited the liberty of far-seeing believers in Jerusalem. Thus Antioch was a free field, and the disciples of Christ from Cyprus and Cyrene made use of it to good advantage by preaching the gospel to Greeks as well as to Jews. It is difficult for us used to democracy to appreciate the spirit of men who could confine to Jews only such a blessing as the gospel of Christ brings to the world; but upon men who lived in a day when political liberty was unknown, when the classes ruled the masses, and when slaves were more numerous than freemen, the injustice of class religion made no impression. The unnamed men who broke down the middle wall of partition between Jew and Gentile in Antioch by preaching the gospel to both on equal terms were far ahead of their day. In fact they were in advance of our day when men would build again walls of class legislation, class privilege and class religion. Antioch and not Jerusalem has the proud distinction of being the savior of Christianity. Had Christianity been left in Jerusalem it would have become another narrow Jewish sect. Let us thank God for Antioch.

Tarsus

Tarsus was the composite made up of both Jerusalem and Antioch. It took Tarsus to produce Paul. Sheltered in a home which was a Jerusalem in miniature Paul had all the point of view of the Jewish Christians who were bound to insist on circumcision as a Christian sacrament; and brought up in a city which was another Antioch except in size, Paul could appreciate the opportunity of reaching the Gentile world through Antioch as a center. Cyprus and Cyrene could begin the mission to the Greeks; Barnabas, the special messenger from the church in Jerusalem to visit Antioch and report his findings, could see the grace of God manifested among the Gentiles, and rejoice; but it required a bigger man than Barnabas to organize the missionary work of the church at Antioch on a world basis. Therefore wise Barnabas went to Tarsus to seek for Saul. Saul needed Antioch and Antioch needed Saul. Up to this time Saul had been preaching to Jews although he had faced the problem of circumcision and settled it on his knees that circumcision is nothing and uncircumcision is nothing, but a new creature in Christ Jesus. Antioch gave him the necessary experience in trying out the truth he had discovered that Christianity is purely a spiritual religion unhampered by sacraments. As Tarsus and Jerusalem had been his school in finding the roots of Christianity deep in the soil of Judaism; now Antioch becomes his laboratory in producing the fruits of spiritual religion apart from all religious rites and ceremonies. Thus Jerusalem and Antioch and Tarsus are contributors to New Testament Christianity. Without Jerusalem, New Testament religion would have no background; without Antioch, New Testament religion would have no foreground; without Tarsus New Testament religion would have no middle-ground.

Tithing Campaign Winning

Dr. R. E. Farrier, director of promotion for New York state writes:—"A league just starting in Rochester sends word: 'One hundred seventy-one members just organized. Last Sunday one hundred tithers' envelopes contained $201.41.' I think they have started something that we can soon point to! Our work is just beginning and trust we are going to enroll a large membership before long."

ARIZONA

Pastor R. S. Beal of the First Church, Tucson writes: "We now have a total of twenty members of the union who have gone out into the ministry or missions within the past two years. Most of this number have gone away to school with a definite view to entering the service of the Master. We have at least fifteen others who are planning to enter the Lord's service, and only await the opportunity. Two of this number are seniors at the university.

These are the facts up to January 1, 1921.

O For a Thousand Tongues!

ONE evening when two American soldiers in France were passing the makeshift hut of a refuge French pastor, they poked their heads inside the doorway to see if all were well, and behold! there knelt the little daughter of the family at her mother's knee, praying: "Notre Père qui es aux cieux, ton nom soit sanctifié—" ("Our Father who art in heaven, hallowed be Thy name").

Softly they tiptoed down the dusty road, and soldier number one said huskily: "D'ye know, Buddy, it never dawned on me before that God knew any other language than English—yet there's that little kid positive he can parler Francaise! Say, how'd you like to listen in some evening? Mighty interesting, though right strenuous for him round prayertime, I wager!"

"Oh, I dunno," said number two, reverently, "I reckon he knows em all—just as easy!"

On some long sweet summer evening when the fireflies flicker in the honeysuckle vine and balmy breezes cool the heavy air, what more refreshing mental zephyr than this—to recall that in every land "as pants the hart for cooling streams" so mankind everywhere seeks God, who knows each strangest language even to the farthest corners of the globe.

In pious wood on Sabbath mornings how often we have sung:

"O, for a thousand tongues to sing
My dear Redeemer's praise!"

Then Monday morning we lapse back to our own vernacular, contentedly! It is a spur to the imagination to paint pictures of those valiant saints who everywhere through blazing deserts or through arctic zones or through cannibal ferocity have somehow mastered seven hundred of those thousand tongues already in order to give Bibles to the waiting peoples of the world. Have these Bibles wrought a real love of the word of God? If we really "listened in" would the quaint phrasing grip our own imaginations as the child's French prayer awoke the passing soldier? ## THE AMERICAN INDIAN'S TWENTY-THIRD PSALM

An endless line of splendor,

These troops with heaven for home!

With creeds they go from Scotland,

With incense go from Rome.

These in the name of Jesus

Against the dark gods stand;

They gird the earth with color,

They heed the King's command.

Onward the line advances,

Shaking the hills with power;

Swaying the hidden demons,

The lions that devour.

No bloodshed in the wrestling,

But souls, newborn, arise;

The nations growing kinder,

The child heart growing wise.

What is the final ending?

The issue, can we know?

Will Christ outline Mohammed?

Will Kali's altars go?

This is our faith tremendous,

Our wild hope who shall scorn?

That in the name of Jesus

The world shall be reborn.

gerous, and I eat and lie down satisfied.

Sometimes my heart is very weak and falls down, but He lifts it up again and draws me into a good road. His name is Wonderful.

Some time, it may be very soon, it may be longer, it may be a long, long time, He will draw me into a place between mountains. It is dark there, but I'll draw back not. I'll be afraid not, for it is in there between these mountains that the Shepherd Chief will meet me, and the hunger I have felt in my heart all through this life will be satisfied. Sometimes He makes the love rope into a whip, but afterwards He gives me a staff to lean on.

He spreads a table before me with all kinds of food. He puts His hands upon my head, and all the "tired" is gone. My cup He fills till it runs over.

What I tell you is true, I lie not. These roads that are "away ahead" will stay with me through this life, and afterwards I will go to live in the "Big Teepee" and sit down with the Shepherd Chief for ever.

SUFFER THE LITTLE CHILDREN TO COME UNTO ME—FORBID THEM NOT

(As told by a child in a Chinese Mission.)

The honorably Lord Jesus are Son of God yet He are seated on the earth which He are honorably make at the beginning once. His honorably disciples are around. Bimeby lil bits of Chinese childrens—and girls!—comes; but honorably disciples speaks cross to their Chinese mothers: "Remove, worms on the dust; this honorably Jesus He are got no time today!" But the honorably Jesus speak with surprises: "It are make smileings in my heart for to have these little Chinese childrens coming on me, remove not to their roof-trees,—my sleeve, are it not long enough and wide enough for covering them all?" And the honorably Jesus He are lay His honorably hands on their miserably heads and are bless them.

Four hundred years ago when as yet there was no English Bible listen to William Tyndale vowing to a Catholic priest to make one:—"I defy the Pope and all his laws; and if God spare my life, ere many years I will cause a boy who drives the plough to know more of the Scriptures than thou doest!"

Hear Martin Luther translating the Bible into German say feelingly: "My God, how hard it is to make these Hebrew prophets talk German!"

Dr. Milne, a notable translator of the Bible into Chinese once said that in mastering that difficult language one needed "a chest of oak, nerves of steel, the patience of Job, and the years of Methusaleh."

The Young Reserves

Hidden Treasures:—A Contest!

DEAR Young Reserves:

The other day Peggy and Bill trooped in rather forlornly: "We're all out of ideas," they sighed, "somehow we just plain don't know what to do with ourselves this summer!"

"Nonsense!" I smiled, "what's the matter with your playing Treasure Island as you used to do, hunting hidden treasure?"

"You forget," they said, with tremendous dignity, "that we're a whole year older than we used to be, and Bill is getting so dreadfully particular—he wants a real search and a real find instead of just make-believe affairs! So now what will you suggest?"

"Here's the very thing for such as you!" said I, "arm yourselves with a Bible apiece, a pad of paper and pencils, then take this list and go out under the apple tree to hunt up my hidden treasures."

Now the beautiful part of it is that I suspect YOU are often in the very same state as Peggy and Bill, wondering what to do with yourselves. So digging for hidden treasures will prove a splendid summer contest for you too. Take this list, hunt up the places in the Bible where they occur (giving chapter and verse) and send in your complete list by September first to the Chimney Corner Editor. The three best lists will, of course, receive prizes.

The truth of the matter is there is no treasure-trove like the Bible, although perhaps you never knew before that any number of authors in naming their new books have chosen Bible phrases for titles. If you were writing a book yourself you would want the title to be the most striking and suggestive one to be found anywhere. You will see from this long list the authors who felt that the Bible offered the best titles possible:

1. Winston Churchill, "The Inside of the Cup."
2. Winston Churchill, "A Far Country."
3. Louis Tracy, "The Wings of the Morning."
4. Mrs. Sidgwick, "The Salt of the Earth."
5. Lucas Malet, "The Wages of Sin."
6. Mary Wilkins, "The Alabaster Box."
7. A. J. Evans, "A Speckled Bird."

58. J. E. Talmadge, "The House of the Lord."
59. H. A. Cody, "If Any Man Sin."
60. G. H. Smith, "The Crown of Life."
61. E. Miller, "The Yoke."

The Big-Little Library

PETER and Polly were down town one day when they met in front of a bookstore, the Lady-Who-Wrote-Things and she asked them if they would carry home some books for her, as they were next door neighbors. Peter politely said that of course they would, while Polly sensibly asked how many there were, please!

"Let me see—sixty-six, I believe."

"Sixty-six!" groaned Peter, "why that will be thirty-three books apiece, and they will tower way up into the air like the Leaning Tower of Pisa or the steeplechase at the circus. Honest ingin, I know I will drop 'em all over the street, and—and P-Polly Prim isn't so awfully strong, s-she h-had the m-mumps when she was four—"

"But she's twelve now," said the Lady-Who-Wrote-Things, disappearing into the bookstore, while Peter glared at Polly, and Polly glared at him.

"Let's run!" said Peter.

"Can't! Here she is."

Sure enough here was the Lady with a small package. "There!" she said, "and thank you so much."

"But where are the other sixty-five?" asked Peter.

"Oh, they're all inside,—you're carrying them this minute!"

"Am I?" gasped Peter.

"Is he?" gasped Polly.

"They must be awfully little books—why look here! I've punched it and it doesn't feel like books, just like book—one, you know!"

"What's it about?" Polly asked.

"Stories," said the Lady-Who-Wrote-Things, "stories about gardens and deserts and camels and travelers and palaces and shepherd boys who became kings, and giants and lions and fishermen who followed a carpenter's son. Moreover it's not only a Big-Little Library squeezed into such small space, but it's a Lamp to groping feet, a sword against wicked people, Bread for the hungry and more precious than rubies to those who search for hidden treasure. It's built all the hospitals and orphanages and has done more to rule the world than kings or guns or battleships—"

"What can it be?" gasped Polly.

"Why can't Polly and I borrow it and read it during vacation time?"

"You can," laughed the Lady-Who-Wrote-Things, "although I strongly suspect you have just such a Big-Little Library in your own home where you can search for hidden treasure!"

THE INFLUENCE OF THE BIBLE ON LITERATURE, ART, MUSIC, AND LAW
Ps. 19:1-14

By W. H. JONES

"The Bible is more than a book, it is literature. . . Its oldest chapters were written by a desert sage before the dawn of record history; its last chapters by an exiled poet on an island in the Aegean Sea. Open its pages and behold the process of creation's morning. Open them again, and read the beginning of civil government. Open them again, and find the laws upon which all enlightened jurisprudence is founded. Open them again, and find the oldest and sweetest love songs. Open them again, and read prophetic dreams of ages yet to come. Open them again, and read the story of humanity's one perfect man whose life and death and resurrection form the basis for our hope of life eternal."—Dr. C. C. Albertson.

The Bible is a library, composed of sixty-six pamphlets. It required 1000 years to produce it. Some pamphlets are historical, some are poems, some are dramas, some are letters and some are visions of a future golden day. The authors include kings, exiles, poets, judges, a herdsman, a physician, a tent-maker and a fisherman.

This book, setting forth the ways of God with men, has been the greatest single influence on art, literature, music and law that the world has known. The creative minds of the centuries have pored over its pages and have been moulded by it into centers of power.

1. Influence on Literature. Poets have found the Bible the exhaustless fountain of suggestion and stimulus. Christ's parables are matchless examples of beauty and strength, of simplicity and tenderness. When the Bible had become the book of the English and German people, their literary future was evident. They became "the people of a book." The Bible's speech permeated the language of the "Masters of Literature." From Wm. Langland, the peasant author of Piers Plowman, whose lines were saturated with the imagery of the Bible, to our own day, great literature has been inspired by a Bible origin. Bunyan, Shakespeare, Carlyle, Ruskin, Browning, Tennyson, Webster, Roosevelt have each drawn copious draughts from that fountain. For 1000 years, the Bible has been slowly filtering into the life of the people.

2. Influence on Art. Painting and sculpture have been profoundly influenced by the Bible, since the early days of the Catacombs. You need a thorough knowledge of the Bible to walk intelligently through the galleries of Florence, Rome, Paris or London. The art of the world for centuries has found its sublime subjects in the gospel story. The most beautiful picture in the National Gallery in London is Murillo's "Holy Family"; in Paris, Murillo's "Assumption of the Virgin"; in Antwerp, Ruben's "Descent from the Cross"; in Florence "The Madonna de la Sedia"; in Venice, Leonardo's "Last Supper"; in Rome, "The Crucifixion"; in Dresden, Raphael's "Sistine Madonna." Rembrandt places on canvas little Dutch children with wooden shoes, crowding at the feet of a Jewish Messiah. Take the Bible out of art and a hollow shell is left.

3. Influence on Music. The people of God are a singing people. Wales, a land that read and loved the book is a land of singing people. Born of the great Psalms of Israel, hallowed by centuries of use in the worship of God, the church has developed a marvelously rich hymnology. The Mendelssohns, the Beethovens, the Handels and the Mozarts have felt in their souls the power and music of the book and then have created their deathless compositions. Since the days of Wesley, real hymnology has been born of the Bible.

The book still holds perpetual sway. Find quotations of the use of the Bible in standard literature, to quote in the meeting. Bring copies of great pictures to hang upon the wall. Find hymns composed by great masters. Have some young law students state the relation between Mosaic legislation and the modern legal code.

B. Y. P. U. Convention Impressions

I have been wonderfully helped and blessed by this convention. It's a great thing to be a Baptist.

This is the first convention that I have attended. I have been so inspired by power of God that I am going back to my local society determined that by His help I may be His humble servant. May God be praised for the great number who have pledged themselves for definite Christian service.—Harlan Lundy.

I thank God for Vera Rice, who has shown me the happiness in living a life of Christian service for Jesus Christ.—Josephine McLean.

This is the second B. Y. P. U. convention I have ever attended, and I have been more wonderfully impressed by the great body of our consecrated Baptist young people of America, but how could we be otherwise impressed when we sit under the sound of the voices of so wonderfully inspired consecrated speakers as have been heard here.—Bertie Caldwell.

This convention has led me to make a final and definite decision for a life of Christian work for my Master.—Laura A. Richardson.

This convention has shown me the need of Christianity throughout this world of ours, and has taken away the great question which has heretofore stood for my future.—Martha Lewis.

This convention has given me a greater, more beautiful onlook of life.—Eleanor Tastad.

This is the most inspiring and helpful convention that I have ever attended. It has helped me to see what the B. Y. P. U.'s aim really is—I hope that everyone got as much out of this convention as I did.—R. Ransom.

God has greatly urged me to be a foreign missionary during this wonderful and inspiring convention.—Margaret Bird Henshaw.

The B. Y. P. U. of A. convention in Cincinnati, with over two thousand registrations, was a wonderful manifestation of the loyalty of our Baptist young people to the Lord, Jesus Christ and to the work of His kingdom.—W. A. Holmes.

This convention has given me a new and a glorious insight into the power of the prayer of faith for the salvation of the unsaved, and a desire both to cultivate that habit and also the habit of presenting the claims of Christ to the unsaved, in a loving and Christian, tactful manner.—George Cowie.

This is my first time at a convention; but it has made a deep impression on my mind of Christ's love and the great need of the non-Christian world.—Iva I. Whitmore.

This convention has meant all to me, for I have really come into touch with Christ and have witnessed the power of His love. I have received a new vision of what it is to be a Christian.—Merrill Talbert.

This convention has been the great, the greater, and the greatest convention that I ever attended. I am sure it has given us a newer and more wonderful vision, combined with the desire for greater service to our country and to our Lord and Master, Jesus Christ.—Margaret Ballentine.

A freedom of soul and a happiness I never knew.—Ethel Sanford.

This is the first time I have ever been to a B. Y. P. U. convention and I hope it is not the last. Through the spiritual lectures presented and also slides I now more fully realize the need of winning souls for Christ. I have made up my mind to be a missionary.—Dorothy Henefelt.

This great convention brings to me the great need on foreign fields, and the need

Hillsdale College

At a special meeting of the board of trustees of Hillsdale (Mich.) College, Dr. Joseph W. Mauck, who resigned a year ago after six months' notice, was recalled to the presidency on June 30 and immediately entered upon his duties. He and Mrs. Mauck spent some months in California and returned three weeks ago fully recuperated and in complete health. The election is permanent and unlimited in tenure and a competent assistant to the president was provided by the board. Mr. Mauck was the president from 1902 to 1920.

Extensive improvements in buildings and equipment are in progress. They include a complete remodeling of the women's dormitory, with enlarged capacity and new finishing and furniture throughout, under a contract with the architects and decorators who transformed another building in the group a year ago. The board of women commissioners has assumed the chief responsibility for this work.

Judge Wm. E. Ambler, of Cleveland, Ohio, chairman of the board of trustees and donor of the Ambler House for instruction and practice-house in household economics, has offered additional equipment for that building.

The chemical laboratories will be consolidated in one building with greater capacity by an addition to the science hall. Hon. Lewis Emory, Jr., of Pennsylvania, a few years ago endowed the chair of chemistry with $50,000 and added $10,000 for betterments. He has now made a further liberal contribution for equipment and offered a very considerable sum toward a large increase of the general endowment of the institution. For the School of Music, reorganized a year ago, the trustees made more liberal provision in June. The steam heating plant will undergo radical changes and replacements. Announcements of changes in the academic courses are waiting on elections to vacancies in the faculty.

Young Women's Conference Closes at Northfield

The first great gathering of the Northfield season, the Young Women's Conference, has just closed. This conference is conducted by the Northfield League, whose purpose is to help girls in the large boarding schools of the East in their religious life and to interest city girls in religious activities of various kinds. School delegations were present from as far south as the National Cathedral School, Washington, D. C., and from as far north as Bradford Academy, Bradford, Mass. Large and enthusiastic delegations came from such local branches of the league as New York, Boston, Hartford, Rochester, Buffalo, Baltimore, Wilmington, Philadelphia, and the larger cities of New Jersey.

Rev. G. Campbell Morgan, gave the young women a masterly course on "The Christ of History," which was really a course in Christian evidences excellently adapted to the girl of boarding school age. Other helpful speakers were Dr. John McDowell of New York, Miss Margaret Slatery, Rev. Carl Elmore of Englewood, N. J., and Rev. John Dallas of Hanover, N. H. Special classes were held in the forenoon, with the usual Round Top meetings at twilight.

The closing address of the Conference last evening, given by Dr. Robert E. Speer of New York, was most impressive. Apparently every delegate was present to receive his final message. The text was the first line of the hymn, "I need Thee every hour," and the theme was the individual need of Christ in every phase and emergency of life. The audience gave the closest attention to Dr. Speer's words while he presented Christ as the great need of the human heart and the satisfaction of every spiritual need. "I need Thee every hour" was often repeated and enforced by illustration and story until impressions were deepened beyond effacement.

This gathering was followed by the Women's Home Mission Summer School, conducted interdenominationally, July 5-11.

Federal Council Week at Chautauqua

The final week of the season of lectures and studies at the old Chautauqua in New York state is usually devoted to special conferences for ministers and other Christian workers. This year, in addition to other attractive features, the final week, beginning Sunday, Aug. 21, is to be devoted to some special phases of Christian co-operation under the general auspices of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America. A preliminary conference will be held on Sunday afternoon, conducted by Dr. Willett of the Chicago office of the Council.

Monday, Aug. 22, will be Christian Education Day, and addresses will be made by Prof. B. S. Winchester, secretary of the Federal Council's Commission on Christian Education, and by Dr. Charles S. Macfarland, general secretary of the Federal Council, who will speak on "The Story of the Federal Council," and "Ideals and Methods of the Federal Council."

Tuesday, Aug. 23, will be Church Federation Day. Dr. Roy B. Guild, secretary of the Commission on Church Councils, will speak on "Community Conquest by Co-operating Churches," and will conduct a conference on Federation problems. It is expected that a number of the secretaries of local federations will be present and participate in the program.

Wednesday, Aug. 24, will be devoted to Co-operative Evangelism, and Dr. C. L. Goodell, secretary of the Federal Council's Commission on Evangelism, will speak on "The Evangel of Today," and "Personal Evangelism."

Thursday, Aug. 25, the general theme will be Social Christianity, and the address will be given by Rev. F. Ernest Johnson, research secretary of the Federal Council's Commission on Social Service. He will speak on such themes as, "What is Social Christianity?" and "How the Research Department Operates."

Friday, Aug. 26, will be devoted to International Christian Co-operation. Dr. Sidney L. Gulick, secretary of the Federal Council's Commission on the Relations with the Orient, will speak on "Japan, a Challenge or a Menace," and "The United States and her Neighbors."

The addresses and conferences are particularly adapted to the needs of ministers and lay members of the churches who are studying the problems of the time, especially in their co-operative aspect. This, together with the platform lectures of the week, will make an especially attractive program for those who can visit Chautauqua at that time.

On the Firing Line in Japan

Encouragement was the dominant feeling in the 1921 conference of the Japan Mission. Since the last meeting several new members have arrived, and openings are on every hand, so that the usual amount of urgent business was concerned with lack of ammunition rather than with lack of workers. A cable from the boards announcing a more favorable financial situation was received with joy.

As a matter of economy we met this year at Suruga Dai School in Tokyo instead of in some peaceful country place, with members of the Tokyo station entertaining the visitors. The dates were Sunday, June 5, to the following Saturday, with this last day added to the schedule to care for business. Even so some of the reports brought could not be read. Only one member was absent.

Japanese workers were represented in a delegation which impressed the mission in their presentation of actions taken at their recent annual meeting as the strongest group which has ever appeared at conference. It was in itself an encouragement to see what the faithful toil of former years has produced and what the future may hold. Among their requests was one for the revival of joint sessions, now receiving favorable consideration.

One measure to meet the deficit in our treasury calls for the use of a portion of the year's budget of each missionary and for aid from the local churches where possible.

Dr. C. B. Tenny, of the Theological Seminary, fresh from furlough, was given the work of two men as promoter of the proposed higher department of the school for boys in Yokohama, the existing middle school department of which is called Mable Memorial.

Mr. and Mrs. Haynes were assigned to the Morioka field, having completed their language study. The Steadmans, now on furlough, were asked to go to the same needy field.

The mission was the loser and the Tokyo foreign community the gainer in the acceptance by Mr. P. P. W. Zieman, our English teacher in Waseda University, and a popular preacher in both the Tokyo and Yokohama Union churches since his arrival last year, of a call to the pastorate of the former group. He has been planning to enter language school in the fall. He is to marry Miss Dunning, of the Y. W. C. A. in July.

New arrivals welcomed into the fellowship of the work were, Captain and Mrs. J. F. Laughton, who go to the Gospel Ship, "Fukuin Maru," Mr. and Mrs. Derwacter, Misses Palmer, Post, Moore, Jenkins and Gifford, and Messrs. Kennard and Covell. Good news came in the word of appointment of the Wilsons, of Texas, and of two men for teaching in Waseda University. Miss Bickel, daughter of the late Inland Sea captain, comes out to teach music.

Opportunity was always in evidence in reports and papers, for, as one paper said, "1914 seems a century ago!" Tasks are less burdensome physically than in earlier years, but every day presents its complicated and exacting duty. Expansion is the word on some fields—Scott Hall at Waseda University, Tokyo, is well along in construction, and was visited by some of the conference; rapid progress is reported from Mable Memorial and all the girls' schools; the Women's Christian College looks forward to the early beginning of its buildings on a site just outside of Tokyo; and church buildings are at last to be erected at Yotsuya, in Tokyo, and at Shiogama, in the north.

Each day the business was twice interrupted to make way for devotional services, and it was most fitting that pauses should be allowed for the prayer and meditation which such important matters need. The mission looks to the churches at home for support in proportion to the opportunities facing her.—J. Howard Covell.

Church News by States

IN each state the director of promotion is an agent of THE BAPTIST. Unless some other person has been designated, as in a number of states, news items intended for publication should be sent to him. This does not deny the privilege always belonging to churches of sending matter direct to the office. In either case condense your material. Unless reporting some unusual event, make no item longer than six or seven printed lines. You can save our blue pencil.

Pacific Coast

NORTHERN CALIFORNIA

ONE OF THE GREATEST SERVICES in its history was held by the First Church of Selma, on a Sunday morning in June. After the Children's Day exercises and a missionary sermon by Pastor F. Carl Truex, those who had decided to spend their lives in special service for the Master were asked to come to the front and tell of their life purposes. Six young people responded and publicly announced their consecration to the Christian ministry. Miss Thelma Rogers plans for missionary work in China, or elsewhere, if the call so leads. Miss Opal Melton, also, seeks training for foreign missions. Mr. Thorwald Jensen will begin in college this fall special preparation for the gospel ministry. Pedro Cachopero has just received his high school diploma and in a few weeks will enter the theological course at the conclusion of which he will return with the "Glad Tidings" to his brethren in the Philippines. Miss Sena Christensen has resigned a teaching position to go to a training school, and Pastor Truex's daughter, Lois, declared her intent to fit herself for Christian work. William E. King, just graduated from the high school, will enter the ministry as soon as his education is complete. Sons and daughters of the church already in training schools or the actual service are: Mr. Emmanuel Jacobsen, preaching in Canada, Miss Anna Sayre, Lane Hospital, San Francisco, Miss Emma Christensen, and Miss Clara Nielsen, missionaries among the Italians of Los Angeles. The church is profoundly thankful that God has guided it into becoming the Christian home and service school for these eleven young people whose lives are to be spent for others.

A BEAUTIFUL WEDDING occurred on July 1 at the residence of Mr. and Mrs. Arthur

E. Caldwell, Oakland. The young couple are popular members of Oakland First Church, whose pastor, Dr. John Snape, performed the ceremony. The bride, Lucile Hurlbut, is a native of New Hartford, Ia., and daughter of Mrs. E. J. Hurlbut, Modesto, Cal. The groom, Harold K. Langdon, hails from Kokomo, Ind., but has resided some years at Sacramento. His father, Mr. J. H. Langdon, is a prominent Baptist. Mr. Langdon volunteered as soon as Uncle Sam declared war against Germany and was overseas until after the armistice. He has been a very useful member and official in local and state B. Y. P. U. Mrs. Langdon is state secretary of B. Y. P. U. and has proven herself a most energetic and worthy official.

LANSING, FIRST, Clarence W. Kemper, pastor, has adopted a remarkably elaborate and well-organized program running through the entire year to the middle of June, 1922.

Hillsdale College

The sixty-eighth annual commencement of Hillsdale College was held June 12-17. Acting-President A. C. Hageman, D.D., delivered the baccalaureate sermon Sunday afternoon. Rev. John Meighan, Ph.D., of Philadelphia, gave the address to the Christian associations. Rev. Frank W. Padelford, D.D., delivered the commencement address. Honorary degrees were conferred upon Lewis J. Emery, Jr., of Bradford, Pa. President MacDonald of Storer College, West Virginia, and Miss Edna Cold, of Turkey. A gift of $10,000 was announced. Another gift of $100,000 was conditioned upon securing an additional $500,000. The total endowment fund goal is $745,000, of which amount $308,000 has been secured to date. Dr. A. C. Hageman is conducting the campaign for funds and acts as president until a permanent president is secured.

NEBRASKA

FIRST SWEDISH, OMAHA—One year ago the Church was in debt $1,000 in a poor old meeting house in a very bad location, surrounded by foreigners and negroes. This debt was paid off July 1st, 1920. Last November, 1920, the Church tore down the old building and moved the material to the new location, 34th and Burt Streets. The lot was sold for $4,000. Another lot of a former parsonage property was sold for $1,250, which gave them $5,250 to start a new building. One family donated the lots for the meeting house and parsonage, worth $5,000. At Christmas time, 1920, they worshipped in the basement story. The new church edifice cost about $21,000 cash, and the parsonage $5,600, which made a total outlay of cash $26,600. The pastor, Rev. C. A. Segerstrom, solicited $2,500 in cash outside the city in Swedish churches. Owing to the fact that one family in the church, contractors and builders, were competent to draw plans and specifications, and superintended the work, several thousand dollars were saved in the cost of the two buildings. At the time of dedication of the church edifice, June 12, 1921, $6,153 was raised in cash and pledges under the leadership of Rev. D. D. Proper.

FOR THE LAST TWO YEARS Billy Sunday has conducted a brief camp meeting at Winona Lake, and great crowds have attended these meetings and great blessing has come to those who came.

This year the camp meeting will be held July 21-24, and a cordial invitation is extended hereby to all Christian workers to come to Winona Lake at this time and enjoy not only the meetings conducted by Mr. Sunday but also such special features as Dr. G. Campbell Morgan's Bible School, or the Practical Training School for Gospel singers and workers under the direction of Mr. Homer Rodeheaver, Mr. Sunday's chorister.

MINNESOTA

DR. D. D. MARTIN, pastor at Winnebago, on July 30 baptized sixteen people. Five of these converts were converts at Delavan, a near-by church. Three weeks previous, six from this church were baptized. The work is going along splendidly at Delavan under the leadership of Rev. Mrs. A. H. Allen. At Winnebago the work is handicapped for Sunday-school room. The pastor is doing first rate work.

J. G. JOHNSON, pastor of the church at East Rock Creek, went to Utah the first of July.

AT WORTHINGTON, the First Church under the leadership of E. W. Annable, is moving forward; large attendance, finely attended prayer meetings, Sunday-school taxing the capacity of the church.

THE TENT MEETINGS of the Dane Norwegian church at Walworth have been very successful and a number of people will soon unite with the church.

THE CALVARY (NEGRO) CHURCH of Duluth is now worshipping in a building formerly used by the German Methodists. Contract for purchase has been made by the state convention, acting for the church, and the prospects for advance are exceedingly good. Rev. J. C. Bothie, the pastor is giving first-class service.

SIX SUNDAY-SCHOOL SCHOLARS at Lansing were baptized in the month of June.

At McINTOSH, six were baptized on June 26.

THE SWEDISH CHURCH at Lake Elizabeth has just celebrated its fiftieth anniversary. These are coming about quite rapidly now in Minnesota.

ILLINOIS BAPTIST SUMMER ASSEMBLY will be in session at Shurtleff College, Alton, July 16-23.

KANSAS

Assembly and Summer School at Ottawa

The Assembly and Summer School will begin at Ottawa, July 18, and continue daily through the 27th. The sessions will be held as heretofore in the Auditorium and class rooms of the university. We will have the freedom of the campus of the university for rest and recreation. The gym will be used as a dormitory for the young ladies and the new Science Hall for the men. Lodging and breakfast may be had in the homes of the community and meals will be furnished at Charlton Cottage. A splendid group of speakers will appear on the program, among them Dr. J. J. Ross, Chicago; Dr. T. S. Young, Philadelphia; Dr. Warren P. Behan, Philadelphia; Dr. J. T. Latta, Burma; Miss Elsie Kappen, Milwaukee; Miss Mabelle McVeigh, Denver; Dr. T. P. Stafford, Kansas City Seminary; Dr. J. B. Smith, First Church, Wichita, and others.

The pastors should by all means plan to be present, and have some of their workers with them. We will have mountain experience, and large numbers should be present to enjoy the benefits. If definite plans have not been made, take it up at once and mature plans for attendance upon the Assembly this year. If you come once, you will be sure to come again. We will be looking for you when we arrive on the 18th.—C. O. Long, Acting President, Kansas City, Mo., T. W. Cranell, Dean Summer School, Kansas City, J. M. Gurley, Dean Assembly, Topeka.

At YATES CENTER during the past year nearly forty people have united with the church, mostly by baptism. The Bible school has doubled and interest in the mid-week meeting is above the average for a church of this size. Rev. C. L. Kingsbury is pastor.

OHIO

REV. WALTER J. THOMS, who has just completed his seminary course at Colgate, has taken up his first pastorate at Findlay. Mr. Thoms is a son of Rev. James A. Thoms, for many years a Baptist pastor in New York and the New England states.

Wisconsin News and Notes

By ROBERT W. SHAW

Dr. D. D. MacLauren, who has been pastor of the First Church of Madison for the past seven years and eight months, closed his work with the last Sunday in June. This is the longest pastorate which this church has had, and in many ways has been a notable one. He has received 528 members, many of them by baptism, besides laying the foundation of the Francis Wayland Foundation. Dr. MacLauren has held pastorates in Minneapolis, New York, Detroit, Brooklyn, Chicago, Spokane, and Walla Walla. All of these churches made notable advances under his ministry. Dr. MacLauren will not take another pastorate, but will render an independent ministry to the denomination as supply and evangelistic work, in which he had had much experience. Dr. J. Sherman Wallace, of Salt Lake City has been called as Dr. MacLauren's successor.

The Walworth Association

For a number of years this Association has been in a weakened condition, but during the past two years it has come to the front in a very remarkable way. Several pastors in the association have determined that there must be advances, and they have put their shoulders to the wheel and pushed. The results are amazing. There are nine churches in the association with a total membership of 1,000, there being a net gain during the past year of thirty-four. Besides this these churches paid for the New World Movement the past year $9,055.58 as over against $2,872.06 for the year previous. There are eleven young people who have given themselves to religious service as their life work. Besides this there are three standard Sunday schools, in five of the churches there are candidates awaiting baptism, and four of the churches increased their pastor's salary during the past year. A careful study of this association would prove helpful to many of the more stronger organizations.

The N. B. C.

Wisconsin was represented at the Northern Baptist Convention with between fifty and sixty delegates and visitors. Many of our pastors were there, and in most instances the churches paid their expenses, which of course is a profitable thing for the churches to do. But many are beginning to ask why it is necessary to spend so much time in the reading of lengthy reports. The reports are important, to be sure, but to read the major portion of a long report takes considerable time. Why not dispense with this and have more inspirational addresses. One pastor said, "I am going home disappointed, for I expected to hear some great messages, and about all I have heard is reports." We wonder if this apparent evil cannot in some way be remedied.

Vacation Schools

These are the days of Vacation Schools, and the following churches are engaged in a school of their own or taking part in one. LaCrosse, Albany, Wild Rose, Beaver Dam, Appleton, Tabernacle and South, of Milwaukee. Other schools were planned but local situations interfered with their being held. It is hoped that this small beginning will enable others to take heart and that next year a score of such schools may be held.

WESTERN PENNSYLVANIA

AMBRIDGE, Rev. A. A. Blake, pastor, rejoiced over the roll call and communion service June 26, the largest in the history of the church.

CODDEN STREET, Pittsburgh, Rev. F. W. Henry, pastor, has voted to change the hour of meeting of the Sunday school from afternoon to morning.

REV. STEWART M. SMITH, pastor of the Donora Church, has organized two classes for the instruction of candidates for baptism and church membership. That for the children meets at 9 a.m. on Wednesday; the other for the adults is held just before the regular prayer meeting.

Dr. F. W. Gordon is serving Bethel, Carrick, as stated supply and is giving his entire time to the field.

THE BENEFICENT CONTRIBUTIONS of the Pittsburgh Association for 1919-1920 amounted to $55,231.92, but for 1920-1921 the amount was $185,652.54. The per capita giving for the past year was $12.22. This is a marked advance, but allowing that this is one-third of the amount raised for the support of the local church, the average income of the members of our churches according to the only Scriptural rule of giving is $360.06. This has been comparatively a great year. Its success is due to the co-operating churches. The "fundamentals" of financing, as Baptists, the work of the Kingdom are two: 1. Every church co-operate. 2. Every church organize a stewardship league.

EASTERN PENNSYLVANIA

THE CENTRAL UNION ASSOCIATION met June 7-8 in the Malvern Church, Rev. S. E. Smith, pastor. The attendance was large. Rev. Abner J. Davies of Conshohocken, was elected moderator. The gifts of the church during the year equalled 96 per cent of the amount pledged and due. The amount per capita giving increased 331 per cent. The association set as its evangelistic goal—A soul-winning campaign in every church with a total of at least 500 baptisms during the year. The local board of promotion accepted the suggested missionary and stewardship program.

THE RIVERSIDE ASSOCIATION met June 14 with the North Church, Chester, Rev. Saml. Stratton, pastor. Rev. Powell Norton was elected moderator. Rev. C. E. Wilcox of Ningpo, China, delivered the missionary address. All the churches in the Association co-operated in the New World Movement. Missionary giving increased 253 per cent during the year.

THE ALLEGHENY RIVER ASSOCIATION met June 14-15 with the church at Shinglehouse, Rev. T. C. Harris, pastor. The reports for the year showed an increase in missionary giving of 300 per cent. The uniform program for the presentation of the promotion work was carried out. Rev. G. H. Carr of Ulysses, was elected moderator.

THE CLEARFIELD ASSOCIATION held its meeting in the First Church, Punxsutawney, Rev. S. S. Clark, pastor, June 14-16. Rev. S. W. Mitchell, of Sykesville, was honored with re-election as moderator. In the presentation of the promotional work the unified program was followed. Missionary giving increased 175 per cent during the year.

THE BRIDGEWATER ASSOCIATION met June 15-16 at New Milford, Rev. E. A. Benson, pastor. Rev. Louis Bryden was elected moderator for the third term. Representatives of the Board of Promotion presented various phases of the work. Dr. F. P. Lynch of Africa, made two addresses. Missionary giving increased 179 per cent during the year.

NEW JERSEY

THE CHURCH AT RED BANK under the leadership of Rev. W. E. Braisted has closed a prosperous year. It has a present membership of 581. Twenty-one were added during the year and total receipts were $23,957, of which $13,759 went to the New World Movement. The pastor and the members of the Red Bank Church are enthusiastic for the New World Movement. The church in 1918 was giving under $1000 for missions. The oldest son of Dr. Braisted graduated this June from the high school and expects this fall to enter Brown University with medical missions in view. In October the Red Bank Church will have a series of meetings under the leadership of Rev. J. E. Norcross.

Something New in Jersey

Several of the pastors longest settled in this state agree that the state-wide conference for Baptist pastors, recently held at Peddie Institute, Highstown, N. J., was "something new under the sun" for Jersey. Fifty-one busy pastors spent three delightful days as the guests of the Institute. The sole aim was fellowship and spiritual renewal. No pleas were made for any special "causes." By common consent, all discussion of "program," "method" and "doctrine," needful as they are in their proper place, were laid aside throughout the conference. Brethren of high degree and of many degrees addressed the conference, but each spoke simply and from the heart of those spiritual realities by which the minister lives and works. A delightful spirit of informality and brotherliness prevailed in everything. Titles were taboo. One only was our Master, even Christ, and all we were brethren. Abundant opportunity was provided during the conference for restoration of mind and body as well as spirit. The spacious grounds, fine tennis courts and swimming pool were freely placed at the disposal of the pastors. An auto ride to Princeton University and an evening of entertainment, graciously provided by the musical and public-speaking departments of the school, were features greatly enjoyed by all. Plenty of time was allowed between sessions for the friendly stroll or a comfortable chat on the broad and hospitable piazza of Wilson Hall or in the various dormitories where the pastors were entertained. Fully a third of them had never been at Peddie before and were greatly impressed by the excellent equipment and fine possibilities of the school. Altogether, it was just such a conference as appealed to the ministers at the close of a year's work. As a result of it, one pastor said that he felt he had received a new call to his present field. Headmaster Swetland's cordial invitation to "come again next year" was enthusiastically accepted and hearty thanks were voted to the Institute, the State Convention and Drs. John W. Lyell and F. A. Smith through whose combined efforts the conference was made possible.—Rev. Percy E. Wilmot.

NEW YORK

LAKE AVENUE, ROCHESTER, had the rare privilege of hearing Mr. Wm. Holtzclaw of the Utica Normal Institute of Utica, Miss., for colored young people, June 20. Mr. Holtzclaw, himself, worked his way through Tuskegee Institute and went back to found an institution for colored boys and girls outside the educational zone of the south. One of the first graduates of the school was his own mother who took her diploma at the age of 82 years. He now has a registration of over 1,000 pupils in the institution and knows the problems of both the colored people and the white people of the south as few men do. The Utica Colored Quartet, which accompanied him does the same quality of work as the famous singers of the Fisk University.

BAPTISMS HAVE BEEN FREQUENT in Parsells Avenue Church, Rochester, of late. The pastor, Rev. Frederick G. Reynolds, baptized two Roman Catholics recently and several others. Twelve were baptized a few Sundays ago, and fifty-four in one evening. One hundred and twenty-seven have united with the church since January. In the seven years and a half of the present pastorate 723 have been received. The membership is now 800. There is a Storehouse Thithers' Association of 174 members, all of whom bring the full tenth of their incomes into the church treasury. The attendance in the church school, which often runs close to 600, and the 300 Boy Scouts and Girl Reserves, render imperative the erection of a four-story brick building to adequately house these activities. An efficient leader in boys' work, which is of a community character, is employed by the church. The church maintains a scholarship at the Chicago Training School, where two of its girls have already graduated, and two others are in training. Another girl goes to the Philadelphia Training School in the fall. The church sent its pastor to the convention at Des Moines.

CONNECTICUT

ON JUNE 13, in the First Church, New Haven, Mr. Raymond Benjamin Culver, a graduate of McMinnville College, 1914, Yale University, 1916, and Yale Divinity School, 1920, was ordained to the Christian ministry. Prof. Henry H. Tweedie of Yale Divinity School preached the sermon; ordination prayer by Rev. D. W. Lovett; Wallingford; charge to the candidate by Rev. G. C. Chappel, Olivet Church, New Haven; Scripture lesson read by Prof. D. C. MacIntosh, Yale Divinity School. Mr. Culver is at present religious work secretary of New Haven Y. M. C. A.

MASSACHUSETTS

SINCE THE COMING OF THE NEW PASTOR, Rev. Arthur T. Brooks, on Jan. 16, great things have been accomplished and a new spirit has thoroughly possessed Old Dudley Street Church, Boston. Centennial services were held during the first week in May and a Centennial fund of about $50,000 was raised for the renovation of the church and the rebuilding and enlarging of the organ. When the work is completed the church will have one of the finest Gothic interiors in New England. The vestry has also been thoroughly renovated and the seating capacity enlarged by the removing of old walls and the installing of rolling partitions. The congregations have doubled and in some instances trebled those of the next preceding ten years. Prayer meetings numbering between 350 and 400 and evening services sometimes crowding the building to the limit so that many could not be accommodated have characterized the increasing interest of both the membership and the community in this old church. In the five months of this pastorate eighty have joined the church, forty-five by baptism. The Sunday school attendance has increased 40 per cent and that of the Christian Endeavor 60 per cent. On June 26, Chester Arthur Bentley having completed his studies at Colgate University, was ordained to the gospel ministry, the eighteenth ordained minister this church has contributed to the Kingdom's work. In all its departments Dudley Street has determined that the second century of its work shall be even better than the first. The supplies for the summer are: July 17, Rev. C. Wallace Petty, of the Mount Morris Church, New York City; July 24, Rev. Arthur T. Fowler, of the North Orange Church, East Orange, N. J.; July 31, Rev. Frank M. Goodchild, of the Central Church, New York City; Aug. 14, Rev. Cornelius Woolfkin, of the Fifth Avenue Church, New York City; Aug. 28, Rev. W. W. Bustard, of the Euclid Avenue Church, Cleveland, Ohio. The pastor, Rev. Arthur T. Brooks, will not supply this summer. He goes to his cottage at Ideal Beach, N. J., to take a well-earned rest and to recuperate and plan for his fall work.

MAINE

SO. JEFFERSON: Rev. E. L. Sampson, who for health reasons has been engaged in business at Dover for a few years, has taken the pastorate at South Jefferson. He is glad to be back in the real work of his life, and the prospects in the church are brightening fast.

RICHMOND: Rev. Charles F. Frederick, who was graduated as president of the class of 1921 at Gordon College of Theology and Missions was ordained by the First Church of Salem, Mass., and who on June 30 was married to Miss Alice M. Balentine, also of Salem, will become pastor at Richmond.

WALDOBORO: This church finds a successor to Rev. L. W. West, who became pastor of the People's Church, Bath, in Rev. Steven H. Talbot of Colchester, Vt. Mr. Talbot had his first pastorate at West Pawlet, Vt., after graduating from Gordon Bible College. As pastor of the Federated Church at Colchester, he has received a large number during his comparatively brief pastorate. He will find a warm welcome and an excellent opportunity for service at Waldoboro.

THE INTERESTING NAME borne by one of the missionary societies of the state is "The Tillers by the Sea," of Ocean Park. Storer College, the Bengal-Orissa mission and other important enterprises, profit by the toil of this society.

Maine Central Institute

The fifty-fifth commencement exercises at Maine Central Institute, Pittsfield opened Saturday evening, June 11, when the alumni prize speaking contest was held in Powers Hall. Prizes were awarded to Elvard Brown and Florence Wilson. Sunday morning, June 12, the sermon before the graduating class was delivered by Rev. George W. Hinkley of the Good Will Homes of Fairfield. Tuesday evening the Manson prize speaking, consisting of parts original with the speakers, was held. Hollis A. Little and Irman Davis received the prizes. Class Day exercises were held Wednesday afternoon, and on Thursday the graduation exercises, when diplomas were awarded to thirty-nine members of the class of '21.

At the trustee meeting on Wednesday, the resignation of Mr. D. E. Andrews, as principal of the school was accepted, and Mr. E. R. Verrill, of Bucksport, was elected to fill the vacancy. Mr. Verrill has been principal of the Eastern Maine Conference Seminary for the last seven years, and has an excellent reputation as an educator and financial manager.

A Summer City

Boston is a summer city—especially when the East wind is blowing. It is cooler than the suburbs. Many a time do we suburban get "het up" on the way home, after being cool all day in the city. Likewise Boston is a great summer thoroughfare to the sea-shore and mountains. The interest and variety of Fremont, Washington and Boylston streets are much enhanced by the unmistakable tourists, or the pilgrims from the West who are out for a sniff of mountain air or for the mouthfuls of salt fog. We enjoy coming up on them in the crowds, and relish their patriotic surprise as they hover around over Colonial "points of interest" such as Paul Revere's Shop, Faneuil Hall, King's Chapel The Old South Church or the Old State House as well as the new one.

As for Boston Common, the Frog Pond, the Public Garden, and the picturesque lake with its miniature Cleopatra barges, the latter open to the public for a consideration, of course we note a sprinkling of merry visitors at all these haunts. Yet through the pleasant half of the year we are kept surprised with the number of our own perpetual vacationists who fill the seats of the Common and lounge leisurely about in all of our parks. Idle men by the hundreds, reading newspapers at close range, and slow pace, as if reading had not always been in their line. By comparison, a tourist, or a real vacationist, has a suggestion of "pep" about him, or of a man on the way to a chief delight. The beautiful Boston park system is a wonder to those who just discover it, but is taken quite as a matter of course by those who chronically inhabit it.

The Vacation Stretch

Often people call attention to the tendency of the vacation to stretch at both ends. It begins earlier and lasts longer. In many churches, it takes out of the year four working months, and makes necessary an annual speeding up in the other months. If the tendency grows as it has grown latterly, we shall have to settle down to an expectation of only six working months a year in the average church. Then the hot question that will be up for solution will be, what shall we do with the six months' summer? There is something curious about this elongated church summer when one remembers that his furnace fire runs until June 1 and has to be re-negotiated at least by September 15. Must we add to the "fundamentals" a demand for a year-round Christian church? How would that demand fit into what is called "Our Holy Faith?"

Des Moines Echoes

Speaking of our Holy Faith reminds us of Des Moines. Apparently the self-styled "Fundamentalists" are not the entire Baptist concern. There seem to be others. There are a great many of them. And the number of them will grow as the futility of schism and schismatics is the better understood. Those who were at Des Moines from this region seemed much relieved that a serious disturbance did not materialize—as though it was feared. Curiously enough this sense of relief was shared by all of them, whatever camp they represented.

It is getting to be widely understood that we have among us a coterie of men who are demanding either uniformity or a division among Baptists. They will get neither uniformity nor division. As the great body of the denomination clearly and widely grasps the issue raised, the answer will be—Unity without uniformity. That is the holy faith of our fathers, and it will continue to be ours. And we need neither Southern Baptists nor Canadians to instruct us in a different faith. Unity in Christ, and freedom in interpreting and serving him—that is our old faith. The more completely we incarnate him, and get into his business, the less we will hear about either uniformity or division. If the calamity howlers have a keen sense of humor their demand for uniformity among Baptists ought to make them smile. Proverbially have our people been noteworthy for their compact unity, and their go-as-you please uniformity. The unity of uniformity has never attracted us, and it never will. We really ought not to be distracted by an annual rum-pus on that subject; it is wholly unnecessary.

Summer Preaching

Except in particular cases the summer preaching is to smaller though doubled-up congregations. The number of people increases who take a vacation from preaching though they live almost within earshot of it. On the other hand, those who must have good preaching even in the summer will take longer journeys to get it than they do in winter.

Dr. MacArthur is one of the "particular cases." Winter and summer are both alike to him. And whether it is at Brookline or Tremont Temple the people "take a hike" to church, and fill the seats. People like easy and comfortable listening—the subject clearly and simply set forth, and the voice delivering the goods. "Could you hear Dr. MacArthur?" was asked of one elderly lady quite dull of hearing. "Why," she replied, "he is the only preacher in the country I can hear!" That tells a part of the tale. The rest is a story of devoutness, gospel optimism, and instruction in righteousness. So, Tremont Temple fills up all the summer, as usual.

Further Impressions

A Hopeful View

By FREDERICK L. ANDERSON

The Editor asked me to write my impressions of the Des Moines Convention and I comply, though I feel that my view is more or less influenced by my personal equation.

I went to Des Moines quite hopeful, trusting in the Lord and the good sense of my brethren, and it seems to me that my hopes were largely realized. What a triumph it was for the Board of Promotion and the New World Movement! Who could have believed a few months ago that they would collect so large a percentage of the pledge! How much we owe to our leaders in the movement who, amid perplexities, anxieties and labors enough to crush most men, have gone steadily on to this initial victory! And not a word of criticism in the Convention! THE BAPTIST too came through with flying colors.

Our great missionary work at home and abroad was especially on my heart and I rejoiced in the noble sessions in which it was presented to our people. The Womans' Jubilee pageant, the report of our board's first envoy from West China, the climactic session when the brethren from Europe spoke so directly to our hearts, the reports of Sec'y Brooks and Commissioner Rushbrooke, the Woman's Home Mission session on Tuesday afternoon, and the service for outgoing missionaries on Monday evening, all profoundly stirred our faith and gave us new outlooks and fresh courage. For years, our missionary causes have not been so well put before us.

Passing over the notable election of President Montgomery and the judicious settling of our relations with the Federal Council, we come to the controverted matters. Many of us hoped to maintain peace if it could be done without the sacrifice of principles of faith or liberty. I believe that this was the prevailing motive on all sides, and that the great sensible middle of the road party finally had its way. The just, judicial and judicious report of the school committee, supplemented by the admirable statement of Dr. Sweet, made us all hopeful of the solution of all our difficulties. There was no attempt to impose a creed on the Convention. The matter of gifts with creedal conditions was before the Home Mission Board at Des Moines and they had agreed to put it over to September and keep it out of the public meeting. Then came the unexpected motion of Judge Freeman and the resolute struggle of sincere and determined men on Thursday was precipitated. There was no adequate discussing of the subject. A great deal of misunderstanding, and a lack of judicial temper in that session, which in the minds of many vitiated the decision as a final deliverance of the denomination on this important topic. The subsequent action of the convention referring the matter to the board for study and report showed the calmer second thought, and was felt to be the right move by men of all shades of opinion.

Thinking it all over, I am inclined to take a hopeful view of the future. The convention at Des Moines revealed large areas of common ground. We are nearer together than some feared. If we can clear away the misunderstandings, see the issues cleared, get rid of intolerance and cultivate love and understanding, we shall come out all right.

But what a tragedy that we must give so much time and energy to these things, when we ought to be spending ourselves without limit in preaching the gospel to every creature! I wonder what the Lord Jesus thinks of it all, and I am going to try to find out.

Acorns or Wheat

By E. M. POTEAT

Walter Pater in his charming book "The Renaissance" has these two—Acorns and Wheat—in contrast. The whole sentence is worth quoting. He is speaking of Abelard who is breaking into the new freedom and says: "As always happens, the adherents of the poorer and narrower culture had no sympathy with, because no understanding of, a culture richer and more ample than their own:—after the discovery of wheat they still live upon acorns;—and would hear of no service to the higher needs of humanity with instrument not of their forging" (p. 8).

I trust I shall not be thought censorious of my brethren if I say that Mr. Pater's words remind me of the Conference on Fundamentals at Des Moines. With many of the convictions there expressed I am in hearty agreement. My objection is not to what they include; it is rather that they do not include enough. Two things in particular, seemed anomalous to me. The first is that the fundamentalists think that his fundamentals answer the religious questions of today. They do not. They may have answered some of the questions of seventy-five years ago. But thoughtful persons interested in religion today—and who is not?—are asking a class of questions far from those of 1850. I need not specify, but only call attention to the books that grew out of the religious work in the armies of the United States and Britain, and to a report of religious thought among Chinese students drawn up by competent investigators and published in the Chinese Recorder for April, 1921. Fundamentalists must go on to ask and answer these newer and far more searching questions before they can be said to have caught up with the procession. And those who have found answers to the questions of today must be pardoned if they say that having found wheat they do not care to go back to a diet of acorns; acorns that were good enough in their day but not good enough for our day.

The other thing which struck me as strange was this—the defensive attitude. This appeared to be the attitude with reference to the fundamentals themselves and with reference to the Bible itself. Now, I know of no place where the Bible evinces the slightest solicitude about itself; it has no remotest anxiety about whether it is attacked or not. It goes calmly on with its great affirmations—God, Prayer, Salvation, Eternal Life. Let dogs bay the moon if they like, but do not imagine that the moon may cease to shine because the dogs make a little noise. Why this anxiety of the fundamentalists where their authoritative Book shows none?

And then as to the fundamentals, the Confession of Faith, etc. I recently heard Dr. Robert E. Speer say that Confessions of Faith—and, being a Presbyterian, he alluded to the Westminster Confession in this connection—always mean that the army is "digging in," that aggression is ceasing and that the hosts of the Lord are entering on a program of defense. "I have a sword," he cried. "I will not give my enemy a dissertation on the mechanics of sword making and sharp edges. I will cut him with it and he will know that it is sharp!" Surely we are off the track when we begin to prove that the sword of the Spirit which is the Word of God is a good sword put together in a certain way and tempered after approved methods! Use it brethren! And it will ask no defense of its trustiness at your hands.

Obituary

DEACON ANSELM B. PHELPS

Phelps, Deacon Anselm B. of Farson, Iowa, came to his crowning day on Friday morning, July 1, 1921 at 8 o'clock. The earthly life of nearly 82 years, and the happy wedded life of 54 years came to a sudden and peaceful close. "He was not, for God took him."

Deacon Phelps confessed Jesus Christ as Saviour and hard under that pioneer saint, Rev. R. M. Tracey, and he and his devoted wife became members of the old Campetina Baptist Church. Soon after he became a deacon, which office he filled with honor and efficiency till the hour of his death. He was one of the first to volunteer in 1861 and served all through the war as a member of Co. "I," First Iowa Cavalry. He lived for and loved home, country and church.

On October 18, 1866 he married Elizabeth Dickens, a noble woman who lingers here, though ripe and ready for heaven. Of the six sons and daughters born to them, two sons and three daughters survive the fashions and a prince fallen awaits them in glory.

Sunday morning, July 3 the house and yard at Farson filled with friends and relatives, and the church of his love and prayers had all too small a meeting place for the simple, sincere service held in his memory. Rev. P. H. Mac Dowell of Melrose, Mass., an old friend of the family, spoke from the text long ago selected by Deacon Phelps, Rev. 14: 13. His line was to the praise of Jesus Christ whom he loved and served.

JORDAN YOUNG

Deacon Jordan Young was born in Sumpter, S. C., March, 1847. He was married to Miss Louise Preston, Dec. 26, 1868, and to them were born eleven children.

He came to California in 1891, and settled in Fowler, Fresno Co.

He was converted in 1868 and joined the Zion Baptist Church of Sumpter, S. C. Early in his christian life he was ordained a deacon, and served as S. S. supt., for twenty years in his native town. In 1900 he began the purchase of the lots where now stands the First Baptist Church of Fowler, (Negro) to which cause he has always been a faithful worker and supporter. He often told his friends, he was waiting and ready for the Lord to come for him.

On Saturday evening, July 28 after a faithful day's work, he prepared the church for Sunday services; and did some extra work for a neighbor. He went home, and after taking his accustomed bath, lay down upon his bed and in a moment, he was with his Lord. He was loved by all who knew him. This fact was attested by the vast concourse of people that crowded the Second Baptist Church to its utmost capacity. The services were conducted by Rev. T. M. Davis of Fresno assisted by the pastors of all local churches and many laymen of Fowler, each adding his testimony to the splendid life just closed.

JOURNAL REVIEW

Two standard musical journals present their regular issues for June at this time—The American Organ Monthly, issued by the Boston Music Co., under the editorship of Edward S. Barnes, and The Gospel Choir, published by the Rodeheaver Co., under the supervision of that well-known singing-evangelist. The current volume of the Organ Monthly is up to the usual high standard established by previous issues; the music contained therein comprises an "Andantino Pastorale" by Ferrari, "Invocation" by Gounod, "Canzonette" by McCollin, and a well-written, imposing "Solemn Procession" by Baumgartner. All will be of practical value both for recital and service use. Included also are interesting articles—an appreciation of Rinck's Organ School, and a detailed description of the new organ recently installed in the auditorium of the Wanamaker store in New York City.

The Gospel Choir is directed at the choir-master rather than at the organist. Easy anthems by Chas. H. Gabriel, Jr., John J. Thomas, H. A. Henry, M. L. McPhail, and Chas. H. Gabriel Sr. are provided for the pleasure and profit of amateur choirs and the edification of their auditors. Among the worth-while articles enclosed is one entitled, "Gospel Song Composers Wanted," which contains so much "meat" that the editor of this page plans to defy the copyright law by reprinting it. Which is not to say that he agrees with all of it, in toto; for he does not. But in straightforward King's English it sets forth the question of Church Music from the standpoint of the Gospel Hymn devotee: a viewpoint which deserves much more consideration than is often given it. Of interest also is the list and program promised of the "Rainbow Records," phonographic reproductions of sacred solos and ensembles by Mr. Rodeheaver, Dan Beddoe, E. O. Excell, Mrs. William Asher, Mel Trotter's Male Quartet, The Winona Lake Chorus, and many others.

NEWS NOTES

Two recitals were given in First Baptist Church of Haverhill, Mass., by James W. Hill. The first, on February 16th, presented the following program:

Chorale Prelude, Bach; Meditation, Bu-beck; Adagio in A flat, Volckmar; Finlandia, Sibelius; Caprice—Harp solo, Nevin; Epic Ode, Bellairs; Offertoire in D, Batiste; Fountain Reverte, Fletcher; Evening Bells and Cradle Song, MacFarlane.

The program of the second recital, on February 26th, was:

Concert Piece, Guilmant; Intermezzo, Truette; Meditation, Sturges; Chorale in A minor, Franck; Pilgrims' Chorus—Tannhäuser, Wagner; Evening Star, Wagner; Prelude to Lohengrin, Wagner; Memories, St. Clair; Swing Low Sweet Chariot, Diton; Moonlight Chimes, Kinder.

The New England Conservatory of Music Bulletin for April makes the following announcement which is of interest to American composers:

"Mr. William P. Blake, surviving trustee of the I. J. Paderewski Fund for American Composers, offers two prizes for the current year: one of one thousand ($1,000) dollars for a Symphony and one of five hundred ($500) dollars for a piece of Chamber music, either for strings alone or for pianoforte or other solo instrument or instruments, with strings.

"The judges who have agreed to serve are Charles Martin Loeffler, Wallace Goodrich and Frederick Stock.

"The prizes are open only to American-born citizens, or to those born in Europe of American parents. The pieces offered must never have been performed in public, and never offered at any previous competition. They must be sent in under an assumed name or motto, with the composer's real name and address enclosed in a sealed envelope sent at the same time. Each orchestral score must be accompanied by an arrangement for the piano for four hands.

"The pieces are to be sent to Mrs. Elizabeth C. Allen, secretary for the Paderewski Fund, at the New England Conservatory of Music, Gainsborough Street and Huntington Avenue, Boston, between September 15th and September 30th, and not earlier or later. The judges reserve the right to make no award, if the compositions sent in do not seem of sufficient merit to deserve prizes.

"The decision of a majority of the judges is to be binding on all parties concerned. The trustees assume no responsibility for the loss of manuscripts while in transit."

***

We mention again the ineffectiveness of A cappella chorus work unless done practically to perfection. Over and over again we have heard evenings of good choral singing ruined by faulty lapses into unaccompanied passages. No matter how excellent a director might consider his amateur chorus, we are convinced that he errs whenever he permits A cappella renditions which very extensive preparation has not guaranteed nearly one hundred per cent Okeh.

A choir-master, speaking about hymns and hymn tunes, regretted that "Abide with me" is classed as an evening hymn by reason of its first couplet. "A far better use," he said, "the one intended in fact by the author, is for the evening of life."

If organists were to study the possibilities of accompaniments as much as the majority of church soloists study the vocal parts of their songs, many an ordinary offertorium would take on a decidedly more attractive character. This is not aimed at all organists, be it remembered.

FIRST GERMAN BAPTIST CHURCH

Gustave Berndt, Assisting Soloists, and Choirs Give Rossini's "Stabat Mater" With Brilliant Success.

At the church May 23 a very large audience assembled, despite the heat, to enjoy what was probably one of the best performances ever given in Chicago of this most beautiful and uplifting oratorio. Mr. Berndt is a splendid director, and wielded an inspiring baton, to which the fine choir responded with utmost enthusiasm, achieving the ensemble work beautifully, and most ably assisted by Mr. Krogman at the organ. With such distinguished soloists as Elsa Harthan Arendt, soprano; Florence Hallberk-Wunderlich, mezzo-soprano; Arthur Kraft, the eminent tenor, and William Phillips, the popular basso, the solo work throughout was of super-excellent quality, and won the vocalists resounding applause and recalls, as did their excerpts with the choir, and in duet and quartette. Part first was devoted to several fine solo numbers, in which Mr. Kraft, in Dudley Buck's "How Long, Oh, Lord?" and Mr. Phillips in Tschaiowsky's "Pilgrims' Song" did beautiful work, thoroughly appreciated by the hearers.

"Christianity in its Modern Expression."

By GEORGE CROSS

To many of our Baptist people the name of the late George Burman Foster, Professor of the Philosophy of Religion in the University of Chicago, has been associated only with certain doctrinal views that called forth a measure of criticism and controversy. But to those who spent many months with him in the intimacies and daily discussions of the class-room or shared with him the fellowship of church-membership for many years his name has stood for something very different. For they became acquainted with the tenderness and richness of his heart as well as with the keenness of his intellect. His prayers, his chapel talks, his prayer-meeting talks, his personal conversations, the asides and incidentals that dropped from his lips in the course of his lectures opened to them areas of his spiritual life that strangers never knew and that even his own mental analyses and constructions never succeeded in interpreting in logical form.

To such as these the posthumous publication of Dr. Foster's lectures on Christian dogmatics and ethics, under the title, "Christianity in its Modern Expression," will come as a welcome echo of a voice that is now silent and a heart-throb that is now stilled. These lectures were given when he was professor of systematic theology and were not prepared distinctly with a view to publication. This has now been done, with Mrs. Foster's consent, as a labor of love and grateful appreciation, by a very distinguished student of Professor Foster's, Prof. Douglas Clyde Macintosh, of Yale University, who has supplemented the professor's lecture outlines by notes taken substantially verbatim in class.

One might suppose that a work prepared in this way would lack freshness and continuity, but the contrary is the fact in this instance. Every old student of Dr. Foster's will recognize the stamp of his powerful personality giving character and tone to the most abstruse discussions. The thing that impresses me the most as I read the book now is the evidence it supplies of the working of a sincerely, inquiring spirit. Dr. Foster was no dogmatist. Perhaps one might not unfairly say that he was not strictly a dogmatist. His intellect was of the penetrating, analytic order, and he spared not himself or his students in his determination to seek a truly religious basis for theology in place of the authoritarian basis which he felt to be crumbling. Perhaps he did not succeed fully but what he did may turn out to be of greater worth to the true student—he taught his men to seek to plumb the depths of the human religious experience in the conviction that in the working of its creative power would be discovered the working of God himself. He was more of a mystic than rationalist: "God is always speaking, or He has never spoken at all. This does not mean that He always speaks with the same emphasis." It was in this spirit he contemplated the life and death of Jesus Christ: "The idea of the divine suffering needs to be widened to include all deity. Forgiveness without suffering is immoral, and God is the greatest sufferer in the universe." These sentences are quoted here because they are significant of the author's whole attitude toward the traditional opposition between human nature and the cosmos, on the one side, and the divine nature, on the other side. Not in an eternal antithesis but in an imminent unity of God, man and the world is to be found the true basis of a Christian doctrinal superstructure. This is a crude but, I trust, faithful representation of the tone and fundamental thesis of this work. The thoughtful reader will find much in this book to stimulate him to deep reflection and aid him in reaching the solution of his personal mental problems.

As a former student of this remarkable, but little understood man, I take pleasure in commending this work to the readers of THE BAPTIST.

What Will Hold Children in Sunday School

By LEONARD M. ROBINSON

As a layman may I have just a little space in your paper?

Among other things that Mr. Tustin said in his opening address at the Des Moines convention was this: "There is no reason why boys and girls should remain in our schools until from twelve to fifteen years of age and then gradually slip away from interest and attendance."

Isn't it true that perhaps the largest part of our boys and girls come to Sunday school because their parents compel them to, and just as soon as they reach an age when their parents cannot dictate to them about these things, they cease coming?

Ever since I can remember, the church has been asking: "What can we do to hold our young people?"

Mr. Tustin answers this by saying: "We should devise methods and means, both of study and of interesting social service work that would attract our youth of all ages to the school and keep them under the uplifting religious influences thereof."

I believe Mr. Tustin is wrong here, I think the state of our Sunday schools today tends to prove that he is wrong.

Was there ever a time when more stress was being put on new methods, summer schools to train teachers, social service, etc., etc., and how many sparkling, clear Christian characters do we see produced by any of these methods?

If then, they do not produce sterling Christian characters why scratch our heads to think of more and newer "methods and means"?

Surely, even if we have not experienced it in our lives, we know from seeing it in the lives of some others that there is nothing that will hold men and women in the church or boys and girls in the Sunday school but a real live personal experience of Jesus Christ as our Saviour, our Saviour from hell in the next world and our glorious Saviour from sin in this world.

Unless our boys and girls experience this new birth but old experience that Jesus speaks about in John 3 we cannot hold them in the Sunday school and even if they should join the church, and they have not received this experience, it will mean little to them and less to the church that they join. Solomon said that out of the heart are the issues of life. I can testify from a personal experience that if our heart is in right relation to Jesus Christ and our lives obedient to His commands, we will not need any "new methods or means" to keep us loyal, active representatives of Him. We will give of our money, our time and of our life because we love Him "who gave Himself for us that He might redeem us from all iniquity and purify unto Himself a peculiar people, zealous of good works."

"HE giveth snow like wool; he scattereth the hoar frost like ashes." At least twenty-four times the Bible refers to snow. Yet so unusual is snow in Jerusalem that this picture, taken in that city in February, 1920, has the merit of novelty. It may also make those who have experienced this summer's heat long for Jerusalem.

Confession of Our Faith

By AUGUSTUS H. STRONG

Some months ago, Dr. Massee asked me to write a preface for the book on "Baptist Fundamentals." That book was for substance to be a report of the conference held last year at Buffalo. I had read the newspaper account of that conference, and was displeased with the narrow views with regard to evolution and the higher criticism which some of the brethren had there expressed. I have always held that there is a theistic evolution—a use of the past in the building of the future, a use of the seed in the bringing forth of fruit—but that this evolution is only the ordinary method of God's working, and that it leaves room for absolute creation, for incarnation, miracle, resurrection, and indeed, that these are required either to precede, explain, or supplement the evolutionary process. God can work from within as easily as from without and there need be no denunciation of an evolutionary element in the composition of Scripture, so long as we recognize to the full that holy men of old wrote as they were moved by the Holy Spirit.

In this evolution of Scripture, God may use all the methods of literary composition which are consistent with truth—poetry as well as history, parable as well as dogmatic teaching, apologue and drama as well as legislative enactment—and his revelation may be a progressive one, requiring a final and personal appearance of the Lawgiver, to show the connection of its parts and to disclose the meaning of the whole. But because one mighty Spirit of God has breathed through the whole process of Scripture growth from the beginning to the end, Christian experience recognizes the Bible as the book of God, the written word as the expression of the Eternal Word, and when taken as a whole and rightly interpreted, the supreme rule of our faith and practice. Higher criticism has its rights, and instead of denouncing it, we must concede that it has thrown valuable light upon the methods employed in the composition of Scripture. But the higher criticism is not master but servant of our spiritual sense, and its surmises must bow to the total testimony of the word of God. Confessions of faith are not clogs upon individual freedom. They are only evidences that multitudes have found Scripture to teach the deity and pre-existence of Christ, his incarnation, virgin-birth, miracles, vicarious atonement, physical resurrection, his omnipresence in the hearts of his people, and his final coming to be Judge of the living and the dead.

It must be evident to all who read this article that I agree far more fully with Dr. Massee concerning the fundamentals than I do with the opposite party. Yet I declined his invitation to preface the report, because I felt that I could not commit myself to some of the narrow and inconsiderate utterances which I supposed that report would contain. When I saw the report itself in its printed form, I found less to criticize than I had expected, and more of evidence that radically wrong tendencies are at work in our institutions of learning. I wish now therefore to set myself, with the qualifications I have just mentioned, squarely upon the side of those who demand that our Baptist institutions should be true to the faith once for all delivered to the saints, and that none who are unable or unwilling to confess that faith should have place in the government or in the instruction of those institutions.

This seems to me only the conclusion of common honesty, since reading of the discussion at Des Moines. Baptist institutions should be in the hands of Baptists. Those who founded them knew what they believed, and made it known in their confessions. They gave their labor, their prayers, and their money, to raise up teachers who should teach Baptist doctrine; for they believed that doctrine to be only the gist of Scripture and to be the truth that will evangelize the world. Is it honest for us, whom they have put in trust with their benefactions to harbor in our seminaries and boards of control men who are unwilling to say that they are Baptists in the sense of the fathers? Can we justify our holding in places of instruction men who may be Unitarians in disguise, and who are unwilling to declare themselves as believers in the pre-existence of the virgin-birth of Christ? What is the effect of their teaching upon the young men who are under their instruction, when they refer their pupils to all manner of sceptical literature and treat every defence of the faith as a voice from the past? When, in such institutions, all lecturers are chosen from the number of advanced theologians, and all trustees from the number of those who favor what is called a liberal faith, what is to prevent a Baptist institution from going over ultimately and bodily to agnosticism and Antichrist? Has not the time come when a halt should be called upon this facilis descensus Averno?

I see therefore in the present uprising of our denomination, in spite of its incidental disclosures of narrowness and short-sightedness, a movement of the Spirit of Christ, and a call to return to the old paths in which we have prospered. Our success in the South is a lesson to us of the North. Let us stand again for the unity, the sufficiency, and the authority of Scripture. Let us purge our institutions of men who are unwilling to confess their faith. Let us send out to our missions only those who have a definite gospel to proclaim. And let us inaugurate this change by the adoption of a confession of faith which shall make it plain that we are not only Christians but Baptists. Confession of his faith is not only the bounden duty of every Christian, but it is also the appointed evidence of his salvation. Confession of faith on the part of every Baptist institution is equally a bounden duty, and it is also the condition of its continued prosperity and even of its continued existence. To evade the call of our denomination upon its professors and trustees to make confession of their faith, and to justify that evasion on the plea that Baptist liberty permits doubt of Christ's virgin-birth and substitutionary atonement, is to grant to professed Baptists the right to undermine our Baptist foundations, and ultimately to destroy the Baptist denomination itself. Rochester, N. Y.

Fresh from the Field

At the recent commencement of the Ohio State University, Rev. Arthur E. Cowley, pastor of the Hill Christ Church, Columbus, Ohio, received the degree of bachelor of arts.

We notice in an exchange the announcement that Dr. P. J. Stackhouse of Utica, N. Y., has been called to the First Church, Chicago.

When recently THE BAPTIST printed pictures of the new presidents of the Northern Baptist Convention and of the Woman's Foreign mission Society, it did not have at hand a good photograph of Mrs. Geo. W. Coleman who at Des Moines was elected president of the Woman's Home Mission Society. This lack has now been supplied and in the next issue we shall publish Mrs. Coleman's picture, together with a short sketch which is now being prepared.

Letters have come into the office of THE BAPTIST from Samuel J. Wheat and J. C. Williams. But their postoffice addresses have been lost. If these brethren will kindly send in their addresses, we shall be glad to reply to their letters.

Evangelist V. E. Thompson and Singer Leonard Saxon are in a great meeting at Centrahoma, Okla. They are making dates for the fall and would be glad to correspond with Northern churches which may desire their services.

Rev. J. R. Reynolds, pastor of the Washington Avenue Church, Huntington, W. Va., has declined the call from the First Church of Ironton, Ohio, and will remain in Huntington where he done most efficient work.

Will Grow Strong in the Storm

By A. M. BAILEY

The Pastors' Conference and the Evangelistic Conference were alike of a high order. The Jubilee of the women was remarkable. One could glimpse God among them as our sisters showed us the pathway of harmonious, effective service. How much more worth-while was their program than a program which would revert to the days of the Inquisition. There were moments when one wondered if all previous history has not been in vain and would have to be done over again by other successors of Roger Williams. Joshua's modern successor was present at the convention, commanding the sun and moon to stand still and progress delay while he promoted battle. Yet even so there were great moments in our sessions when Jesus was manifestly present.

I venture to assert that in future years we will be found, like the oak, to have grown strong in the storm. The resume of the five-year program was scarcely heeded in the furor of other things, yet it shows that we have grown like an adolescent boy. Perhaps all we have is growing pains. The sober judgment of the whole is not defeated nor set at naught. The safety of spiritual democracy will be conserved. We are learning. The report of the committee on our schools should make those ashamed who for years have been apostles of strife and discontent and fear.

The Des Moines Baptists did their part finely. Seattle will afford a cooler and more beautiful place of counsel, and awaits with prayerful expectancy and confidence your coming next year.

A Deserved Retort

More than one voice was badly cracked trying to reach the corners of the coliseum at Des Moines. Several speakers were greatly annoyed while attempting to find the range by voices from the audience. "We can't hear, We can't hear!" One speaker stopped short and said, "Brother, unroll your ears to their natural length and you will hear." He did.

Killam's Kollum

Those Good Old Days

We remember the day when the vacation period was so planned that one might attend the Baptist conventions. It was a real vacation. THE BAPTIST would like to hear from the delegates who returned home from Des Moines feeling as if they had been on a picnic trip. Give us your name, address and tell us if you served on the Board of Promotion or the nominating committee. Also tell us if you attended every session. We will reserve a good portion of the paper for your testimony.

To Whom It May Concern

An unauthenticated rumor from a meeting of the state secretaries reached the ears of THE BAPTIST. It runs as follows: Some one of the state secretaries or directors of promotion has had trouble because of the failure of THE BAPTIST to do its duty. We understand that some one, male or female we know not, somewhere, probably within the bounds of the Northern Baptist Convention, paid somebody for a subscription to THE BAPTIST. From that day to this he has seen neither his money nor the paper. This is really serious. It ought to be made right. We stand ready to make restitution with usury. Who will give us the facts? Right here we want to say that we do not believe any Baptist institution ever made more mistakes than we did the first year. The subscribers of The Standard, Journal and Messenger, Zion's Advocate and Pacific Baptist were all poured into one hopper. It makes our head swim just to recall the experience. We want to say just as emphatically that we do not believe any Baptist institution has made fewer mistakes proportionately than THE BAPTIST during the past six months. Who is there that has written about a subscription matter which required an answer and has not received one? Speak now, brother, or forever hold your peace.

A Popular Paper

So popular was the miniature edition of THE BAPTIST published at Des Moines that requests keep coming for copies for friends. There were published each day a number 50 per cent greater than the total enrollment of delegates and visitors. In a few hours after each issue came from the press it was impossible to find a copy anywhere except in the hands of delegates. There was no waste. Copies were mailed to every part of the country. THE BAPTIST was glad to render this service. It meant hard work but who cares for work when it is appreciated?

The Success of "Half a Failure"

BY A. E. PETERSON

Promotion Director for Illinois

In the July 7th issue of the Watchman-Examiner, the editor, in commenting upon the report of the Board of Promotion as given at Des Moines, uses the following expressions: "By whatever standard we judge, the fact remains, that after two years of effort our great financial campaign is half a failure. . . . The Board of Promotion claimed a great victory. . . . Nobody felt like discouraging the claims of victory though it takes expert figuring to make it out."

In the issue of a few weeks earlier this editor reporting the Southern Baptist Convention, referred to the great achievement of that body, when announcing the sum received for convention purposes during the year. In view of this set of circumstances an analysis and a comparison of the progress of the two movements is timely. This will be done without claiming any ability at expert figuring beyond ordinary arithmetic, and it will be done without any slant or bias beyond what the figures themselves indicate.

When all vital and related facts are taken into consideration it will appear to every unbiased observer that the "half a failure" of the New World Movement to date, is a greater success than some achievements which have been heralded far and wide as the greatest successes of all benevolence and missionary contributions. For there is a standard of judgment which evidently did not occur to the editor when he penned the above quoted lines. How worthy that standard is will appear in the following:

Some Basic Figures to Consider

When the Southern Baptists outlined their forward movement program they fixed their objective at $75,000,000 and Northern Baptists placed theirs at $100,000,000.

In the campaign for subscriptions Southern Baptists had the great satisfaction of going over the top at the rate of $17,500,000, reaching a total of $92,500,000, while Northern Baptists have yet a long way to go before reaching their goal, reporting now a total income in sight of $52,824,300.

The receipts by Southern Baptists for the year just closed, as reported in the Watchman-Examiner, was $12,900,843., while payments counting on the New World Movement aggregate $12,596,000.

According to the last Baptist Year Book, Southern Baptists number 3,124,880 while the membership of the Northern Baptist Convention is given as 1,210,834.

The Story These Figures Tell

While it is true that "figures do not lie but liars figure" a venture at analysis is nevertheless attempted and that with the determination that these figures shall tell their own story. The New World Movement will not suffer by this comparison, neither will it in any sense disparage the great achievement of Southern Baptists. The comparison is most certainly not made with this end in view. But note these facts:

The goal of the Seventy Five Million Dollar Campaign required a subscription averaging $24 for every Southern Baptist, whereas the objective of the New World Movement, if reached, will require a per capita subscription of $83.

If Southern Baptists had sought the same per capita objective as did the Northern Baptists they would have fixed their goal at $259,365,040 whereas if Northern Baptists had sought the average objective of Southern Baptists their goal would have been $29,060,016.

In subscribing the sum of $92,500,000 Southern Baptists pledged a five year per capita gift of $29 whereas Northern Baptists even as the figures stand today have already subscribed a sum equal to $43 for every member enrolled.

In cash, Southern Baptists last year produced the sum of $12,900,834 on a subscription of $92,500,000 while Northern Baptists in the same period of time, on a total subscription 40 millions less, gave $12,596,000 which is within $304,834 of the amount given by the former.

Southern Baptists gave in cash last year an average of $4.13 for every member, while during that same time Northern Baptists gave $10.40 per capita.

Now, if any expert figuring is anywhere necessary it is to prove that a gift of the average Northern Baptist of $10.40 is "half a failure" while the gift of the average Southern Baptist of $4.13 is a great success. And these figures here used do not include the magnificent contribution of Mr. Rockefeller. This money has come instead from the "common people," the kind of folk that make up the rank and file of the Baptist brotherhood whether North or South.

The Methodist Centenary

In view of the great success of the Methodist Centenary it will be both interesting and profitable to make some comparisons with that forward movement. These figures have been obtained direct from Centenary headquarters:

Back of the Centenary there is a Methodist membership of 3,872,625 and the subscription aggregated $115,000,000 which was Fifteen Million over the top.

This means that Methodists made a per capita subscription of $30 against a subscription of $43 by Northern Baptists.

In the first year of the Centenary period Northern Methodists collected the sum of $16,500,000 on a subscription of $115,000,000 whereas Northern Baptists secured $12,596,000 on a subscription less than one half as large.

The first year's payments on the Centenary averaged $4.26 per member as against $10.40 by Northern Baptists.

Methodists announce that 72% on subscriptions due to date are paid while Northern Baptists claim 92%.

If the Centenary had sought the same per capita objective as did the New World Movement they would have fixed their goal at $320,427,875.

Query: Did anybody ever suggest that the Centenary was a failure? And if not, by what rule of reason or logic can the New World Movement, according to present returns, be regarded even half a failure? If this movement had sought a gift from every member of a like amount with Northern Methodists, the objective would have been only $31,481,684, in which case we would be over the top by $21,114,316; and if our per capita goal had been the same as Southern Baptists we would be over the goal at the rate of $23,535,984!

Is it because Northern Baptists aimed higher than some of their brethren that their efforts are being belittled by some in their own ranks and, therefore, by some others too? When did high aim become a failure and lower aim a great success? High aim is costly, and to reach the mark of high aim, calls for unsurpassed heroism and sacrifice, and, unfortunately, sometimes fails of due recognition. Yet this recognition should not matter, except as it may tend to discourage the brethren. Northern Baptists may well thank God that in one great venture of faith they dared to aim as high as a God-given task required, for in one great attempt they have already given in unsurpassed amounts and outdistanced their brethren by more than 25% even though only one half of the field has been covered.

It is now time that we begin to value aught our own achievements and to think as highly of ourselves as we ought to think. We can do that in this case and "think soberly according as God has given to each his measure of faith." It is time too, that those of our number who have done more fault-finding than co-operating during the past year, shall from this time on be as eager to help as our leaders are to remedy any mistakes that have occurred. For mistakes have occurred. Nobody disputes it. Everybody acknowledges it. And every effort is made to correct them. But what is most to be regretted of all is the behavior of some of our number who for one reason or another, or under one pretext or another, have done their best to prevent success or have done very little to attain it. This circumstance is more than a regret—it is a keen disappointment, a real sorrow! The all-sufficient reason for the "half a failure" of the New World Movement can be found here. It remains for this same group of Baptists to determine what the next three years shall bring forth. No organization, nor set of officers, however efficient, can be charged with the responsibility of victory unless full and complete co-operation is given. Baptists must learn, and in the interest of their great task they must learn it soon, the lesson of the war,—that democracy presupposes and makes place for, team-work!

Two Books

"The Girl in the Fancy Dress."

By J. E. Buckrose. George H. Doran Co. An entertaining, though not overly-probable plot, clean humor and clever dialogue, the usual happy ending, and no ethical problems to be solved—all these factors in an expert mixture go to make up this late volume by a popular compounder of entertaining froth.

"James Bevanwood, Baronet."

By Henry St. John Cooper. George H. Doran Co.

The publisher tabulates this volume as "a novel of the simple, kindly, genuine things of life as they affect a big-hearted man and his fairy-like wife." This characterization is fair and adequate. It is the sort of tale told with such art that the abiding remembrance is that of a delightful simplicity flavored with a real humanity that warms the hearts of the readers.

The Baptist

Baptist World Fellowship

FELLOWSHIP among Baptists of the world is nearer than it was a few years ago. Exchanges of fraternal delegates are becoming more common, discussion of common problems is more keen, and the disposition to place at the disposal of Baptists everywhere the resources which belong to the body as a whole is more marked.

All delegates to the convention at Des Moines must have been impressed with this fact. As guests of the women at their Jubilee was a group of young women, including five from the Orient and two from European countries which are just opening in a large way to Baptist work. The splendid Christian womanhood of these Baptists from abroad, and their keen interest in promoting the work in their own countries, made a delightful impression. After having seen and talked with them one had a new idea of what it means that all shall be one in Christ.

The Foreign Mission Society also had guests, including the Baptist Commissioner for Europe and a splendid upstanding group of representatives from a number of the countries of Europe. The session at which these men were introduced was one of the most thrilling of the entire meeting. They are engaged in Baptist work on what is really a firing line, and have a faith and a story which makes one proud to be of the world company of which they are a part. They have given to many of our people a new conception of European Baptists and we trust will take back good accounts of the Northern Baptists.

When one studies the accounts of Baptist work in Europe and the new day which seems to be beginning there, he is impressed with Dr. Gambrell's word, "This shows what we can do if we are only united." Europe sadly needs the evangelical witness, the passion for souls, the love of democracy which marks our Baptist hosts. Brethren of ours in those countries are making a magnificent campaign and deserve our sympathy, our prayers and our cordial assistance. If the present opportunity is used to the full, Baptist world fellowship will be closer than it has ever been and the Baptist witness will result in mighty conquests in lands which are hungry for the word we can give them.

Probably the task of putting our own house in order is a necessary one, but it should not delay us in doing everything in our power in putting our resources of men and money behind the notable work these foreign brethren of ours are doing. If the Baptist church and faith has the worth we think it has the present situation makes a soul-moving call to all that is in us.

We desire to thank these brethren who were our guests for the kindling vision they have brought. We are anxious that our churches and people shall get the insight. The action will then follow.

"A Warless World by 1923"

IF a slogan like that does not thrill you, there is something wrong with your health.

It was sounded by the international conference of the Christian Endeavor which closed less than a week ago.

It might not mean a great deal if that conference alone were sounding it. But all of the church bodies are urging immediate action. Northern Baptists, Southern Baptists and the B. Y. P. U. convention at Cincinnati passed earnest resolutions for peaceful negotiations and disarmament. Workingmen of all countries were never more in earnest that they are in urging a program to end war. Jane Adams is at this moment in a great world's council of women in Vienna, Austria, laying plans for a war against war.

And at last the governments are making pacific gestures. Help them. Urge them. Send more petitions. Hold meetings. Study the causes of war and resolve that cost what it may those causes must be removed.

The British Empire says that it is ready to disarm. So say France, Italy and (somewhat tardily) Japan. Germany is disarmed. Russia is begging for a chance to disarm.

Difficulties are greater than many suppose. There are interests to which armaments and war are daily bread. We must expect their insidious opposition. Then there is always the American Senate. What will it do? What sinister forces will be found entrenched behind it?

None of these things should move us. Let Christian men and women everywhere rise to the slogan, "A Warless World by 1923."

Face the Future with Confidence

BAPTIST faith and life in the North were never more secure than now, and never was there a more solid ground for loving and confident fellowship, nor more urgent persuasives to united effort in the great enterprise of the kingdom of God.

What are the visible safeguards for the integrity of Baptist faith and the soundness of Baptist life which might be trusted to operate though we who sometimes worry about these matters were dead and forgotten?

There are ten thousand Baptist churches organized to maintain and promote the Baptist principles and fellowship.

There are ten thousand Baptist ministers solemnly charged at their ordination with this very trust, and generally loyal to it.

There is the open Bible in the hands of the people, bringing evermore to bear on their lives the light of salvation as revealed in the person, teaching and ministry of Jesus Christ.

There is the ever-present, living and regnant Christ the personal Savior and Lord of every one of us who believe in him, keeping tireless vigil over our souls and inviting us to a constant fellowship with him in thought and life.

There is the Holy Spirit whose particular ministry in this age is, among other things, to guide the people of Christ into all truth.

There is the gracious fellowship of Christians in the common experience of salvation and in the common enterprise of presenting Christ savingly to the world.

These are God's own safeguards of the faith and life of the Baptist people, North, South and everywhere. Can we not trust them? Can we improve upon them? Does any man know a better way to answer the dying prayer of Jesus that his people might be kept and unified and glorified?

No man thinks so.

Since then these divine guaranties are steadily and potently operative all around us and all of the time, what a mighty encouragement to give our best to the simple business of pushing the New World Movement as the highest expression we know of the call of God upon our collective power to serve the purpose of his kingdom! With what utter assurance we can give ourselves to it in the confidence that our labor is not in vain in the Lord!

Let us forget the petty eddies of fretful concern in which we may have run around and around in the past, and let us fling ourselves with joyous confidence into the great onrushing tide of Baptist life and service.

Baptist Principles Seem Popular

ONE good result is coming out of the current discussion of Baptist principles, namely, publicity and manifold restatement. Other denominations in various ways and moods are canvassing Baptist doctrine and Baptist groups in many places are trying their hands at a restatement of their beliefs.

At Dillon, Montana, recently, Secretary G. Clifford Cress held seven services and at each he took a few minutes to develop one of our distinctive principles. His outline follows:

1. The competency of the soul under God in all things religious.
2. The authority of the Bible as the sufficient rule of faith and conduct.
3. A regenerate church membership is the New Testament ideal.
4. Baptism and the Lord's Supper properly administered are helpful symbols of the Christian life.
5. Religious liberty is indispensable for the individual and the group.
6. Democracy is the product of soul liberty and functions through the individual, in the independence of the local church, and in social co-operation.
7. Separation of church and state is absolutely required on account of the spiritual and personal nature of the Christian religion.

These may be abbreviated as follows: (1) The competency of the soul; (2) authority of the Bible; (3) regenerate church membership; (4) symbolic value of ordinances; (5) religious liberty; (6) independence and interdependence, and (6) separation of church and state.

The Montana Baptist Bulletin suggests also that statement by Dr. Shailer Mathews of the University of Chicago in this connection will be appreciated: "We hold in common with other Christians: (1) the Lordship of Jesus; (2) a saving revelation of God in him; (3) His life, death and resurrection; (4) the fatherliness of God; (5) the regenerating power of his Spirit; (6) sin as a destructive element in human life; (7) personal immortality; (8) ethical and moral obligations of the Christian life."

Our vital Baptist principles might be stated as follows: (1) the gospel is greater than any creed; (2) salvation is not dependent on any rite or dogma; (3) a church is a self-governing body of baptized believers in Jesus as Christ and Lord; (4) baptism and the Lord's supper, properly administered, are significant and helpful symbols of Christian life; (5) religious liberty is indispensable for the individual and for the group; (6) church and state must forever be separate; (7) democracy must be spiritualized.

Religion Seems to Him an Incubus

ONE OF the curiosities of logic appears in a book placed in the editor's hands the other day with the request that he read it and give his opinion of it.

Rev. William Montgomery Brown is the author, and the book, "Communism and Christianity," was written to support communism and denounce the Christian religion as inimical to social progress.

The best we can say for the argument is that if Christianity and socialism are incompatible, so much the worse for socialism.

Dr. Brown states concisely the constructive aims of socialism as he conceives them to be—the establishment of a co-operative industrial organization and the creation of a classless democracy. And by some strange freak of reasoning he concludes that in order to attain these aims religion must be abolished.

If we grant that his idea of socialism is correct, then we wonder where in the world he got his idea of religion. Co-operative industry and classless democracy have been the very watchwords of the kind of religion with which I have been most familiarly acquainted.

Can any enlightened social order rest permanently on any other basis? If Dr. Brown represents a type of socialism that cannot come until Christianity is abolished, he may dismiss all hope of its coming.

By assuming that socialism is strictly scientific, and that all religion is mere superstition, one may manage to set them in opposition to each other. But the assumption is false. Whatever socialism may be, true religion is scientific; it rests on the basis of observed fact and pins its faith to known reality. And the only socialism that has any chance of permanent survival is religious; it rests on the basis of faith, goodwill, justice, humanity and brotherhood.

She Haunts My Life

BY CORNELIUS WOELFKIN

EVERY child is born into the wealth of a mother's love. The outward circumstances may be straightened with poverty, but the riches of love are not wanting. There may be a few waifs who breathe an unwelcome atmosphere and are launched on a loveless tide; but such instances are proportionately so rare as to scarcely count for exceptions. Love plays around every cradle as a reflection of that glory that hovered over the manger in Bethlehem. I too had a loving mother and she lavished an abundance of affection on me. Her love had a divine quality, because it was divinely implanted, spent itself without deserving and seemed inexhaustible. It was a love that smiled and foiled through infancy; it sorrowed and forgave through childhood; it dreamed and suffered through youth; and it hoped and prayed always. "Love never faileth." The child of a prayerless mother is sadly impoverished and defrauded of a divine birthright. I have no vivid memory of my father, whose life was sacrificed on the altar of America's union and the freedom of the slaves. My mother had to do double duty and she did not loiter at the pension office door: but she claimed and obtained her divine dower from Him who said, "I will be a husband unto the widow and a father of the fatherless." She was in the hallowed succession of Jochebed, Hannah and Mary, all of whom entrusted their sons to the care of the heavenly Father.

My mother was the first metaphor of God which focused in my child-mind. She talked to me about God and taught me about Jesus. Those early lessons kindled in my imagination and their abstractions became concrete as I saw the qualities of gentleness, grace, compassion and kindness converge in her chastened soul. Her knee was the first altar where I learned to lisp a child-like prayer. Her smile was the morning light of a heavenly love. Her commandment was the first promulgation of the divine law. Her promises were the human interpretation of eternal grace. Her tears were the first far-off cry of the cross, her reconciling kiss was the first gospel of forgiveness to my soul; and her embrace was my first experience of the Everlasting Arms. Dear saintly mother, forever transfigured in my memory, thy life was a living epistle and incarnation of that love that never fails.

And what of her prayers? They could have been only the travail of the divine human spirit in a human heart. They began with a magnificent and dedicated an unconscious child to God. They attended all the steps of my childhood,—which because of the necessity of her work, often drifted beyond her call or touch. They were flung around the days of early youth when I was sent out into the strange and dangerous world. They haunted me amid the temptations to waywardness and always pointed back to the Father's heart and home. They became joyous benedictions when I was ordained to the ministry of the gospel of the Son of God,—the Savior of men.

My first ministry was in a country church among the hills and valleys of Dutchess County, New York. It was a fine old church and we experienced a revival of grace which spread through that country for some months. My mother witnessed several of my pastorates and just twenty years ago was called into the presence of "Him, Whom having not seen she loved." Ten years after her departure I learned an incident for which I am writing this brief account. It was my mother's custom to make frequent visits among the friends of my first parish. The scene of my ordination and first ministry was to her the vestibule of heaven. Each morning during those visits she took a lonely walk. She was of a mystic temperament and delighted to commune with God. Those walks always went by the home of the sexton of the church, who knowing her wish, left the key of the church in a convenient place. Having gained access to the church, she locked the door, went to the pulpit platform and there, on the identical spot where I had kneeled when the hands of ordination were laid upon me, she would kneel and spend a time in lonely prayer for her preacher-boy. This custom she only confided to one dear friend who after ten years told me of it. Above all she prayed that God would keep that preacher-boy modest, humble and true. How much more went into those prayers, only God knows and only praying mothers can guess.

The heart in which those prayers were born has long been still and the lips which uttered them have long ago fallen into silence. But the prayers abide. They are like the incense in the golden bowls before the altar of God. They are like the winds that blow from the everlasting hills and still breathe their inspiration into the child of her love. And I cannot avoid the thought that the spirit, now absent from her body and at home with the Lord, is no less interested in that preacher son and all his life and work, than when she travailed in prayer for him on earth. With a deeper insight and a fuller knowledge she may still be interceding within the veil, but scarcely with more fervency and love which gave imprimatur to her prayers on earth. The recollection of that praying mother is a steadying influence and inspiration which abides with me always.

Dear mothers, be not discouraged in your exercise of prayers for your sons. They accomplish more than is apparent. You may never see the fruit of your soul's travail on this side of the grave, but somewhere in that glorious beyond you shall see a great throng, who next to praising God and worshiping the Savior, shall count it their highest joy and praise to say, "Thank God for my praying mother. Be of good cheer; your labor is not in vain in the Lord."

THE CONSTANT THINGS

*Fame and wealth may come and go.
The lights of splendor flicker low
And sometimes die, but the simpler things,
The sitting room where the laughter rings
And the mother's smile and her cheerful song,
Are seldom swayed by the moving throng.*

*These are constant! The man may lose
The place he holds, and the world may choose
To flatter the skill of a younger hand,
But the walls of home for him shall stand;
And if he has builded his life for them,
He shall still have friends, though the world condemn.*

Religion for Army Men

BY DRYDEN LINSLEY PHELPS

First Lieutenant, Chaplain of the 119th Infantry, 30th Division

I LOVE rough men. Riding the range on the Mojave Desert in the west long ago opened my heart to the unsmoothed qualities of virile men. It was therefore natural that my ministry for Jesus Christ should begin, not in the hallowed quiet of some sequestered country parish, but in the roughshod life of barrack and saddle. Two summers in government agricultural camps had given some experience in directing the physical, social and religious life of boys and young men. But now I faced the Doone Gate! Demands on body and soul were to come. I could not share the confidence of one chaplain-candidate who faced his committee.

"Young man, can you handle a parish of a thousand men?"

"I think so," he replied.

"Well, we don't think so," was the curt reply which put an end to his hopes.

Preaching to Dying Men

The harsh rub of experience eventually replaced former timidity. Yet the proportions of the task, of what might have been done in those days red and black with danger and fear, induce a profound humility. One man could do so little. His own blundering self so often pushed away the Christ he might have been to those hungry men. My heart still burns within me recalling the chance God gave me. Like a cinematograph of men and events plunged headlong toward the unknown, I see those thousand men jammed in the Y Hut up to the rafters and out all the windows; then later, the half-shadowed faces of the men at the front, listening in a dank dugout to the words of the Master of Men with the attention only of those who may be standing in His presense in the morning. Shall I forget that last service in Tincourt Woods on a clear Sunday morning, two days before the final hammering drive through the Hindenburg Lines? Up in the sapphire sky circled the hawks—Boche planes—watching us, and dropping bombs through the trees. The men of the battalion sat on logs and in the grass. No pews, no organ, no chancel that day. But God was there. He came to that service to put courage and devotion into the hearts of those silent men. We talked of God and the life eternal—faith that leaps

Last January The Baptist contained two articles by Mr. Phelps under the title, "Religion for Rough Men."

The present story continues the same general thought in another phase of experience, namely that of an army chaplain with the men in France. Miss Margaret Hallenbeck his fiancée and he were at Des Moines in the group of outgoing missionaries. They expect to sail for China in August. They will go to the far interior, to the mountains of Thibet in Szechuan. Later it is hoped that he will favor our readers with a third article on "Religion for the Oriental Man."

the barrier. The last hymn those men from Tennessee and the Carolinas ever sang together was John Henry Newman's Lead, kindly light, amid th' encircling gloom,

Lead Thou me on!

The night is dark, and I am far from home,

Lead Thou me on!

Keep Thou my feet; I do not ask to see

The distant scene; one step enough for me.

The following Thursday one-fourth of my congregation had passed over into eternity.

My purpose is not to expatiate on varieties of religious experience at the front; to narrate magical religious "conversions" of marching doughboys at sight of half-demolished crossroads crucifixes. All that has been vastly overdone. My purpose is to analyze a sphere of religious work in the army, that the conclusions may be of value in similar work in lumber camp, mill and factory. Christianity throbs with the pulse of new industrial opportunity. Human nature is the same everywhere. Knowledge of men and methods acquired in one field apply in another. Let the church push through the Doone Gate!

What does that cryptic phrase, the Psychology of the Army, mean? Simply this: the individual suddenly loses his district, separate personality of civilian life in the marching dust of thousand-man battalions. When a man puts on khaki he puts off former modes of outward self-expression, those marks by which he was wont to label himself and proclaim his tastes. Purple socks and a diamond horseshoe pin in his polka-dot four-in-hand once appeased his native egotism. Now his soul must be content to clothe itself in the universal drab. He is now merely one of many. The limitless sea of Army Personality submerges him. Every wave of that sea is the same. The Recruit is puzzled. Cheated of accustomed dress and habit, he fails to comprehend meaning or method in the new life. He clings, like a child and its toy, to the old marks; one soldier insisted on wearing an orange colored belt instead of the regulation khaki. He longed "to be different." But soon enough the unseen hand crushes idiosyncrasies of dress and peculiarities of habit. This human metamorphosis moves with amazing rapidity. Outwardly, our individual has become a Cog in the Machine. Group mind controls. Barrack opinion is united, solidified, so that it comes about that returning soldiers often say what they do not believe, and believe what they do not say.

Group Responsibility Comes Hard

This mass organization replacing individual function cut deep under the foundations of personal responsibility. Group responsibility comes slowly to the majority of men. To thousands it never came. The military system was too immense for them to grasp. It is difficult for a man's conscience to feel specifically responsible to a vast organization. The French government instilled duty and group pride among the illiterate Alpine Chasseurs by a beautiful, symbolic flag carried before the troops into battle. Concrete imagery helps me to make the transition from the responsibility of personal or family interest alone to that of group interest. Some men never make this step. Herein lies one office of morale, and indeed of religion, whether it be in barrack, factory or church.

Making New Standards

The novelty of army life thrust into civilian occupation cannot be overestimated. One undergoes a similar change in removing from rural to metropolitan surroundings, — lightning liberation from former conventions and habitual sanctions. The soldier is hurled willy-nilly into unfamiliar environments. Some sink. A few swim. Many float. Most drift. New standards of thought and conduct are dictated by that vague power, The Army, personified in a dominant character who rules the barrack from his bunk. Moorings on all five levels of a man's life are sunken: physical, social, intellectual, moral, religious. Home letters are the only potent tie that remains. The man reforms his thought, his language, his conduct, in order to "belong", to "get by in this man's army"; he learns to "pass the buck"; to "put out" only when compelled; to "play the army game" to the limit. Yet there is always a multitude of contradictions—men who refuse to reform; derelicts who become sudden and amazing heroes under shell-fire, then sink back into the mire of degeneracy when the great call of courage is past.

What were the religious needs of men under such conditions, which the denominations and the United States government commissioned the chaplains to meet? He must understand first of all the agglutination of every shade and pattern of human nature ever created by the Almighty and evolved by man. The "hard-boiled" and the refined march in the same squad; the drab and the versatile are bunk-mates; the "second-story man" from lower New York and the theological student from Newton shoulder arms to the same sergeant; in a single company drills a clap-stick comedian from central Kansas and a Viennese violin virtuoso from Bohemian New York; the cabaret hound from Thirtieth street exchanges a friendly "ag" with the university graduate with blue blood English ancestry, running in his veins. In one squad on the S. S. Minnekada sailing from Hoboken to Liverpool I discovered a New Haven Italian, a Pole, a Lithuanian lumberman from Maine, a Pennsylvania Dutchman, an Irishman from "Toity-toid street", an American from Ohio, a Kentucky farmer, and all in the charge of a Hebrew corporal! Our American Expeditionary Force was an Allied army in itself! What religious or national appeal could be made to this conglomeration of countries and religions? The war, that Cyclopean struggle which had swept them all in together, was the tie that bound these men. In it many were to find their new country, America. They were to undergo a national rebirth. What were the great moral and spiritual aims of the war; what were its mighty political and social revolutions? To answer these questions gave the religious worker his first and wide appeal. Here was a common footing. A spiritual interpretation of the war's significance changed a man's view from the machine-cog to the personal agent in a world-wide enterprise. The breadth of the new vision demolished the provincialism of former barriers. With the tremendous objective of a new world in view, a redeemed society of nations, physical privation, and the cost of life itself, seemed a small price to pay. Emphasis was shifted from the self-seeking motives. In this lay the "salvation at the front" which some have described. This vision was far from universal, but the heaven was there.

A He-Man's Job

The duty and privilege of the army chaplains was also to keep strong and warm the home ties. Every effort of organization and resource was bent towards this end. The third task was to counteract degrading influences by up-building and ennobling activities and diversions. In this, it was for religion to enlist every possibility to "buck" the tide of immorality and bestiality attending war. Thus athletics and games, books and magazines, movies and lectures, school and vocational training, religious services, Sunday-schools and Bible classes had to be organized. Too often the chaplain had to make bricks without straw—but it is an amazing thing what good bricks can be made without straw, if there be an indomitable will in the making of them. Here the chaplains were tested by fire. As a captain from Camp Devens told me, "The regimental chaplain will be either the biggest man in the outfit, or the most insignificant. He can be the most beloved, or the most despised man in the regiment; he is likely to be one or the other." The chaplain is a soldier of God in a human army. The men expect more of him than any other officers. His life will be radium, or lead, to his outfit. If he be large enough he can alter the complexion of any situation. There is added to a natural liking for a popular officer a kind of reverence and love towards "the Chaplain" who has won the affection and esteem of his men. Whether he kick football with them in the mud, or administer the Lord's Supper, he stands in this respect apart from all the other officers. "The Chaplain's goin' along," said one soldier to his buddy marching along a flame road to the front one midnight. A grin of confidence answered back more than words. "I am become all things to all men, that I may by all means save some." Therein lies the power of work with men: not a capitulation to lower moral standards, but a love and spiritual insight into the hearts and interests of men. "Give me a he-man for a job like that!" said Major Childs who carried his Yale football tactics through the forest of Argonne. And the chaplain replied in his heart with the motto of the Dixie Division, "It shall be done!"

"Getting Next"

How should the chaplain be "all things to all men"? Not by adopting their mode of speech and habit. Their slang, their profanity is too natural, and often too clever, for him. He becomes one with them not by exterior adaptation but by emphasizing those positive qualities which have a universal and spiritual appeal. Those traits of character speak the same language everywhere, on Bowerie or Boulevard. Self-forgetfulness is his biggest text. To sit on the ground around a fire and admire sweethearts' pictures which the men furtively pull from their shirt pockets for him to see is not going to injure his dignity. I knew one chaplain who used often to walk along at the rear of the column when the battalion was marching out of the trenches at night. He would pick out the soldier who appeared most weary and carry his gun or his pack for him. He never got "fagged out." One night my men came out of the lines, clothes dank with mud, bones aching with that terrible, gnawing weariness which only wet marches and sleepless nights can bring. Armloads of writing-paper, obtained by hook or crook (mostly crook), were distributed, and the men told to scrawl off a little note to the folks at home to let them know they had not been "bumped off." The men forgot their loneliness and physical discomfort in this unexpected diversion; their thoughts broke through the rough walls of their French billets, and flew back to the hills and pleasant valleys of Tennessee and the Carolinas. Those letters written home at such times counted more for the restoration of morale than any number of physical comforts. Self-forgetfulness has but to open the door and it is in the room of understanding, sympathy and kindness. One night we were giving a musical comedy in our battalion. The best base singer of one of the quartettes failed to appear. It had been pay-day. He had fallen to his old weakness and gotten drunk. At midnight I found him lying in his billet. Putting my arm around him I brought him to my room. Not much was said at first. We both knew what the other fellow was feeling and thinking. Before the next morning Jesus Christ stepped into his life, and he hasn't fallen since. A letter has just come from him:

"I haven't forgotten my resolution in France and it was quite a coincidence that my wife made a similar vow about the same time, and now we have our nightly family prayer and have ever since I returned."

A Human Colonel

One night under the intermittent ghoulish green glare of the Verey lights near "Hellfire Corner" on the Ypres Sector I crawled over smashed barbed wire entanglements and finally stumbled down the sandbagged entrance of our regimental headquarters dugout. I was making my first call on the colonel upon reporting for duty with the 119th Infantry. The whine of the heavies through the scrawny trees was not the only cause for my trepidation that first night, as I entered the presence of my superior officer. I knew how much depended on our future relations. Answering my stiff salute, he at once set me at ease and welcomed me into the "fraternity" by the remark, "Now Chaplain, I don't want you to think that just because I'm a Colonel I'm not human. If you want anything for the men, ask for it . . ." From that moment a deep and solid friendship grew up between us. "H—, we don't want a chaplain at the front," was the candid opinion expressed at the ration dump behind the lines when I had suggested going up to the front while the division was in action. I went away. Many men thought at first that the sole office of religion was the singing of Sunday-school songs and distribution of tracts. That is good; but the power of religion is to grip the souls of men in action and lift them into the presence of God.

At the front duty demanded that the chaplain live rather than preach his religion. Meeting the physical needs of his men was often the only sermon possible. How a sack full of trivial luxuries brightened the complexion of a "tour in the lines"—making mud cooties endurable. One night eighteen hundred francs of Y. M. C. A. canteen supplies were dispensed, making change by dim moonlight as men stole to and from the dugouts. On another occasion, before re-entering the lines, four of us sent home for the men sixty-three thousand francs. Let me pay my highest tribute of praise and gratitude to that efficient and Christ-like organization, the American Y. M. C. A. in France. Especially the two departments of religious work and of athletics made an immense and utterly incalculable contribution to the moral and religious life of our men. They never failed me in an emergency—whether at the front or in the échelon. Their Testaments printed in ten languages I distributed in thousands, in billets, trenches and camps; we sang from their Service Song Book; my three-ton truck never returned empty when I sent it to them for magazines, books, canteen supplies and athletic equipment. They gave me the finest quality of vocal and instrumental music for bands, quartettes, stringed orchestras. Their religious speakers almost invariably "connected" with the crowd. Forever I shall bless the memory of the men of the Y. M. C. A., and I knew them from Dan to Beersheba.

Mistakes are Kisses

In trench or aid post the chaplain had his hands full. Often I filled a gunny-sack with biscuits, Testaments, writing paper and pencil stubs, chocolate and candy, and crawled along the front line distributing. In the lull of the shelling, from eight to ten a. m. on the Ypres Sector, the men had a chance to scrawl letters home. One fellow handed me an illiterate sheet, but at the bottom he had written, "Take all mistakes for kisses." There were many kisses in that letter. Sometimes two or three of us would gather, squatting in the mud of the deeper trenches, while I marked for them certain passages and stories in the New Testament which I knew would grip them. We knew that the Master stood beside us as we talked of him. Those days are burned into my memory. After the drive through the Hindenburg Lines, I gathered up the boys who had given their lives. There lay fellows who had died in the agony of a terrible wound. In their last moments they had reached towards the upper pocket on the left and pulled open the Testaments I had written in and marked. There lay those little khaki books held open in their cold hands. "For this corruptible must put on incorruption, and this mortal must put on immortality. . . . Death is swallowed up in victory." Those words would ring in my ears. Often we had studied the words together in the depths of dugouts or trenches, before a drive. Eternity was so near, so natural. Like a wonderful spiritual experience, it might come in a flash to any one of us. "I know in whom I have believed," we whispered often to ourselves. The men understood that Jesus Christ had gone through this mysterious adventure of death. Through him we also could. This faith was the great message for the men at the front.

The Girl's Prayers Answered

Religious work in the échelon, when the troops had come out of the lines for rest and were billeted in barns of the French villages was a far more comprehensive and arduous task. Boxing, wrestling, impromptu track meets, Y. M. C. A. canteens, Red Cross reading rooms,—all these filled an immediate athletic and social program. How magnificently in those days of quick need the Y. M. C. A. the Red Cross and the American Library Association came to help! Many a night I have thanked God for their co-operation, when I had to compete against the iniquity of brothels and cafés. On Sunday services were held in barnyards and village squares wherever the scattered companies might be located, the chaplain riding horseback with saddlebags filled with Testaments, pamphlet songbooks and religious literature. How those lonely boys used to make the hymns ring! Some services we held in the rain and snow, out in the open. The men believed that if we could kick football in the rain and mud, we could also worship God under the same conditions. Their allegiance had been won in athletics. It carried over into religion. That battalion became a great family, bound together by home towns and home ties. Often after an evening Bible class in a rented French café two of us would walk out under the stars talking of the folks at home, of that church back in Tennessee, and of the future. One night a soldier told me how his sweetheart had been praying for years that he might give his heart to Jesus Christ and join the church. After a talk I said, "Why don't you write her tonight that you have surrendered your life to God and will follow Christ?" "I can't write, Chaplain," he replied, "but I become a Christian tonight, and I want you to write her for me." So I wrote to his sweetheart. He scrawled his name roughly at the bottom. After a few weeks a reply came back. The joy and radiance of that girl's letter to her lover who had given his life to her Master I shall never forget. The letters home, and the letters back to France—I think the angels in heaven carried them. When "Dad's Day" came, every man sent a letter home; sergeants and corporals wrote letters for the illiterates of their platoons and squads. Those days of hard riding from village to village, of candle-light services in rude French barns, of boxing and wrestling, and preaching among the men I loved,—they are the happiest days of my whole life.

Roughest of the Rough

Then came a day when the old outfit with which I had gone through every campaign and battle marched for home. My sorrow at departure was quickly turned to the joy of a yet more difficult task: assignment to a "Labor Battalions" camp of seven thousand men, by reputation the toughest and roughest in France. The largest guardhouse of the Area adorned its precincts. The men were bitter and grumbling at remaining in France "with the Armistice signed." Believing that all men assigned to "Labor Battalions" were there by punishment, the sweethearts, wives and families of many men wrote, "When you get through in France, you needn't come home. We don't want to ever see you again. . . ." Yet most of these men were as clean and fine soldiers as ever wore the uniform. They had merely been detailed to this camp to perform necessary work before the withdrawal of troops and supplies from France. But this horrible misunderstanding at home shattered the last vestige of morale among those homesick and angry men. Gloom and sullen hatred hung over the camp like a cloud. "I wanta go home" was the universal wail. Immorality like a hurricane swept through the barracks. A string of brothels surrounded the camp. The last spark of esprit de corps was quenched. When passes were allowed, the men plunged deep into the sea of immorality in a large neighboring French city.

Here was a task. Again I can thank God for a colonel with an iron hand, a warm heart and an open mind. Military police raided and watched the houses of ill-fame, the low-class vaudeville and cafés. The welfare organizations substituted for these degrading attractions visits to cathedrals, chateaux, art galleries and celebrations. Passes were regulated; men going on leave were more stringently supervised; the camp area was "mopped up."

The Program that Won

This is how the vision of a clean, happy and splendid army camp caught the hearts and hands of soldiers, officers and welfare workers alike, moralizing the soldiers' leisure, for it is in his idle hours that he goes to the devil. The colonel oiled the machinery. My staff, which reached as high as twenty at one time, included prize fighters from the Bowerie, a brilliant college graduate, vaudeville singers, an ex-circus man, three theologues, a fugitive from justice, a violin virtuoso and others no less interesting. This little family group worked together like one man. Twenty-five baseball teams, seventeen volleyball, eight basketball teams were soon going; a huge gymnasium erected, two tennis courts, a swimming pool, a boxing and wrestling platform, and training quarters for the staff of athletes. A tract of land was surveyed and graded for track meets, horse shows and polo. A camp school, a library, and numerous Y. M. C. A. and K. of C. huts soon sprang into being. Bands, orchestras and quartettes were organized; lectures and entertainments were brought to the camp. Before long we had the satisfaction of observing that only three per cent, instead of sixty per cent, accepted the privilege of going to town instead of taking part in the activities of the camp. The moral thermometer of those seven thousand men rose visibly. Soon the men were willing to wear on their shoulders the badge of the camp with pride. The Associated Press was compelled through military channels to correct the false impression about "Labor Battalions." Twelve religious services on Sunday, and four during the week, in various sections of that great camp, brought the gospel of Jesus Christ home to hungry hearts.

Those were days of glamour. The "untouchables" were touched. Sergeant Ihde, former feather-weight champion of Minnesota, taught me the "whiplash"; "Kid Burns" of Milwaukee showed me the niceties of the "straight right to the jaw";

Becker and Bricker, cabaret wrestling exhibitionists, tutored me in the mat game. Then they in turn came to the religious services. Twenty of these lads I took to Paris for the A. E. F. championships in the Cirque de Paris. We carried away three championships. I lived with those men day and night on that trip and came to love them. Their code of morals is real, but it lies down so deep under the callous that it is seldom appealed to. When their chivalry is appealed to there is a quick and ready response. One night I glanced across the Cirque and saw our splendid heavyweight wrestler, a magnificent fellow, sitting between two French girls of the street. They had captured him as they know how to do. The night before with pride and happiness he had showed me a picture of his wife and three little tots, and told me how he was going back to them. For two hours I didn't hear the bell of the "seconds" or the thud of the men on the mat. All I could see was that picture of that chap's family back home. When the program was over I cut through the crowd and met the wrestler with the two girls going out into the street.

"Allez-vous-en"

"Well, ———, you're not going to let them run away with you, are you?" I said quietly in his ear, laying my hand on his arm. (I loved him, and he loved me.) "Come on home with me tonight. Let them go. . . ." Sheepishly he returned my glance for a moment. Then the old strength and boyish happiness came back into his face.

"I'll go along home with you, Chaplain," he said.

"Allez-vous-en. . . ." I said to the French girls. They understood.

On Sunday those pugilists went to church with me. Some of them had never been before, I imagine. What a sight those beetlebrowed, cauliflower-eared, mahogany-jawed men of the "squared circle" presented to the startled preacher as they strode down the aisle. Before we parted at the trip's end they had come to know what prayer is, and each had his own testament written in and marked. Becker, the running-mate of "Oui Oui of the Rialto," writes from Forty-second street:

"... as for me, I have an awful desire to be back somewhere in France it seems I can't forget them trips we had together, I think we'll have to start another war or do something to that effect so as we can get over there again, anyhow we went through it with a big smile on our faces just because faith was with us. As you know and I know with faith you can go through life happy and less fear than you can without. . . . It was that carried me through on the other side. . . ."

The chaplain's method of work first in importance was with individuals through conversation and personal association. I had two orderlies—one served his first jail sentence at the age of seventeen, the other was a fugitive from justice (and therefore willing to remain in France!) Before we had returned to the United States both of these men had come to know God. A thousand points of contact may lead to changed lives. The second method is with groups. The crowd can be studied en bloc, and treated as an individual. Often one can be more intimate with a crowd than with an individual. "How long is it since you heard from your sweetheart?" I would ask in a Sunday night meeting of eight hundred men. "Four weeks," a "buck" would reply from the fifth row. Occasionally a personal conversation would ensue which bound those eight hundred men together like one family. This group-consciousness was invaluable in arousing camp honor, cohesion in company, team or quartette. The third method was to make individuals and groups do specific work. I recall a wonderful tenor on one of our quartettes. Broadway vaudeville had known him many years. Sunday nights, when rain or cold prevented a service in the open square, that quartette and I used to go from billet to billet, and the boys would sing the old gospel hymns, "Home over there," "Moment by moment," "Jesus is tenderly calling," and all the rest. That fellow, who had run the gamut in the past, suddenly remarked to me one night when we had finished our circle of billets, "Chaplain, I wish my mother could hear us singing these old songs." Singing for others had stirred his own heart. God works that way. That was Jesus' method with those rough men His disciples. His gospel was interesting and attractive, understandable, straight-forward, thorough-going, up-lifting, hard-hitting, all-inclusive. Jesus' gospel makes profanity, smut, vice, drinking and brutality, dishonesty, greed and selfishness ugly and out of place. His cleanness cleanses other lives stained with coarseness and vulgarity.

Men admired Christ vaguely in the army. They did not know Him. Yet when they saw Him face to face they followed His cross with devotion. Men hunger for God and for religion as they hunger for nothing else. Religion, if it be of God: virile and tender, broad and sweet, will be accepted by rough men when they understand its meaning and value. It is able to transform men from brutality and unutterable coarseness to Christ-likeness; to change groups from sullen mob spirit to "family" spirit; to alter systems, either military or industrial, from heartless machines to organizations for human betterment and happiness. Of such is the Kingdom of Heaven.

The Dynamic for the New World Movement

An Address Delivered at the Northern Baptist Convention

BY WALTER E. WOODBURY

IT has always been easy to believe in a far off heaven. Behold the boldness and energy of Jesus. He preached "The Kingdom of Heaven is at Hand." Jews for centuries had dreamed of better things somewhere in the distant future. The challenging note in the preaching of Jesus was his constant proclamation "The Kingdom is at Hand." within reach to-day. "This day is Scripture fulfilled in your ears." To the people into whose eyes he looked he said, "Some of you are going to see this kingdom come with power, ere you die." And they did see it.

It is still easy to believe in a far off heaven. It is easy to think of the things that ought to be as somewhere, sometime, somehow becoming realized. What we need is the boldness and spiritual energy of Jesus to realize that some of these things that ought to be can be here and now. One of the evidences of the spirit of Christ in our New World Movement is that we dared to say at Denver "Things that are needed in our schools and colleges, in our missions and Christian settlements, shall be provided by 1924." If any of us have gotten away from that splendid courage, may God fill us again with holy boldness. The permanent equipment and endowment for our schools, colleges and seminaries they can and must have by April 30, 1924. The half-manned mission stations must be fully-manned by 1924, though it mean almost doubling our present forces. The story of mission property with windows boarded up must be a thing of the past by 1924. The hampering limitations to needed work amongst new Americans must be removed. We owe it to our country as well as to our God. This must be only more insistent to-day than in the day when we first recognized it at Denver. And what must be, can be. I bring you a gospel like that which Jesus preached. The heaven of what ought to be in our denomination is not far away. It is at hand. It can be realized.

The situation to-day is this. We started out—many of us—two years ago, inspired by this vision of doing what ought to be done. With great enthusiasm the New World Movement was launched, and sped on its way until over fifty millions of dollars were definitely promised to our denominational work. This was done in spite of many unforeseen and unpredictable hindrances. Now at length the progress of this splendid movement is halted, and we face the question "Where is the dynamic to set our great program going again, and give it power enough to go on to completion?" Some of our churches have done all that can be asked of them. Some of us at least, after talking it over with God again and again, know that we have no right to take another penny from our meager income for church and benevolent purposes. As we have longed to give larger gifts, we have heard the voice of God saying to us "He that fails to provide for his own is worse than the infidel." We have gone to our friends and urged them, with an insistence that has almost lost us some friends, to give their utmost to the New World Movement. We may have only half reached our allotment, but honestly before God, until others are converted and until Christians of narrow vision can be educated to our missionary program, we cannot see another cent available in some of our churches. It is truly and humanly impossible to raise another cent in some quarters. On the other hand, there are many of our churches who, for one reason or another, have withheld anything like enthusiastic co-operation, and still many stand aloof. Here is a situation, the like of which is often met in the progress of great spiritual enterprises. Humanly speaking, it is an impossible situation; but such impossible outlooks immediately suggest to the Christian the words of his Lord, "With man, it is impossible, but not with God. All things are possible with God." And to-day we realize that God, Himself, must come to our help.

An Adequate Power

No incident in the New Testament is more suggestive for our present situation than Jesus' conversation with the rich young ruler, which prompted the memorable text just quoted. God has revealed to us in that conversation the dynamic, sufficient for every spiritual enterprise; a power entirely adequate for the consummation of our New World Movement, in spite of every discouraging circumstance. Jesus' first word to the young man anxious to be assured of eternal life was, "You know the commandments." Obedience to God's law is powerful to open heaven's gate; to open to us the ideal world that crowds in unseen all about us. The young man at once replied, looking into the searching eyes of the Christ, "These commandments, Lord, have I kept since my youth." And no doubt he had kept them in a superficial sense. He had never killed anybody. He had never committed adultery. He had never been caught in a swindle. He had treated his parents with decent respect. Jesus looked at him, the product of a careful and wealthy culture, and he loved the young man. But he proceeded immediately to cut into his superficial complacency and self-satisfaction. He said, "Go sell your property and give the money to the poor, and come be my disciple." Plainly and directly Jesus spoke the unwelcome truth of Christian stewardship. In that simple instruction he flashed before the eyes of the young man the truth that all his property belonged to God; that he, himself, belonged to God; that heaven is only for whole-hearted disciples of the Christ; that discipleship and its heavenly reward cost something. The young man turned away sorrowful, for he had great possessions. Shortly afterward, Jesus talked over the case with the faithful few who had met similar wholesale demands upon their lives and property, and who had forsaken all to follow him. He talked about the impossibility of a rich man ever getting into heaven. The apostles, having in mind the young man of exceptional opportunities, who had just turned away from Jesus, were astonished beyond measure. "Who then can be saved," they said, "if such a splendid youth as this cannot?" The apostles are face to face with the human impossibility of their spiritual task. The Master urges upon them the importance of union with God—such vital union as comes only in answer to importunate prayer. He says, "With God, all things are possible." We are reminded of the time, when speaking of the spiritual fruit which His real disciples should bear for God, Jesus said, "I am the vine of which ye are the branches, and without me ye can do nothing." We are reminded of the numerous times when Jesus explicitly urged upon his disciples that "Men ought always to pray and never to faint," in their praying; that men ought to pray importunately, holding on in their prayer, for although God is with us all at all times, the full power of God then and now has been released only by the importunate prayer of obedient, fully surrendered disciples.

The Possible Impossible

We are facing here the truth that God is able and willing to co-operate with men in achieving what is humanly impossible, and the conditions here suggested are a deeper obedience to His commandments, the practice of Christian Stewardship and the seeking of such union with God as is realized through importunate prayer. These are not three separate means of releasing the power of God, but three aspects of the one dynamic life attitude that is adequate for all spiritual enterprise. We may have all the life service recruits required; all the permanent equipment needed; every cent of the hundred million dollars asked for by May 1, 1924, if we will but meet God's conditions.

The progress of the New World Movement is stopped at the half-way point, because of disobedience to God's commandments. "Thou shalt not kill." Northern Baptists are not murderers, but when we realize the deep significance that Jesus gave to these commandments can we not hear Him calling us to repentance? Commenting on this command against murder, Jesus said that the essence of it is such a lack of love toward others as leads first to anger with your brother, or to such lack of esteem for him that you regard him as a good-for-nothing—a fool—whose point of view is not worthy of any careful or sympathetic consideration. It is easy to think of the murderer as answerable at the judgment. Jesus says anger and despite against your brother are likewise answerable. And he urges, "If in the midst of making a gift to God, you realize that your brother has a grievance against you, leave your gift making, go and make friends with your brother first, then return and make your offering." "He who loveth not his brother, whom he hath seen," says John, "how can he love God whom he hath not seen. If any man says that he loves God, while he hates his brother, he is a liar." Paul, seeing the disposition to strife and division among first-century saints, exhorted them, "Do nothing in the spirit of factiousness, or of vain glory but with true humility let every one regard the rest as being of more account than himself, each fixing his attention not simply on his own interests, but on those of others also." "I warn every individual among you not to value himself unduly." Romans 12-3. There is dynamic for world conquest in brotherly love. There is only defeat in mutual suspicion and distrust. Our New World Movement will move on to victory, if only the sluice gates of brotherly love can be opened. Then the barren spots parched by distrust and suspicion, like the flooded desert, will blossom as the rose. Let us pray God importunately for a Baptism of His Holy Spirit, sufficient for these things.

At Least a Tenth

"Do not steal. Do not defraud." Northern Baptists are not thieves but dare we say that not one of our number has in anywise robbed God? The tithe of the income of Northern Baptists would provide every penny asked for in the New World Movement and give the local church treasurers funds to meet local needs, beyond anything they have ever had. And yet God's word is not clearer on any point than on this, that the minimum requirement to keep the sense of God real in life and the religious life and morale of the nation strong is the first tenth of the income for religious purposes.

"Do not bear false witness." None of us are intentional liars, I trust, but how difficult it is to avoid misrepresentation and false emphasis, when brotherly love fails. Only love can witness truly of a brothers' motives, deeds or words. "Love is the fulfillment of the law." Suspicion and distrust cannot obey.

Our Parents Dared

"Honor thy father and mother." We have been elated as we have reviewed the glorious work, undertaken by our mothers of fifty years ago. Though poor and few, compared with us, they dared to get under the burden of winning a world. Is it deep and Christ-like honor to such fathers and mothers as founded our schools and colleges and organized our great missionary societies to undertake a reasonable advance and leave it half done? God help us each to search his own heart in the light of His law, and hear the voice of Jesus again saying "Except your righteousness, exceed the righteousness of the scribes and the Pharisees ye shall in nowise enter into the kingdom of heaven." Heaven is indeed nearby, but no superficial obedience of God's great laws will open the nearby door. Let us repent and release the power of God by a deeper obedience to God's gracious commandments.

Another aspect of the dynamic that will bring our New World Movement through to victory lies in the power of truth to set men free. Release the truth about world needs. Let the people know the crying needs in our colleges and mission fields, and their bondage to niggardly giving will be broken. How do I know? Where the survey has been studied churches have given in millions this past year, where they have not "lifted up their eyes unto the fields to behold the whiteness of the harvest," the churches have given only in hundreds of thousands.

Action Follows Knowledge

Reveal the truth about the need and the relief is forthcoming. But the need of the poor was only incidentally referred to by Jesus in seeking to help the rich young ruler into the kingdom. He pointed to the truth nearer home. The truth of Christian stewardship. Why did Jesus tell the rich young ruler to sell all his property? Primarily that the rich man himself might be saved. Bondage to property is all the more terrible because the slaves, themselves, do not realize their slavery. With the fearlessness and directness of Jesus, if we would win out in our New World Movement, we must preach this same truth. From public platform and in personal conference, the slaves to property must be warned. We must let our rich men great and small know that they are losing heaven, because of their bondage to property. Some of them, of course, will look at their great possessions and turn away from us as did the rich man of old from our Lord. They will go sorrowfully because they want eternal life and yet they dare not try to live without great properties to provide for their future. But there is power in the truth to set men free, and although some of the slaves to money will cling to their slavery and refuse to be set free, is it not our plain duty to-day, as followers of Jesus, to speak the truth in love? We are God's people and all we have is His. It will take courage for this task, but our hearts ought to be made bold as we consider that all sorts of human liberties have been won only by the pressing of truths that were unwelcome to the slaves who have profited thereby. Let us also reflect upon the fact that the truth is to life what a road map is to a tourist. Living without the truth is to life what a road map is to a tourist. Living without truth is traveling a country with the wrong road map.

Shall We Get Lost?

How dangerous the situation of our Baptist brethren if their ideas do not fit the reality of life ahead of them, what risk of losing their way, of incurring unnecessary accident and of never reaching home. Jesus did not mince words in talking with the rich young ruler. He made it plain to him that, for him, there was no entrance into heaven, unless he would sell everything he had, give it away, and give his whole life to Christian service. If all our churches, great and small, and all our mission stations are to be manned as they ought to be by 1924, is it not plain that the voice of Christ must speak this same word to some of our people? Must not some of us sell our property and free our hands, and give ourselves with all our mature experience to full time Christian service? The boys and girls in our schools and colleges can only a few of them be ready to help by 1924, and how shall they be drafted who must do this emergency service unless all of us to-day place our entire property and ourselves upon the altar of God, and wait on God until we are sure that he means for us to go on, making money for him, that shall support those whom he shall call as he did Peter to give up their business entirely. There is wonderful power in the truth of Christian stewardship made inescapably plain. Let every Baptist in the Northern Convention be instructed in these principles this coming year. Leave no way for any Baptist to escape. Let those who will not receive the truth go their way, if they must, but let the truth be spoken plainly.

Importunate Prayer

Another aspect of the dynamic, sufficient for our New World Movement is the power of the importunate prayer of obedient, whole-souled disciples. Such prayer lays hold on God, and the infinite resources adequate to things otherwise impossible. Have we done all we ought to do for our great program, until we have be-seized the throne of grace, thus persistently? When our souls become burdened for others, who are not converted, we begin to pray with uncommon earnestness and God answers invariably with a gracious revival of religion. Likewise God's Holy Spirit has a way of releasing moneys in unexpected places in answer to the importunate prayer of those who have truly done their utmost. You say, "we have prayed God for the hundred million dollars ever since we first dreamed of it at Denver." Yes, so have I. But, have we prayed with the insistence and the determination of that widow in the parable of Jesus, who plagued the life out of an unjust judge until at last he gave her a judgment. Jesus said of that woman, "She is an illustration of the kind of prayer that gets things from God, when easier praying fails." Perhaps we ask too small a thing of God, when we pray for just one hundred million dollars. What an insignificant gift such a sum of money is for him to whom belongs all the silver and the gold and the cattle upon a thousand hills, in whose hands are the souls of every living creature. May it not be that in his providence all the obstacles and lack of human co-operation that we have faced are just to drive us back to God, with importunate prayer that shall make the hundred million dollars truly subordinate to the bigger things that God is anxious to give us—namely, the love and co-operation of our brethren and the eternal souls of many, who to-day are lost and to whom the nearby heaven on earth is closed, because of sin and selfishness. "Ye have not because ye ask not," said James to some Christians of the first century who were poorer than they had any right to be. Let us be very honest at this moment. How much do your pray? How much have you prayed to-day? Away with the talk about unanswered prayer. It is unoffered prayer that is mostly responsible for our spiritual poverty. Daniel with the affairs of whole provinces on his hands had fixed times and places for prayer, and could stand alone for God against a whole empire. How often in ministerial retreats, when we search our hearts for the cause of our comparative failure in building up the kingdom, do even our most faithful pastors confess, "We do not pray enough." The path to the closet with the closed door is not worn as it ought to be. The world changing power that comes from the prayer closet, we must have and we can get it no where else. Prayer brings results.

A Miracle-Working Force

Prayer wins victories. Prayer achieves. For this reason Jesus made it a duty. He said, "Men ought always to pray." He did not leave it to our feeling. Would that we might see it as clearly as did Samuel of old. Our ceasing to pray for one another in kingdom enterprises is "a sin against the Lord." Let us say with Samuel, "Moreover as for me, God forbid that I should sin against the Lord in ceasing to pray for you." Wicked men of Job's day facing prayer said, "What profit should we have if we pray unto him?" If that question is in your heart, face it frankly. Probe it deeply. There is immense profit in prayer. It is mightily worth while to call on God, and there are men who are weakly entertaining insidious doubts about prayer who, if they would insist on getting at the facts, who if they would experiment with prayer persistently, would become giants of strength to our denomination, where now they count for nothing, so far as prayer power goes. The farmer with a mowing machine left out in the rain deserves the poorhouse. No wonder our churches are poor, when so many of them are content to pay a minister a good salary and then put him out in an empty prayer room to rust out. No wonder our denomination has not half the resources it needs, when so little prayer goes up week by week from our prayer meetings for our denominational leaders. May God forgive us. May we repent as we ought. The mere mention of the name of George Mueller is enough to remind us that prayer is mighty in money raising, as in other kinds of spiritual enterprise.

Liberty, education, wealth and science have wrought miracles in this land of ours, yet our conscience is sluggish, our souls are anemic, our sins are as scarlet, our vices are red like crimson. Even such mission work as we are financing to-day is discounted because of the sins of America. We must take up afresh the miracle working force of importunate prayer. The apostles wielded this force with astonishing results. Facing the impossible task assigned them by the great commission they waited in Jerusalem for the Omnipotent Leader and the supernatural power that was pledged to them on the conditions of consecration and prayer. The cause of Christian missions was launched in prayer. It was sped on its way in a hostile world by prayer. Every step was taken in prayer. Prayer called forth and equipped the workers. The successor to Judas was chosen after prayer. The seven deacons were chosen by prayer. Paul and Barnabas were chosen by prayer. Not one of these began his work without the preparation of prayer. The prayers of Peter and Cornelius, of Luke and of Paul, opened the door of faith to the gentiles. Prayer opened dungeon doors and saved the lives of some of the apostles. Midnight prayers were answered by earthquakes in Philippi, that even shook the soul of the jailor free from the shackles of sin. Every emergency, every advance step, every act of wider obedience recorded in the Acts of the Apostles is met and made possible by prayer.

The Tale Missions Tell

The history of missions in recent centuries tells the very same story. At a Baptist ministers meeting in Northamptonshire England, in 1784, a plan drawn up by John Ryland was addressed to the churches, urging "that the spread of the gospel to the most distant parts of the habitable globe be the object of their most fervent request." Two years later William Carey was baptized by the same John Ryland. It was out of special fervent prayer that Carey and his little band of Baptist ministers addressed themselves to the task of evangelizing the world. The London Missionary Society, an organization of non-Baptist churches was a direct result of Carey's work, and itself was conceived and founded in prayer. Long before this, as the result of four years of prayer, the first Moravian missionaries went out from Herrnhut. It was a prayer meeting at Williams-town that gave birth to the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions. The fervent prayer of Adoniram Judson in an honest search of the word for God's plain truth begat our own American Baptist Foreign Mission Society. The Pentecost in the Lone Star Mission, among the Telegus, in the days of John E. Clough, has no adequate explanation outside of the importunate prayer born of a denominational crisis that almost lost to us that fruitful field. The Korean apostolic fervor and growth has been fed by such holding on in prayer to God as we know little about in this land of easy praying. The humanly impossible achievements of all pioneer missionaries and Bible translators were wrought by men, who knew how "to advance upon their knees." The only source of missionary supply, recognized by Jesus, was "Pray ye the Lord of the harvest, to thrust forth laborers into his harvest." We have no right to expect any worthy and outstanding advance like the New World Movement to be achieved without the importunate prayer of faithful disciples. Will God give us what our program calls for by May, 1924? Will he hear our prayer?

Will Our Faith Last?

That is not the question. Will our faith hold out until May, 1924? Will we hold on in prayer that refuses to be denied? That is the decisive question. The dynamic adequate for the completion of our New World Movement is none other than the power and co-operation of God in an otherwise impossible task. Such power will be released by a deeper obedience, a larger courage in proclaiming the truth of stewardship and the importunate and unceasing prayer of those who have done their utmost in giving. At the turn of the tide in the battle of the Marne, a part of the line that General Foch commanded, drove the attacking Germans back. Another wing of his forces were utterly routed by the Germans, who were so overwhelmingly successful in their part of the line that they began forthwith to celebrate. At this point the unconquerable Foch sent orders to the exhausted but victorious right wing to rush immediately to the weak spot and attack. They did so and won the day. I come as a runner from the Lord of Lords tonight, with an order for the exhausted but victorious Northern Baptists, who have done all that was asked of them in the giving line to rush to the praying line, and press the attack there. Complete victory is ours if we will obey this summons with glad hearts and willing hands.

Additional Notes of the Northern Baptist Convention

From some cause a part of the report of the Northern Baptist Convention at Des Moines which had been prepared for THE BAPTIST disappeared in transit and has not yet come to hand. How much matter it contained we do not know, but our attention is called to the fact that among the items of information so lost was a very interesting account of the introduction of the distinguished Baptist leaders from various European countries. Such an omission is not so much an act of neglect towards the guests of the Convention (for no intelligent Baptist or respectable Baptist paper could be guilty of conscious neglect towards them) as it is a disappointment to our readers, who are deeply interested in all that those Brethren say and do. From such sources of information as are available to us at this time we sketch briefly an account of their introduction to the Convention.

The guests of the occasion were Robert Farely, Pastor Henri Vincent and a son of Mr. Vincent, of France; Rev. G. C. Lundin of Sweden; Dr. Jacob Heinrichs of Chicago, representing the Baptists of Alsace-Lorraine; Rev. John Alexander Frey of Latvia; Rev. John A. Ohn, secretary of the Norway Baptist Convention, and Prof. Arnold Ohn, his son, who is a member of the faculty of the Baptist Seminary in Christiana; Rev. Peter Grarup, secretary of the Baptist Young People's Union of Denmark; also Madame Kolator of Czecho-Slovakia and Mrs. Marcha Wenske of Poland, who had been previously introduced in connection with the women's Jubilee.

Spiritual Rebuilders of Europe

President Emory Hunt of Bucknell University, who had been a member of the delegation of Northern Baptists to the London Conference last fall, introduced the visitors impressively one by one, and each, upon being presented, responded with earnest greetings and a brief statement of conditions in his or her home land. In order to appreciate the depth of feeling on the part of all present, it will be remembered that these visitors have gone through the horrors of the World War that ravaged the homes of some of them and cast its deep shadow and sorrow over all of them. They have some of them, and cast its deep shadow represent the remnant that must rebuild Europe spiritually if it is ever to be rebuilt.

Several stirring incidents attended the presentation of the guests. Dr. J. H. Rushbrooke for instance, the distinguished visitor from England and the Baptist Commissioner for Europe, presented Mr. Frey with a thrilling account of his suffering for the gospel under the government of Russia; first having been exiled to Siberia under the Czar and later greatly harassed by the Bolsheviks. In Siberia he came near dying of starvation, as his companion in exile did. Dr. Rushbrooke declared him "a hero, a man of wit and sense, worth knowing." Mr. Frey gave the following interesting facts: the Lettish people number 2,500,000; Riga, their capital city and a fine seaport which had before the war 600,000 people has now only 200,000; during the war the government changed seven times; Baptists have seventy-nine churches, fifty-two buildings, sixty-one meeting places, 8,033 members, seventy-three Sunday schools, with 2,864 enrolled, and baptized last year 750; Esthonia, a small province adjoining Latvia, has 3,000 Baptists.

Another diversion from the regular order was the introduction of Mrs. Wenske by Dr. Charles A. Brooks who had been a guest in her home in Poland. The story of conditions and of Baptist needs in both Poland and Czecho-Slovakia, as told by Mrs. Wenske and Madame Kolator, made a strong appeal for help. As to living conditions, Madame Kolator stated that even rooms are rationed in Czecho-Slovakia.

Son Follows Father

A third diversion was the presentation by Mr. Lundin of a young Swedish brother who is going as a missionary to China and whose father is already engaged there in missionary service.

Mr. Grarup conveyed the interesting information that in Denmark the Baptists are the largest free church body, with forty-two churches and 5,000 members in a population of 3,000,000. Rev. John A. Ohn said that if it were not for state control the state church in Norway would split immediately; Baptists are no longer persecuted there.

Dr. Hunt at one point called on all present who were of Swedish birth or relationship to stand, and a crowd arose, showing Swedish delegates from nearly every state.

Among other valuable material lost was the report of the program on Home and Foreign Missions in which addresses were made by Dr. Antonio Mangano who presented an appeal for the 3,500,000 Italians in America; by S. D. Bowden, industrial and social worker in South India; by Rev. C. E. Sheppard, missionary to the Chinese in America; by Mrs. Moore, of the Pittsburgh Community Center for Negroes, who sang several folk songs of her people; and Rev. William Axling the "statesman missionary of Japan." Later we have secured an extract of the address of Dr. Axling, and it follows:

JAPAN TODAY

Japan today is a unit for peace, and cherishes no hard feelings for America because of the recent California legislation against the Japanese.

The people are hurt by the California legislation, but the Cabinet expresses itself as confident that the American ideals of justice will reassert themselves, and insure fair play for the Japanese in this country. I had interviews with Premier Mr. Hara, Mr. Tokunami, Minister of Home Affairs, Viscount Shibuzawa, Baron Sakatani, ex-Minister of Finance, Mr. Shimada, ex-Speaker of the Lower House, Mr. Ebara, Member of the House of Peers, and Professor Yoshimo, all of whom I have known for years, and they all assured me that Japan as a whole was desirous of friendly relations with America.

"Japan today is for peace," Premier Hara said. "That is the attitude of the Cabinet and the attitude of the people. Even if the military leaders of Japan had aggressive ideas, they could not put them across without the approval of the Cabinet."

In answer to my question what about the accusation that Japan is becoming a second Germany, he replied that the Japanese people, in character, in disposition, and in moral ideals furnished no material out of which to create a second Germany. As far as China is concerned, he said that the Japanese people as a whole, like the Cabinet, realize that the interests of the two nations, Japan and China, are absolutely identical, and that friendly relations must be maintained.

Mr. Tokunami, Minister of Home Affairs, told me that the Japanese are wise enough to see that securing a strip of territory from China would be all loss and no gain. The fact that Japan's population is increasing at the rate of 700,000 a year, he said, makes it essential to seek agricultural and commercial openings in China, and to establish markets there, but Japan has no desire to keep out other nations.

Baron Sakatani, president of the Japan Peace Society, an outstanding leader among the Japanese and a man of international mind, said that in efforts to bring about better relations between America and Japan it was difficult to convince the Japanese militarists and political leaders that America is not trying to put something over on Japan, to anger the Japanese, and force the issue.

"They believe that America is trying to influence the Chinese to anti-Japanese movements," he said. "They think that the influence of America was to some extent behind the independent movement in Korea, and that America has thrown herself across Japan's path of progress in Siberia. They point to the big navy that America is building, and the feverish war preparations in Panama, the gigantic docks we are building in Honolulu, and they ask what it all means if it is not aimed at Japan as a potential enemy."

Militarists Passing in Japan

Baron Sakatani said that of course Japan has fire-eaters, as every nation has, but that the government today is listening not to them, but to the men of peace. The old militarists are passing in Japan, he said. The young men with a new view of the world are coming into power, and the franchise is being extended.

"The world has progressed enough to eliminate that which is harmful in nationalism," he declared. "I never think simply as a Japanese, and that is true of many of my colleagues. Japan and America must work together to establish a world brotherhood."

Viscount Shibuzawa, who for thirteen years has worked to bring about ideal relations between Japan and America, asked me to make it clear here that Japan is not asking for an unlimited immigration. She is not asking for an open door for the laborer. She does ask, however, for fair treatment for the Japanese of every class whom America has allowed to enter, and to settle here. They have come with the understanding that they would receive, under treaty of agreement, the favorite-nation privileges and opportunities, and to deprive them of these privileges is not in accord with the high American ideals of justice. He emphasized the fact that liberals in Japan are growing in number and influence. He pointed out that the present Premier, Mr. Hara, is lined up with this group, and he urged that a commission be appointed from both nations to get together and talk over the questions that threaten to disturb good feeling and amity between these nations.

Professor Yoshimo of the Imperial University, who, more than any other man in Japan has the ear of the students and of the educated young men, acknowledged that at present the militarists are exerting more power than they should, but asked America to remember that there is a strong, growing, liberal movement in Japan.

"Fully 80% of the higher institutions of learning through the empire are on the side of peace and internationalism, he told me. 'At least 90% of the students in the higher institutions of learning, are lined up for peace and democracy. Even among the uneducated, there are evidences of the same tendency. Before the World War, the navy college, where officials are trained for the navy, and the army college, where officers are trained for the army, had 100% more applications than they could matriculate. Today these two institutions, in spite of heart-breaking appeals, cannot secure the number of students that they can enter, by 30%. This indicates that young men all over the empire are on the side of peace.

A copy of the address of Dr. Charles R. Shepherd has also been received and is here reproduced.

THE CHINESE IN AMERICA

We all believe in Foreign Missions. For this reason we have for nearly a century been sending missionaries to China. But while these missionaries have been crossing the Pacific to carry the message of Christ to this great nation of the Orient, her own people have been coming to us in large numbers. They are still coming—coming and going back, a continuous stream crossing the Pacific in both directions, for of the Chinese it is true as of no other people, they come and go.

The bulk of the Chinese in America are of course west of the Rockies. There are more in California than in any other State. Such cities, however, as Chicago, New York, Philadelphia, Boston and St. Louis all have their Chinese colonies.

The Chinese which we find in our midst to-day are very different from their fore-runners, the old-timers of fifty years ago, who were for the most part of the coolie class. In those days, too, it was only the men who came; but now they are in increasing numbers bringing their wives over, establishing homes and raising families. And so to-day we have in our midst thousands and thousands of bright little Chinese boys and girls, splendid young men and women; full of life and promise, splendid material for the making of fine citizens. All they ask is that we give them a chance. They readily respond to good influences when we surround them with such; but, like all other aliens, they are rather easily led to embrace the more garish forms of so called Americanization when we fail to surround them with adequate Christian influences.

Young China Making Good

All who know anything about them will bear me out when I say that the Chinese young men and women in America to-day are making good. Most people East of the Rockies and an astonishingly large number west of them, seem to have the idea that the majority of the Chinese in America are laundry-men and cooks. This is quite wrong. Only a small per cent of them are thus engaged. In very large numbers they are successfully engaged in all branches of commerce and industry. They own and operate many large restaurants where are served the most excellent dishes, both Chinese and American. They are owners of many small manufacturing plants producing such commodities as noodles, candy, trunks, suit-cases, brooms, overalls, underwear, boots, cigars, baskets, fancy goods, canned goods etc. Their wares are of an excellent grade and find a very ready market.

The question is sometimes asked, "Do the Chinese make good citizens?" This question is perhaps best answered by a few statements showing their contributions to American community and national life.

When they are permitted to do so, the better class among them are not slow to own their own homes.

Wherever there is a Chinese group of any size worth considering, they are always found most willing and even anxious to participate in all community affairs if given an invitation and opportunity to do so.

During the war the Chinese in America threw themselves most heartily into all the great national movements. In selling and buying liberty bonds, in the work of the Red Cross, in all the big drives for funds they rendered most commendable service; and furthermore, there were hundreds of them serving in the army.

Now I have spoken of some of the commendable aspects of life among the Chinese in America. I must now ask your attention to a less favorable picture, and describe to you some of the outstanding evils which exist in our Chinese communities and against which your missionaries find it, most of the time, very difficult to make headway. The three outstanding evils of the Chinese communities in America are gambling, slave traffic and Tong wars.

Gambling a Besetting Sin

Gambling is the besetting sin of the Chinese. It seems to be in their blood, and only by a hard fight do they break away from it. But it is exceedingly difficult for them to resist the temptation when there are hundreds and even thousands of gambling houses in the communities in which they live. It is a lasting shame to our city governments that they allow these houses to continue, as they do allow them in every Chinese community of any size on the Pacific Coast, with the exception of San Francisco. The authorities may tell you that they are not open, but all you need to do is to investigate for yourselves. They exist in three classes. First those which are only open to those who are known as regular customers. To enter these one has to be known, by the lookout or watchman, to be 'alright.' Nobody can get by this watchman but bona fide gamblers. The second class are those which have the appearance of being closed, and the police will tell you they are closed, but on every door hangs the sign "Tsik Yat Hoi Pel," which means "Open for Business Today." The third class are those which are wide open. No door-keepers, no wooden partition to obstruct the view of the passer-by, money is piled on the tables which are surrounded by gamblers, and whoever wishes to do so may go right in and participate in the various gambling games.

Occasionally the police raid these places and make some arrests. At such times the proprietor, if caught, puts up $100 and each player puts up $10; and on this bail they are released. They do not turn up again, their bail is forfeited and that is the end of it. In this way our city governments are considerably enriched. The Chinese laugh at our wonderful system of civic administration, and well they might.

Traffic in Young Girls

Closely allied with the gambling interests, in fact in most cases promoted by the same group of men, is the traffic in Chinese girls for immoral purposes. From time to time you may see in the newspapers and magazines passing references to Chinese slave girls; but you probably assure yourselves that it is only fiction, and never give it another thought. That all of you here this hour may know, and never forget, that in this beautiful land of ours Chinese slavery is still a fact, I want to say to you that I know, know from my own personal experience and not from hearsay, that this is a fact. It is going on right now right under the noses of our city officials. Not long ago a man was arrested in San Francisco in whose possession were found numbers of letters from all over the United States requesting him to secure and to ship at the earliest possible date young and pretty Chinese slave girls. There is in San Francisco at this moment awaiting trial a Chinese man who only a few months ago offered for sale in Seattle, Portland and San Francisco a beautiful young Chinese girl sixteen years of age. He sold her in San Francisco for $2,700. She, thank God, was rescued and he captured, but in the majority of the cases they get by with it. If I had the time I could tell you many more such stories, stories that would make your blood boil and your heart ache. I would tell you too of the splendid work that is being done by our Presbyterian friends to combat this evil, but time will not permit. I must hasten on.

We cannot consider this problem of slavery apart from another deep-rooted evil of which it is a vital part, namely the fighting Tongs.

There are ten or twelve distinct fighting Tongs flourishing at present upon our fair American soil. These Tongs are made up of the lawless element, and are organized for the sole purpose of gambling, traffic in slaves and opium and blackmail. They disregard all laws except those of their own making, and there seems to be absolutely no protection against their ruthless assaults. They can declare war at a moment's notice and when they do so the whole community is thrown into confusion, business is at a standstill, many prominent citizens have to go into hiding, the work of its missions is really handicapped, everything is thrown out of gear and fear grips the heart of the crowd. Within the last few days a new Tong has broken out in San Diego and several men have been killed. No Chinese man or woman dares to testify against them, well knowing that to do so would cost them their lives sooner or later.

It is this deadly fear that prevents even the best of our Chinese from coming out openly in opposition to many of the debasing evils of the Chinese communities, or from co-operating in the rescue work and the conviction of the guilty parties.

The Chinese are not alone responsible for these things. Every Highbinder society has its own group of American attorneys, men well schooled in all the tricks of legal gymnastics, pastmasters in the art of outwitting justice and frustrating laws made for the protection of the innocent. These men receive fat salaries for their services.

Bing Kung Tong

I wonder how many Masons there are here? Everyone in general, and Masons in particular please get this. "Bing Kung Tong, Free Masons," which being interpreted means "The Straightforward Righteous Society, Free Masons." This is the inscription over the entry way of headquarters of one of the bloodiest and powerful fighting Tongs in America. Before the American people it masquerades as a Masonic Lodge. Upon special occasions, such as Chinese New Year its headquarters are thrown open to American visitors. The papers next morning tell how the Chinese Masonic Lodge entertained the American friends, how there was dancing and tea drinking in the Chinese Masonic Temple, and so forth. The American people little realize that they have been entertained by those who are engaged in the traffic in innocent young Chinese girls, who persistently and energetically labor to frustrate our laws, who plan bloody murder and pay professional assassins to carry out their plans.

How long will Christian America tolerate this kind of thing? It can cast it out any time it makes up its mind to, just as it has outlawed the liquor traffic. It rests with Christian Americans to earnestly and valiantly consider this condition of affairs, and to take determined action to eliminate from our Chinese communities these great evils which are undermining the work of our mission schools and churches, largely discounting the earnest efforts of many faithful missionaries and weakening year by year the moral fibre of the youth of these communities. I say to you that these Tongs are not only an insult to the churches of America, they are an insult to the great Masonic Order. If the churches of America together with the Masonic Order would but arise and insist upon it these evils could be largely wiped out.

In the meantime your missionaries are faithfully plodding along, seeking to overcome, or at least counteract, some of these evils. In a great program of Education and Evangelism the American Baptist Home Mission Society and the Woman's American Baptist Home Mission Society are seeking to meet the situation. In San Francisco, Sacramento, Fresno and the Netherlands, California, in Portland, Oregon, in Seattle, in Philadelphia, Chicago and New York this program is in operation.

Time will not permit me to review for you this great work. You have all heard more or less about it, and can read of it for yourselves in the various publications. I have chosen rather to use my time in seeking to stir your hearts by the portrayal of these conditions which confront us; and with my closing words will appeal to you to arise, in the name of God to arise, close these gambling houses, stop this nefarious slave traffic and outlaw these murderous Tongs.

Of all the proceedings of the convention one of the most significant and encouraging was the report of the five-year program committee which follows:

REPORT ON FIVE YEAR PROGRAM

The Five Year Program was launched at the Northern Baptist Convention which met at Los Angeles in May 1915. The World War was approaching the end of its first terrible year and there seemed little hope of its early termination. A feeling akin to depression had burdened the hearts of many who came up to the great meeting that year. In the face of such an appalling collapse of civilization the missionary program of the Christian Church seemed hopelessly feeble and inadequate and yet the foundation principles of the faith compelled the conviction that only in a world wide reception and application of the teachings of the Master lay the hope of permanent peace. A few were praying that at this convention plans might be formulated somewhat more adequate to meet the overwhelming need of the world, and in the hearts of many others the same hope lay inarticulate.

The first note was struck by John M. Moore in an informal talk at the Los Angeles Baptist Ministers' conference on the Monday morning before the session of the convention opened. President Clinch's address at the opening of the convention struck the same note when he said, "The convention must not be satisfied with the mere establishment of close relations with its co-operating organizations and the state conventions. It must strive with the aid of these bodies to realize the highest development of their efficiency. The doing something worth while should be the constant aim of the convention." A day or two later three delegates talked until a late hour in a hotel room of the possibility of challenging the denomination with a great advance program. Their conference crystallized after midnight in a determination to take counsel with a larger group and a luncheon conference was arranged for the next day. There was an immediate favorable response, but it was felt that action should not be hasty and accordingly, a second luncheon conference was arranged for the following day. To this others were invited, not less than 50 different people having attended the two meetings. One after another arose in this second meeting and expressed a conviction that this movement was of God. There was no dissent. It was felt that still wider counsel should be obtained and an announcement was made in the convention that a public conference open to all would be held on Sunday afternoon for the consideration of a forward movement. At this meeting the whole question was earnestly discussed for two or three hours and as a result the statement of goals and methods later adopted by the convention to be known as "The Five Year Program" was formulated.

Not More Machinery

It was not a new organization, "another movement," a new complicated piece of machinery. It was simply a constructive, unified statement of our whole evangelistic, educational, social and missionary task. There were three parts to the Five Year Program—its aims, its goals and its methods. Its aim was two-fold—"the development of every church into an evangelistic and social force in its community" in order to produce every local church as part of "a mighty impact of our denominational life upon the nation and upon the world." It will thus be realized that the real aim of the Five Year Program was something which transcended statistical statement. It was a spiritual enterprise. It was directed toward the local church. It aimed to make every church a force in its community and in the world for salvation and for righteousness because within the household of faith itself a new relationship to God had been attained.

To have stopped here would have been to leave the whole matter too vague and indefinite. Five goals were therefore named to be attained within five years. These great objectives were:—

1. A million additions to our churches by baptism.
2. A missionary force of 5,000 men and women in America and the non-Christian world.
3. Two million dollars of endowment for the Ministers' and Missionaries' Benefit Board.
4. Student pastors in twenty-five universities, one thousand Baptist students in theological seminaries, fifteen thousand in colleges and universities, and six million dollars for additional educational endowment and equipment at home and abroad.
5. An annual income of six million dollars for missions and beneficence.

In announcing these high goals it was not imagined that a royal road to success had been discovered. Well tested and thoroughly approved methods were proposed by which these goals might be attained. Evangelism came first, naturally and inevitably. If the first commandment is Evangelize, the second is like unto it—Educate. Social service was proposed as a third essential part of the Five Year Program method. The every member canvass, already well approved, was named as pointing the way to financial success, and most important of all, prayer was proposed not as a formula but as a force.

Vindicated Features

There were three significant features of the Five Year Program which the later years have strikingly vindicated. (1) It was a unity. For the first time in our history we had a unified statement and a unified approach to our whole denominational task. This unity included some things which had hitherto been treated as unrelated or even competitive such as Home and Foreign Missions, evangelism and education, soul saving and social service. (2) It was a challenge. In the light of the New World Movement of today the proposed financial goals were the days of small things, but the comparatively modest financial goals of the Five Year Program as we view them now, did challenge the denomination five years ago to attempt vastly larger things than had ever before seemed possible. (3) It was a prophecy. The Five Year Program grew out of a sense of the strategic importance of the next five years in the life of the nation and of the world. How far reaching and vast the war catastrophe was and would become we did not then know. All that has happened since 1915 in the increase of human need by a terrible geometrical progression and the development of our new denominational organization and program has been a vindication of the prophetic insight of the Los Angeles convention. The Five Year Program of the

Introducing Villa, the Civilizer

An official report from a government agent who visited Francisco Villa's farm in Mexico, said he was living contentedly among 800 of his followers who now form a farming colony of about 500,000 acres of land in northern Durango. In six months, the report said, the colony has 50,000 bushels of wheat ready for the market. Villa has started schools to accommodate 500 children. He is regarded by the colonists as chief and instructor and the agent said he had taught honest work to hundreds of former marauders.

A Church View of the Amnesty Question

A few months after the signing of the Armistice the Commission on the Church and Social Service issued its pronouncement on "The Church and Social Reconstruction" which contains under the head of "Freedom of Discussion" this statement on amnesty for political prisoners:

"To those imprisoned for conscientious reasons, whose offenses were prompted by motives that were beyond a reasonable doubt honest and disinterested, general amnesty should be granted as soon as peace is established. The continued imprisonment of such persons can result only in a sense of injury that makes for discontent, and in depriving the communities to which they belong of that service which, the war being over, they may safely be counted upon to render."

U. S. Breaking Big Navy Records

In 1916 our government outlined and entered upon a program of battleship building that would make our navy the greatest in the world. We are just getting fairly started in carrying out that program. Eleven huge battleships are ranging from near completion down to a mere start. Six huge battle cruisers, costing even more than the big battleships, are also under construction, though not so far along as the battleships. If this program is carried out it will be the most costly ever put into execution in this or any other country. Also if we are still to hold to the old idea of the biggest navy we must in addition to hundreds of millions of dollars spent on battleships and cruisers, spend many millions more for seaplanes and ships to carry them. It will be necessary that these great carrying ships be as fleet as the other ships so that the seaplanes can be ready to launch at a moment's notice.

Baptist Revival in England

Dr. Clifford's plea for a new evangelistic effort has soon borne fruit. As the result of his suggestion, East Anglia is now the scene of a religious revival, such as England has not witnessed for years. The Rev. A. Douglas Brown, Baptist minister at Balham, a South London suburb, and son of the well known preacher, the Rev. Archibald Brown, for many years pastor of the East London Tabernacle, tells us that when he read Dr. Clifford's words, he got down on his knees and re-dedicated his whole life to God. He realized that if we are to get back to primitive methods of evangelism, we must get back to the primal forces of the Christian religion. With the view of carrying out Dr. Clifford's idea, Mr. Brown went to conduct four days' services in Lowestoft, an east-coast seaside resort. The results were so encouraging that he went to other towns—Ipswich, Yarmouth, Colchester, etc.—spending most of the week in evangelism and preaching in his own Church on Sundays. Within a few weeks over a thousand conversions were reported, while requests for prayer totalled nearly 300 on one day. At one church in Ipswich 55 young people confessed Christ.

Getting Ready for Brotherhood Congress

Mr. William Ward, President of the World Brotherhood Federation, left England a few days ago on an important mission to the North American Continent. Before sailing he stated that after the World Brotherhood Conference at Washington last year a big wave of enthusiasm for the movement spread over the United States, and there was a notable accession to the membership of the Federation. The National Council for the States, which was decided on last October, has now been set up, and Mr. Ward is to meet that body, in conjunction with the North American members of the World Brotherhood Executive Committee, to complete the arrangements for the visit of their delegation to the Congress to be held in Prague next August. Mr. Ward will also confer with Brotherhood friends as to a comprehensive forward movement throughout the United States in the autumn.

China is Catching the Spirit

A remarkable illustration of the rapidly growing interest of America in world affairs is seen in the report made public last week by Thomas W. Lamont, chairman of the American committee of the China famine fund, who announces that American givers contributed $7,250,000 for the relief of starving and homeless Chinese the past few months. America's previous record for giving to China was in the famine of 1907 when $750,000 was sent from this country. Of this year's total, the China famine fund committee itself raised $4,542,996; the Red Cross contributed $1,106,000; and the Chinese in America sent $250,000. But long before the committee got into action, the mission boards of the various churches were receiving funds, and $1,355,996 was sent direct to China through denominational agencies. One of the most remarkable factors in the recent famine has been the unprecedented liberality of the Chinese themselves, who through provincial governments and various quickly organized local relief societies have contributed $6,000,000 to their suffering fellow citizens. Hitherto Chinese have been very indifferent to calamities befalling their own countrymen, and this giving betokens the growth of a new spirit of humanity in that country.

Look for Better Music Hereafter

Church organists from all over the country will attend the fourteenth convention of the National Association of Organists at Philadelphia from July 26 to 29. The sessions will be at Wanamaker's. Among the subjects of discussion are greater co-operation between the minister and the organist, the need for all-round training, and the advantage of forming local groups of organists. Excursions and recitals will be a part of the program, including a wireless recital transmitted from the great organ at the Pittsburgh Carnegie Institute. The entire convention is open to all organists and lovers of music. Details may be obtained from the President, Henry S. Fry, St. Clement's church, Philadelphia.

Bohemia Turning Protestant Again

The defection from the Roman Catholic Church in Bohemia is growing into a "landslide." At first the request was only that the priests be permitted to marry. This was refused and the pope refused to treat with the leaders in any way. As a result, in many churches the mass is being omitted and many of the churches have been given over to the leaders of the new order. The movement is becoming a Protestant movement. A recent dispatch from Paris asserts that in all Bohemia there are not 10,000 loyal supporters of the papacy left. John Huss, who was burned by order of the Roman Church, is the greatest name in Bohemian history, and the call to turn away from the church that executed him has had a wonderful response.

Pay and Look Cheerful

In the Pathfinder of June 18 there are some striking figures as to the cost of the government. The article states that it cost $8,500,000,000 to run the combined Federal, State and local governments of the United States in the 1920 fiscal year. That is to say the expenditure for conducting the governments is $72 per capita. The expense of the Federal government for 1920 was $5,000,000,000 and that of the States and municipalities $3,500,000,000.

Of course, the largest item in Federal expense is caused by the war debt. Of this amount the government operation of railroads cost $1,038,000,000, while the policy of building a larger navy and maintaining a bigger army took $1,350,000,000. Pensions reached $330,000,000.

Looked Like Stunted Monkeys

After other nights in Vienna I knew it was indeed a city of tragedy, more tragic than any other city I had seen in the world after the years of war, filled with masses of people semi-starved, or three-quarters starved with rickety children so wizened and weak that they looked like little monkeys after six months or more of life, with diseased mothers unable to feed them at the breast, with men of good education and good birth starving slowly but very surely on a diet of cabbage soup, with beautiful girls selling their beauty for one night's meal, and middle class women watching their children wither and die, and a hopeless misery among these millions in the back streets of that great and splendid city, with its palaces, its picture galleries, its glorious gardens, its noble architecture, banks, offices and mansions.—Sir. Philip Gibbs.

Going Japan's Gait

Suicides are increasing in this country with fearful rapidity. Japan used to stand first in the number of divorces and suicides in proportion to population. In the case of divorces the United States has taken first place away from Japan, and now it looks like it is going to take first place from suicides. During 1920 there were 6,171 suicides in this country, including 2,604 women and 707 children. This was 1,000 more than for the preceding year. They included all classes of people and all ages from 5 to 103 years.

Chicago Church Federation Organizes for Work

Protestant forces in Chicago are co-ordinating their work in a closer way continually through the efforts of the Chicago Church Federation Council. Fourteen denominations with six hundred constituent churches find fellowship through this organization. The activities of the council are represented by twelve departments: Advisory, Church and Industry, Comity, Evangelism, Political Action, Public Institutions, Publicity, Religious Education and Community Federations, Social and Civic Relations, State Constitution, and World Friendship. Twenty-two public institutions have Protestant ministers through the work of the federation.

To Offset the Ku Klux Klan

The Y. M. C. A. has initiated, in the south, a movement for race understanding and conciliation. While the Ku Klux Klan organizes whites, and the Negroes promote the National Association for the Advancement of the Colored People, there are 700 committees organized in southern counties and cities to cultivate racial understanding and to bring about justice for colored people. These committees are made up of a small group of white Christian leaders and a like number of Negro leaders. In most cases they meet together and talk frankly, the white asking the colored members frankly to state their feelings, and they pledge themselves to take up cases of real dissatisfaction and injustice and see that right is done. The blacks are counselled against the rabid publications which are now being published in northern cities, and the whites against the conditions that incite a Negro sense of injustice. They have no dogmas and advocate no doctrinaire schemes. They seek only to work for a way out through frank understanding and the application of a genuinely Christian disposition to do the just and righteous thing.

Dr. Burton Will Go to China

Ernest DeWitt Burton, director of the University Libraries, and head of the department of New Testament and Early Christian Literature at the University of Chicago, has been granted a leave of absence for six months to act as chairman of a commission on Christian education in China. The commission, which is sent by the foreign missions conference of North America, is to make a thorough study of Christian education as it has been developed in China, and also make suggestions as to future educational policies. Professor Burton is already familiar with educational conditions in China, having been a member of the Oriental Educational Investigation Commission sent out several years ago by the University of Chicago. The commission will include five persons from the United States and one from England, and on the arrival of these six in China, six more will be added from that country.

Make Them Pay and They Will Quit

Ex-governor Hugh M. Dorsey of Georgia upon retiring from his office declared publicly that his state had been guilty of fifty-eight brutal lynchings during his term of office and not a man guilty of these murders was apprehended. He warns the citizens of the state against a continuance of this program. There is only one solution of the lynching habit: Provide that the county or state in which lynching occurs fully compensate the relatives of the murdered man for the loss. Touch the pocketbooks of those men and they will immediately evidence respect for the lives of Negroes.

Forcing Opium Upon China

Reports come of the recent seizure by the customs officers of a shipment of 47,000 ounces of opium, coming down from Kweichow by way of Changteh, under Japanese protection. The customs officers found this consignment on a launch that was attempting to smuggle past the customs. The value of this cargo at Yochow is estimated at $100,000 Mexican. At Shanghai it would be double that value. The customs frequently find opium and seize it and burn it; but there must be a good deal that gets through, despite the vigilance of the customs officers, who get a large percentage of the value as a reward on all the opium they find. Many and clever are the devices employed to hide the drug; false bottoms to boxes, hollow handles to umbrellas, dinner-pails apparently full of cooked rice, but containing opium underneath. It is unfortunate that the Japanese have such a large hand in this illicit traffic.

Sawdust Pudding, Please!

Hydrolized sawdust as a part of a ration for cows is apparently giving satisfactory results in Wisconsin. The Forest Service of the United States Department of Agriculture reports that cows at the agricultural college of that state are doing well on a ration consisting of one third sawdust. Who would have dreamed it! Pasturing cows on a sawdust hill. Now for some scientist to apply himself to an equally cheap and satisfying diet for man.

Call Out the Ku Klux

An article in the current number of the Commercial and Financial Chronicle says there are now in the U. S. 12,000,000 Negroes. They constitute one-seventh of the working force of the country. Of the 3,000,000 men 800,000 are farmers and 1,000,000 farm laborers. Eighty per cent of the women are in necessary home and industrial life.

In 1886 Negroes in this country owned 12,000 houses, operated 20,000 farms, conducted 2,100 businesses, and had $20,000,000 of accumulated wealth. In 1916 the number of houses had increased to 600,000, the operated farms 981,000, the businesses to 45,000 and the wealth to $1,110,000,000.

Seventy banks are directed by Negro financiers, over 400 periodicals are owned by Negroes. They even conduct the Associated Negro Press.

Four hundred thousand Negroes were called to the colors during the recent war and 200,000 of them saw service overseas.

There is less illiteracy proportionately, the Chronicle says, among the Negroes in 1921 than there was among the white population of the United States at the time of the Civil war. In Alabama the colored population contributed $430,000 toward the $1,133,000 cost of establishing 720 Rosenwald schools.

Off for the Chautauqua

In 1920, 8,581 communities of this country had a Chautauqua with an attendance of 10,456,500 different persons witnessing 85,885 Chautauqua performances. What is surprising is the tremendous aggregate of persons these figures represent. They represent nearly a fifth of the nation's population, and we might say, the thinking fifth. The total attendance, which means the admission of the same persons several times during a season, is a little short of 75,000,000. "Such figures find companionship only in those attendant upon the growth of free schools and the modern expansion of journalism."

Still Saving Boys and Girls

At the annual business meeting of Dr. Barnardo's Homes, it was stated that up to the end of last year 91,001 children had entered the Homes, the "turnover" for the year being 14,497 boys and girls, of whom 1,902 were permanent new admissions; 2,067 trained young people were placed out in situations, leaving 7,025 in residence. These included 380 boys in training at the Naval and Nautical Schools; 1,091 infants under five; and 480 crippled, invalid, blind, deaf and dumb, physically afflicted or sick children; 845 boys and girls are under industrial and technical training in the Homes. In addition to these heavy responsibilities the directors have now undertaken to raise £50,000 to buy and equip a new technical school in the country to supersede the work carried on in the unfavourable surroundings of Stepney.

International Uniform Lesson for August 7

PAUL IN CYPRUS AND IN ANTIOCH OF PISIDIA

Acts 13:1-52. Golden Text: Acts 1:8

By JOHN A. EARL

The Lesson Text

From Antioch Barnabas and Saul are sent forth as the first foreign missionaries of the church. They go first to the Island of Cyprus about 125 miles by sea from Antioch. Cyprus was the home of Barnabas and therefore presented an open door for the gospel through the friendships which Barnabas had established. They took the nephew of Barnabas, John Mark, with them. But he left them at Perga. Aside from the incident concerning Sergius Paulus and the judgment upon Elymas no facts are recorded about the work of the missionaries in Cyprus. The remainder of the lesson text is a sample of Paul's presentation of the gospel to the Jews at Antioch of Pisidia and their reaction with reference to it.

The Lesson Taught

The lesson is one of transfer. From Saul to Paul, from Promise to Fulfilment, from Jew to Gentile mark some of the transfers recorded in the text.

From Saul to Paul

Luke in his record changes the name of Saul to Paul without notice or explanation. He leaves the reader to work out the reasons for the change. Saul was a Jewish name running back as far as the first king of the Jews. Paul was a Gentile name. It is significant that the Gentile name of Paul absorbs the Jewish name of Saul at the very hour when the missionaries secure their first Gentile convert on the island of Cyprus, Sergius Paulus. What more fitting than that Saul should memorialize his first victory over heathenism by adopting the name of his first convert? But there is a deeper reason for the change than this. Saul was on the eve of breaking with Judaism entirely. He had already begun to see that if he was to win his fight for spiritual Christianity as against Judaizing Christians who were determined to keep the church formal and legalistic, he must take his stand against the bondage of law. His letter to the Galatians, to whom he went immediately after leaving Cyprus, is luminous on this point. In his letter to the Philippians he tells us what he gave up for this principle. (See Phil. 3:4-8.) Among the things given up was his name. He went as a Gentile to Gentiles. He tells the Galatians that he had become one of them, and asks them why they want to go back to the Judaism which he had abandoned. (Gal. 4:12.) Here is the profoundest principle of all worthy and successful Christian service. It is called in theology "the doctrine of the incarnation." The Son of God changed His name to Jesus, and took upon Himself human nature in order that He might be one with the race He came to redeem. There is no other way. Saul with its legacy of royal blood must become Paul the little if real missionary work is to be done. Ability to serve must be matched by adaptability to the people we would serve. Paul became all things to all men that he might win some.

From Promise to Fulfilment

The first message of Paul as recorded in this lesson preached in the synagogue of Antioch of Pisidia needs to be read with great care because it reflects clearly the route by which Paul arrived at the conviction that Jesus is the Christ. Paul starts out with the philosophy that the Jews were especially chosen to be the medium through which salvation was to come to the world. He therefore goes back to the beginning of Jewish history and rapidly sketches the progress of the nation until he comes to Jesus of the seed of David who according to promise is born a Savior. The one great purpose to which all Jewish history ran was fulfilled in the life, the death and the resurrection of Jesus. Therefore the Old Testament scriptures which the Jews regarded as an end in themselves, final and forever binding were shown by Paul to be but the promise of better things. The old law was a burden which might restrain and restrict but could never redeem. The good news which Paul preached was full remission of sins through the death and resurrection of Jesus. This was a gospel of grace, not of law and if of grace, it must be for all men irrespective of nationality or privilege.

From Jew to Gentile

"To the Jew first and also to the Greek:" that was the order because the Jews had the preparation through their knowledge of the true God, their scriptures, their institutions, and because the first preachers were themselves converted Jews. In fact the synagogue with its democratic and informal worship was in a very real sense the cradle in which the infant Christian church was nurtured. But it was necessary that the church should grow out of its cradle, and in the providence of God such scenes as were witnessed in Antioch of Pisidia helped in this direction. The organized transfer from Jew to Gentile was made by Paul and his company here. And when the Gentiles heard that Paul would directly minister to them they were glad, and Luke adds "as many as were ordained to eternal life believed." Some Christians with as narrow a vision as that of the Jews who rejected Christ have overworked this passage by making it do service to the doctrine of fore-ordination. The intelligent reader, however, sees not textual proof of a doctrine, but rather the statement of a contrast between the Jews who were unfit for salvation because of their rejection of Christ and the Gentiles who were qualified for eternal life because they believed. "The fore-ordained are whosoever will and the non-fore-ordained are whosoever wot." The decisions of men have more to do with personal salvation than the decrees of God. God wishes all men to be saved and to come to the knowledge of the truth. The Jew who restricted God to the narrow boundaries of his own nation was rejected. Let not the Gentile church be guilty of similar folly.

The Story of a Single Enthusiasm

BY SELDEN L. ROBERTS

Once upon a time there was a farmer who owned a beautiful little farm on which there was a fair sized mortgage, and a beautiful young apple tree. The farm was well fitted for growing all kinds of crops, and the young apple tree was the special pride and joy of the farmer's heart. He pruned it and sprayed it and watched it grow. He rejoiced in its blossoms and velvety leaves, and reveled in the luscious apples which it produced in greater abundance from year to year. He thought and talked of but little else.

His neighbors noticed that his general crops were not well tended, that his fences were tottering, his buildings out of repair, and his stock becoming seedy. But he listened to no suggestions and took no advice, so absorbed was he in his enthusiasm for the apple tree, and so splendid were his apples.

One day the mortgage fell due. There was not enough money to pay it, and the farm was sold. So the man lost his apple tree.

Likewise is it to those who in their enthusiasm for one line of church work, neglect the general up-keep and efficiency of the whole church. Co-ordination and balance is not only needful for the efficiency of the church as such, but for the highest welfare of any one particular phase of church work.

Paul has somewhat to say about that in 1 Cor. 12:21, "The eye cannot say to the hand I have no need of thee; or again the head to the feet, I have no need of you. Nay, much rather those members of the body which seem to be more feeble are necessary."

The religious education program of the church should be a co-ordinated whole adequate for the church, and adapted to the needs of individuals.

The Experimental Hold-Up

BENITO knotted a gorgeous red kerchief across his face, concealing all but his great black eyes. Then he examined his pistol carefully, and took the extra precaution of examining Alfonso's pistol also, since he was a happy-go-lucky individual and might easily forget to arrange about bullets on such a special occasion as this. Alfonso meanwhile was knotting a green and yellow kerchief around his head, leaving only his eyes in view, and he was laughing gaily. "What a big little surprise it will be for the poor unsuspecting senior, won't it? Bah, I can already see him shudder and turn pale when we spring out on him!"

"You born rogue!" said Benito more seriously, "is this a laughing enterprise that we should joke about it beforehand? Tell me, have you the gag ready, and the rope for binding him?"

"Naturally, friend of mine! Do you suppose I want him to escape—well, not by a thousand saints. Come on, are you ready?"

They broke through the thickets as silently as possible until they reached the side of the road. Benito squinted up at the sun. "We are early, but that is a good fault. He will be along in a little time, but we must keep ourselves hidden." So they crouched among the underbrush, where Alfonso was in a continual state of high glee.

"This is rare sport," he chuckled, rubbing his hands; "I can't get over how eternally startled he is going to be!"

"Silence!" hissed Benito sternly, "you make me regret I brought you. This is not a light errand—we must not fail, and yet you babble foolish words about it. Hark—there are footsteps coming. . . ."

Both bandits held their breath and listened. Benito's keen ears had heard correctly, for the steady advance of footfalls heralded the approach of someone. Probably their quarry. Benito craned his neck, then hissed excitedly: "Yes, it is he—early! Come, are you ready? When he gets to the palm-tree rush to his right side—I to the left. Ready, go!"

With incredible swiftness they leaped from the bushes, crying: "Hands up, Americano! Hands up!"

Benito faced him with his dangerous-looking pistol, while Alfonso guarded his side with a pistol in one hand and a coil of rope in the other hand. To say that the stranger was not startled would be utterly false; he said afterwards that every event of his past life paraded through his mind in the twinkling of an eye, and that all his well-laid plans for the future flashed before him in tragic protest at this interruption.

But outwardly he was so quiet that both bandits were amazed. He made no resistance, but as he obediently held up his hands there was such alertness in his gaze that Benito ordered tensely: "Tie his hands behind him, Alfonso."

Then for the first time the Americano spoke. "Look here, my friends, you needn't trouble about trussing me up—just take my watch and my money and be done with it. I won't hinder you, for the truth of the matter is that I have an engagement in the next village in fifteen minutes, and it's more important that I should get there on time than that I should stay here to fight about my valuables. Come on, don't hesitate—you are two to one, and my watch is in my right-hand vest pocket; as for silver pesos, you'll find a few in my trousers' pockets, I guess."

Alfonso chuckled as he tied the Americano's hands behind his back; he was so amused that he poked his head around so that he could give a broad wink at Benito.

But Benito remained grave. "Senior," he said solemnly, "you will do well to yield yourself calmly to us. Alfonso, fasten his hands tightly and tie on the gag quickly. But no cruelty, mind you! And now, senior, I must warn you to submit calmly, all this struggling and kicking will get you nowhere. Oh, come, senior, do not try to escape. Alfonso, if he keeps this up we shall have to bind his legs and carry him."

"What?" exclaimed Alfonso, "carry him up that mountain pass? Not much! Am I a carabao, that I should be treated like a beast of burden? Never did I bargain to do any carrying. Here now, senior, quit that wrestling!"

Benito was plainly troubled. "Senior," he exclaimed anxiously, "we have another use for you besides your watch and your money, so if you come with us quietly all will be well with you. By the grave of my father I promise it!"

Thus, bound and gagged, menaced by two pistols, closely watched by the picturesque banditti, the Americano was forced to set out on this unknown journey they had in mind. He picked his way along the muddy dikes between rice fields, then up through underbrush, scrambling over rocks . . . slipping . . . panting . . . breathless . . . worried . . .

What, oh, what was in store for him?

After several tedious hours the bandits took off their gaudy kerchiefs and he saw their faces bronzed by a hundred sunny days in the open air and coarsened by a hundred cruelties. Only one thing about their actions astonished him; they were never cruel to him, nor did they show any vicious delight in having captured him. Presently Benito said courteously: "Senior, Alfonso will now remove the gag so that you can breathe more easily, for we have a still steeper climb to make. I hope, however, you will not shout for help!"

When the gag was removed Benito took off his straw hat and scooped up a hatful of water from a little brook that was babbling its merry way down the mountainside.

"Drink, senior," he said politely. And the Americano quaffed gratefully at the water in the old hat. Then the steady climb continued in silence until the sun was setting when they reached several rude shacks—the bandits' inconspicuous camp. Several other wild-looking men were in sight, cooking supper over a wood fire outdoors.

"Ah, you caught him?" they cried joyfully, running over to examine the captive. Yet there was a respect and eagerness in their gaze that surprised the Americano, who supposed the hour for treachery had arrived.

There was vast excitement about his coming, and as soon as supper was over the robbers sat around expectantly waiting for their spokesman to speak.

"Senior," Benito began, spreading out his hands to plead forgiveness, "I apologize deeply for the indignity we have placed upon you this day. But we are men eaten up by curiosity, and since it is not safe for us to mix openly with men in your town, or even with peasants in a barrio, we figured out that our only plan was to hold you up and kidnap you. We apologize."

The Americano looked from one to the other, and instantly his last doubt vanished; for here were five men as eager as little children for something. But for what—that was the question?

Benito continued: "We are desperados, senior; bandits, every one of us. We raid the barrios down in the valley, and hold up travelers and merchants on the roadways. It is our life, but not long ago we had a surprise, senior, a great surprise. We discovered an old man who had some sort of a treasure; stealthily he would creep behind his valley, across the rice dikes over to a certain hiding-place. There we could see him stoop over and for hours at a time gloat over his treasure. But so secret was he about it that we never could see what it was, since we were too far off. But once there came a day when we had stolen great baskets of vegetables and chickens and were on our way to camp. I spied the old fellow, and crept up to see under which rock he hid his treasure, planning to come back and steal it. But, near to, he seemed such a harmless old peasant that I decided to rob him then and there. Silently I tiptoed up behind him, for he was on his knees with his forehead laid against this precious unknown something. I swooped down, hit him on the back of his neck to stun him, then grabbed the thing in his hand and rushed off. But to my disgust it proved to be only a book—so I supposed I had missed the treasure. This maddened me; so I went back the next day to get the real thing, when from a thicket I saw the old fellow searching frantically among the tall grasses and the crevices of the rocks. 'Bah, he has lost his treasure,' I sneered to myself. But even as I looked a Catholic priest and two Spanish officers hurried over and arrested him. I could overhear the charge which the priest made against him. 'This fellow continually reads the Forbidden Book: I have had spies on his tracks for months, and every day he slips off here to read it in secret. Well he knows this means imprisonment. Now we will find the books, and make his conviction doubly sure.'

Benito stopped to smile, and the bandits also smiled. 'Well, senor, they searched that spot for an hour, but they found nothing, because I had the book safe up the mountain! And I could hear the old fellow crying in a sort of ecstasy: 'You may find it, and you may destroy it, yet it is written on my heart—every word of it, so that not all the prisons in the Philippines can erase the preciousness!' So, Americano, we robbers began wondering what sort of a treasure this book could be—a book which the Catholic priest forbids Filipinos to read, which the Spanish authorities arrest a man for owning, a book so precious that a man will waste his life for the mere seeing of it every day. Senor, that was months ago, and only lately you have appeared, carrying a similar book in your hand as you walk from village to village, and a strange uneasiness has gotten hold upon us. We are superstitious about this treasure which is no treasure at all, apparently, yet for which a man will suffer imprisonment. Not one of us can read, so our only plan was to kidnap you. We beg you to open our eyes!'

They unbound the hands of the smiling Americano, and handed him their unvalued treasure—a well-known Bible. Turning it over and over the Americano said: 'The news may not have reached your camp that Spanish rule in the Philippines is now over. Four months ago soldiers and sailors from my country came to the rescue of the Filipinos, long oppressed unjustly. So now this Bible will no longer be a forbidden Book in your land. Indeed, American Christians have sent me here especially to open its pages to all who care to hear. So this particular opportunity is welcome above all others! Let us have a torch brought, so that I can read you its wonderful contents.'

By the dim light of the torch he sat until midnight reading of the God of Heaven—it was a picture he never forgot: the torch illuminating five wild, eager faces; the night wind sighing through the treetops; the lonely call of prowling animals far off; the winsome magic of a new power creeping into empty hearts.

"For the Word of God is quick and powerful, sharper than any two-edged sword."

And this certain small person said to himself, frowning, one day: 'He brings such dreadful meals, I'm sure nothing but gulps of water would ever make such stuff as that go down my throat!' Then of course it was only natural for this certain small person to begin wondering about Banana Beppo's throat: maybe water would make his dinner go down easier, too. But where was he ever going to get water from, sitting on a lonely church door-step?

'Well, of course . . . maybe . . . why yes, why not take it myself?' whispered this small person to himself.

'Dear me! Would I dare,' he asked, exactly as if there were two of him, and one was talking to the other. 'Of course I dare,' said the braver self, and ran out to the kitchen to fill a glass of water.

Then holding it very carefully in both hands, this small person tip-toed very gingerly down the back steps, crossed the narrow grass plot and reached Banana Beppo. But Banana Beppo had closed his eyes again to take another of those little trips of his. Yes, my dears, he was in Italy again, standing beside a certain beautiful fountain where pretty water rippled and rippled all day over the back of a big bronze frog, until it seemed that the frog's bronze eyes blinked with sheer content at feeling that delightful drip! drip! drip! And Banana Beppo pretended that he was a little boy again, that real little boy who long ago used to put his small red lips down into that fountain to drink deep of the bubbling water. But just as he was pretending to drink, a certain little flute seemed to pipe a cheerful tune right into his ear: 'Here's water, mister; water for your luncheon.'

Banana Beppo opened his astonished eyes, and there was—well, who was it, anyhow, with so much golden hair and such very small trousers?

'I'm the minister's son,' this little person explained, it's my father who preaches in this church every Sunday, and we live right next door. I often see you, and I thought maybe you'd like to wash the dry bread down with water! See?'

Why, of course Banana Beppo saw! He beamed and sparkled like jewels or rainbows or dazzling sunshine.

'Thank-a! Thank-a!' he cried, gulping the water and smacking his lips to show how good it was.

Now you must admit that a glass of water was a very small thing to give. Yet just see how it made the church walk right into Banana Beppo's life. For the next Sunday, when he could not push his go-cart anyhow, he brushed his old coat and washed his muddy shoes, and went to sit in a pew in the Biggest Church in Town. And the minister's little bit of a son pointed him out to his mother.

'Oh look, mumsy dear, there's my own special Italian man,' he whispered, 'the one I gave a drink to.'

So the minute church was over Mrs. Minister went to shake hands with him.

Banana Beppo's Go-Cart

BANANA BEPPO had a go-cart. But nobody ever saw him go in it, himself; no indeed, he loaded it down with piles of yellow bananas, and pushed it through the streets all day long shouting: 'Banan! nice fresh-a banan!' Anybod-a want-a de nice fresh banan?'

I dare say you may have seen him yourself going past your very own front door; you would surely recognize him because of his dark smiling face, his jet black hair and snapping brown eyes. He wears a red handkerchief knotted loosely around his neck, and in one ear he wears the tiny loop of a little gold earring; nobody knows quite why—all he can tell you is that when he was a very little boy in Italy his mother put it in his ear. It had something to do with her fear of 'evil eye,' he says, and it has stayed there ever since!

Now in September as you very well know, the sun is hot, and a go-cart full of bananas gets heavier and heavier when you have been pushing it all summer through sunny streets, with automobiles unpleasantly dashing by, much too close to the wheels of a slow-poke go-cart. How Banana Beppo hated them—he used to shake his brown fist and reel off the most remarkable string of Italian words that sounded exactly like 'Zzzzzz-rrrrr!' I don't know myself what they meant, but of course he had reason for disliking these whizzing monsters which nearly shaved red wheels off nice green carts.

So when he grew unusually tired there was one cool spot where he often pushed his cart up over the curb into the shade of the Biggest Church in Town. He himself would sit down wearily on the top-step of the side entrance, lean his head against the closed door, shut his eyes and pretend that he was in Italy. Just a quick little trip, you understand; but it showed how homesick he was. And after the trip was over he would reach in his pocket to pull out a red handkerchief, which he would lay carefully across his knees as he opened it. For his dinner was inside—a sausage, a pickle and a hunk of bread. It always looked very dry and tasteless to a certain small person who was often standing in a certain window just opposite, waiting for him to come, watching to see him eat.

Topic for August 7

THY WILL BE DONE.—II. WITH MY PLEASURE

Matt. 6:7-15. (Consecration Meeting)

"Thy will be done on earth as in Heaven."

Perhaps the most severe test of the young Christian has to do with his pleasure. Many times we are willing to comply with the will of God, except in the matter of our play life. We have a feeling somehow that this belongs to us exclusively. Lots of people really do not want to be interfered with. They are free to do as they please. How often the Master is left out of account!

1. Vacation religion. Such a topic coming in summer time would indicate that its treatment should have something to do with vacation activities. Summer time is very hard on city and country churches alike. In the city, people think that religious affairs might well slack up about the end of June. Many of them do not go away on vacation, but they do not go to church. In the country, the good roads are alive with "flivvers," people going from one community to another, but they do not go to church.

2. The rest time. A vacation, yes. Every person should have the privilege of a little time off during the year for complete rest. But it hardly seems reasonable for church folks to start on a "religious" vacation about July 1 and stay "on" until the first of September or October. During these days the question is often asked, "What shall we do next?" Just here is where the devil gets in his best licks. With a weakened religious vitality, the pleasure-seeking vacationist falls to all kinds of suggestions. When he comes home he is spiritually bankrupt, and he wonders why. It is easily explained. God has been left out of the bargain.

3. No conflict. There is no conflict between the religion of a red-blooded man and helpful, wholesome, rollicking fun. Piety does not have to take its flight when people have a good time of the right sort. The church is very slowly recognizing its obligation in the matter of the play life of its young people. It is the duty of the church to save its young people, body, mind and soul. To leave out either one, spells failure—a dwarfed personality. Such a program will call for more than Sunday services and a poorly attended weekly prayer meeting.

4. The lordship of Jesus. Our young people must learn to bring the problem of their pleasures to him. We must ask "What would Jesus do?" If, after asking such a question, there is doubt about a thing, let it go. A clear conscience and a clean life is priceless—worth more than all the passing pleasures of a big world. The world today is looking for a leadership that knows the Lord. To have the courage to say "No" while the crowd leaves you behind with a laugh, or with the statement that "yonder fellow is tied to his mother's apron strings," is the need of the hour. If we would be able to pray the prayer taught us by the Master, we must let the Master have his way with our pleasures.

What the Delegates Have to Say About the Big B. Y. P. U. Convention

God grant that the inspiration I have received at this convention will be used to the greatest advantage toward saving souls for Christ.—Mary Sellers.

This convention's worth cannot be measured with dollars and cents, but its true value lies in the reconsecrated life and service to Jesus Christ, our Lord.—Howard Rice.

This convention has given me more strength and courage and faith to "hear what the Lord my God will speak," whatever it may be. Those wonderful pictures have meant very, very much to me as well as the lectures and happy faces of so many optimists.—Geneva Denton.

Conferences and conventions are always a "foretaste of heaven" to me, and this convention has been the greatest of all and has brought me closer to my Lord.—Miss Mary Salzman.

This convention has given me four things: a greater faith in God, a greater faith in the Bible, a greater faith in prayer, and a greater faith in Baptist young people.—Elsie L. Oberg.

The inspiration I have derived from this convention will prove the turning point of my life and I will henceforth be for Jesus.—Viola Wallair.

Have found more inspirations in this convention than anything I have ever attended. Henceforth my life will be "all for Christ."—Florence Bohnenkamper.

No words can be found to express the great benefits which I have received; I can only thank God for calling me for world service while I was at Cincinnati.—Gladys Waterman.

This is the first convention I have ever had the pleasure of attending, but hope that it will not be the last and that I may be able to take home a message that will fill our young people with inspiration to boost the international B. Y. P. U. of America.—Elsie Everick.

It is my prayer that our great denomination may have the unity of spirit and consecrated purpose exemplified in our B. Y. P. U. Convention.—Glenn K. Marquay.

These convention hours have been very happy ones indeed and I have decided on a life service for Christ wherever the opportunity opens.—Leona Halderman.

The good feeling, one toward the other, the kindness extended each one of the delegates, the unselfishness which existed between the delegates from the several States and the Dominion of Canada, such as is not made manifest in any other kind of gathering or convention, proved to me that such condition only existed when Christian people were gathered together in God's name.—Vera N. Tauber.

This convention has given me a new strength and strengthened my faith.—Eileen Wager.

The convention has made me determined to boost the Student Volunteers at my college.—Grace E. Benjamin.

Ye are not your own, but are bought with a price, and therefore must of necessity obey his commands, and go where he leads. By his help I mean 'to do this.'—V. G. Hicks.

This convention for me has accomplished what years of prayer have not, perfect submission to Christ.—Lydia B. Hoppe.

This convention has been very interesting and inspiring to me and I will go back to Columbus, Ohio, determined to do better and more work for Jesus Christ.—Esther Fluhart.

This convention has made me more anxious than ever to go back to India where I have lived and I am glad that it has brought the needs of that wonderful needy land to the young people of this country.—Kathryn Silliman.

I think the keyword of the convention was a very timely one, for in this day and age evangelism is what we need. We need it not simply to get people back to the church but also to get them back to God and into closer relationship with Jesus Christ. As a result of this convention I have been able to get some ideas about Jesus which will help me to get closer to him from now on.—Warren E. Jackson.

I am deeply grateful to God for the vision I have had and inspiration I have received from this splendid B. Y. P. U. convention of 1921.—Edith E. Evans.

Thankful for this B. Y. P. U. convention and the inspiration. Makes me think of what Jesus said, "If ye love me, keep my commandments."—Isabelle Deucher.

Have seen the answer to my prayer uttered before the birth of my son (24 years) when today he consecrated himself to service of the Lord. Thanks be to God.—Mrs. Edward Noll.

This 1921 B. Y. P. U. convention has made me want to do more for my Master, and I am sure Cincinnati will be a better city for these splendid Baptist young people having been here.—Bess Marsh.

This convention has meant for me a fuller realization of the truth of Christ's teachings.—Velma Thomas.

The Devotional Life

The Deity of Christ

By J. BRUCE GILMAN

In the beginning was the Word and the Word was with God and the Word was God . . . and the Word was made flesh. John 1:1, 14.

The deity of Christ is the fundamental doctrine of the Christian religion. Any weakening of it must endanger the whole structure because in the final analysis so many other doctrines rest upon it. Several years ago an engineer of my acquaintance was watching the track ahead of his speeding locomotive. Suddenly he realized that the iron rails in front were trembling and shaking in a strange manner. Putting on the brakes immediately he was able to stop the train barely in time to prevent the cars from being wrecked in a cave-in. The danger had been caused by small streams of water trickling under the track until the supporting earth had been carried away.

In our day the doctrine of the deity of Christ needs strong emphasis. There are many subtle streams of influence constantly undermining this central foundation of the gospel. Modern society is like a mighty express train moving on with a speed which our civilization constantly accelerates. The result must be disaster unless the foundation is strong enough to keep the train on the course of real progress—that foundation is God incarnate. To say that the Christ is divine because all men are divine or that he has more of divinity than any other man is not sufficient. Mankind needs a savior who is God.

Clear Bible Testimony

The testimony of the Bible is clear in regard to this doctrine. In our consideration of the different passages we should not neglect the Old Testament. But as we study these prophecies we should not allow our enthusiasm to twist their meaning. As an illustration of the evidence of the Old Testament bearing on this truth let us take the remarkable verse found in the ninth chapter of Isaiah. "His name shall be called Wonderful, Counsellor, the mighty God, the everlasting Father, the Prince of Peace." In this great prophecy, the two expressions, "the mighty God" and "the everlasting Father" are especially strong. They evidently refer to the Messiah, and making all allowance for Oriental exaggeration, foretell his deity. Any other interpretation robs the passage of its natural meaning.

As we turn to the New Testament we come to the witnessing of the Apostles. In our text, John writes that the Word, the Logos, which is the pre-existent Christ, was with God and was God. It is the same Logos who "was made flesh." In the twentieth chapter of his Gospel, John also says "These are written that ye might believe that Jesus is the Christ, the son of God."

Peter's acknowledgement is hearty and whole-souled; Thou art the Christ the son of the living God." (Matt. 16; 16.)

How can we understand the words of Thomas other than as a testimony to Jesus' deity? When he saw the risen Christ face to face he cried "My Lord and my God!"

When Jesus stilled the waves and the winds for the frightened disciples, they that were in the ship came and worshiped him, saying, "Of a truth thou art the son of God?" Unitedly they confessed his deity.

Paul's Witness

There are so many places in the writings of the Apostle Paul where he speaks of the deity of Christ that we can quote only a few. He tells us that he met the risen Christ on the road to Damascus and addressed him as "Lord." In Rom. 1; 4, Paul states that Christ was "declared son of God by the resurrection from the dead." In II Cor. 5:10, he recognizes Christ as the judge in the life beyond the grave. Paul's testimony is beyond misunderstanding in Col. 2:19: "For in him (Christ) dwelleth all the fullness of the Godhead bodily."

Jesus himself bore witness to his own origin and personality. More than eighty times in the Gospels he refers to himself as the "Son of man." To say that he needed to stand before his disciples and assure them that he was human is absurd. They could see for themselves. Rather his reference is to himself as the "Word made flesh." Of himself he says, "Ye shall see the angels descending upon the Son of man." (John 1:51.) "The Son of man hath power to forgive sins." (Mk. 2:10.) "I am the resurrection and the life." (John 11:25.) Of his life he says, "No man taketh it from me, but I lay it down of myself." (John 10:18.) "Before Abraham was I am." (John 8:58.) Then in his high priestly prayer in John 17, He says, "Father, glorify thou me with the glory which I had with thee before the world was." His claims to the attributes of deity were plain and unmistakable.

These claims are supported by a life which was sinless. His miracles were such as would be impossible for a human being to perform. His teachings impressed His contemporaries as "with authority." All generations since have marvelled at them. They harmonize with his atonement. He taught the necessity of his own death long before it took place. The thoughtful reader of the accounts of his suffering on the cross is convinced that he is more than man. He will agree with the testimony of the Roman cen-turion, "Truly this man was the Son of God." (Mark 15:39.) His resurrection was prophesied by himself and later made a reality. It was contrary to his disciples' expectations. It is the crowning miracle of his earthly career and is very carefully attested by a multitude of reliable witnesses.

In the second place his deity is essential to the authority, the claims, and the power of his gospel. If he is only man, we have but a human religion. It may be a little better than Confucianism or Mohammedanism, but it is on the same plane. The authority of Christ's religion fails if in any of the passages that I have quoted he deceived his disciples. If he was mistaken, or if his disciples were mistaken in him, his religion is greatly weakened.

Christ claimed oneness with the Father before his birth. He claimed a divine authority while he was on earth. If he was but man his atonement was simply a martyrdom. If his resurrection is doubtful, then the hope of the believer in Christ is uncertain. The new birth is not a reality if he is not an everpresent, vital being. Conversion becomes, not a regeneration, but the acceptance of the teachings of a great leader in religion. Even then many of his teachings must be rejected, especially those that have to do with his claims which were such as no other man has ever made.

Without It, no Power

Without his deity, his religion fails in power. Even if it becomes the religion of Scholasticism by the making of gifts to approach a good, but mistaken man, few would embrace it and then half-heartedly. What do so many promises of his mean if he is only man? How much comfort is there in, "Him that cometh unto me I will in no wise cast out." Paul's assurance to the jailor, "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ and thou shalt be saved," would have been of little help to such a man if Christ had been, but human. No streams of influence or suggestion must be allowed to undermine that faith which means life eternal. We as Christians will be in a sorry plight if we allow the words of some to give us a religion which is human only. We shall feel like saying with Mary, "They have taken away my Lord and I know not where they have laid him."

In the third place, the centuries since Christ's resurrection have supplied most important evidence of his deity. The history of the early church is explained only from that fact. The first Christians were not fanatics but people who were convinced of the truth of the gospel which they preached. Their lives were lived in communion with the Being who gave

Iowa Letter

By JAY A. LAPHAM

The B. Y. P. U. at the Northern Baptist Convention

A little planning at Baptist headquarters in Des Moines in which Miss Mate Goodell and Miss Mary Stickle were the leaders led to the plan of a B. Y. P. U. booth in the Coliseum. Pretty badges were purchased for the booth and Miss Stickle had general charge of the program. Members of B. Y. P. U. societies and other young people from our Baptist churches were asked to enroll. The register showed about 450 names, nearly all young people. The conferences held, the supplies given away, the B. Y. P. U. books sold, and the fine fellowship enjoyed made the B. Y. P. U. booth the center of attraction for the young people. The object of it all was to deepen the interest of the young folks in the life of our denomination and in the activity of the Northern Baptist Convention. Dr. G. P. Mitchell, the missionary secretary of the Iowa Convention, and the writer helped the young people in the planning and Dr. James Asa White heartily endorsed the movement. This recognition of the young people, plus the splendid program for them on Sunday afternoon, gave them the most significant place in the program of the Northern Baptist Convention that they have ever had.

"The Challenge of the Children"

The eye is the best story teller. Pageants have accordingly come to have a popular place on convention programs. At Des Moines the matchless missionary stories presented by means of the pageant, commanded eager attention.

Probably the most pretentious pageant was "The Challenge of the Children," written by Rev. C. A. Boyd, director of religious education in Wisconsin. This was presented at the city Auditorium before an audience of over 1,000 people. It was given under the auspices of the American Baptist Publication Society and Dr. Gilbert N. Brink presided. Dr. W. E. Chalmers led in the opening worship. Miss Meme Brockway told the story of the dead child whom Elisha gave back to its mother with a charm that held every ear in the vast audience. The lesson that she let grow out of the story for our parents and churches to day was writ large and easily understood.

The pageant (which was presented in Des Moines for its initial appearance) called for a maiden to represent the Spirit of the Church, meditating and studying how she can best help. In her reverie a Voice comes clear and strong, giving from the Bible the admonition to teach, to teach the children. The Spirit questions and wonders while the Voice leads on. At last in earnest prayer she asks for wisdom for so great a task. Then follows a dignified season of worship for adults, all appointments in good form, edifying and inspiring. The Spirit of the Church is pleased—"But where are the children?" she inquires. "I would have them in the midst of just such beauty and dignity in worship, singing the lofty hymns of praise. A little girl comes tripping in, enraptured with the beauty all about. 'I never saw this place before!' she cries. She tells the Spirit of the Church to come early the next Sunday to the basement of the church and she can see where the children go to Sunday school. A back number Sunday school in a dismal old basement, with poorly chosen lessons, with rag-time songs, with teachers absent, with general confusion and much noise, follows. The Spirit of the Church is sad indeed. 'Childhood is the time of vivid impressions, of lasting memories—these trashy songs, such surroundings, such general disorder, what can I do?'

The next Episode shows a workman's home, a mother and a baby; the visit of the cradle roll superintendent; an interesting conversation; the coming home of the father after the day's work; the baby secured for the cradle roll, and the father and mother (who have recently come to the city) enlisted for the Home Department and for the men's class. Then comes the opening worship of a well-organized primary department, with beautiful songs, pretty marchings, Bible verses well chosen, and offerings. The study hour with a live class of Junior boys and a fine man for a teacher followed. They studied the Holy Land from maps on the wall and then began on a large sand table to construct a relief map of Palestine. Their interest was so intense that they did not want to stop when the time for the study hour was up. The "School of Yesterday," from the Primary, and from the Junior class of boys,

Now there gather the children from all on the rostrum. The stereopticon shows the picture of Jesus with his arms around the children. "See, see," say the little folks, "he has his arm around the children!" The effect was charming. The audience followed with deep interest.

Mr. Boyd has done a good piece of work in this pageant, "The Challenge of the Children." The Publication Society will soon have the pageant in print and Sunday schools all over the Northern Baptist Convention will find it well worth their time to bring the message contained before their audience.

The Children's Division at the Northern Baptist Convention

Miss Meme Brockway of California had general charge of the program for this division. Miss Hazel Boyd of Iowa gave attention to the details in preparation in securing the fine room in the city Library Building for the daily "Story Telling Hour," and in arranging for the elegant lunch for elementary officers and teachers, which was one of the most attractive and most happy social events of the whole convention. The story telling hour at one p. m. proved to be a real feature of the Convention program, not only for the elementary folks but for others as well. Miss Brockway, Miss Hazel Boyd,

Mrs. Arlie Moore, Miss Myrtle Huckleberry, Miss Dressel, and Mrs. Payne lectured on different days. The blackboard and the sand table aided in illustration. In close connection with this instruction was the fine display of handwork from several of the states. In variety, in ingenuity, and in relevancy to the Bible subjects studied, the display was well worth careful study. It drew interested attention from many teachers and others.

The Vacation Bible School

A near neighbor to the beautiful display of handwork was the work-shop of the Vacation Bible school. Dr. T. S. Young assisted by Rev. C. S. and Mrs. Osborn and by Rev. J. C. Clark, gave daily instruction in basket weaving, paper tearing, hammock making, wood cutting, and various other lines of hand craft. They also taught and illustrated the whole plan of the vacation school. Bible lessons were dramatized and stories were told, free literature was distributed and helpful books were sold. A live interest was awakened on the part of many in this method of teaching the Bible. All pastors and parents should consider carefully the vacation Bible school and the church school that meets once a week for some nine months in the year. We owe it to the children and to the boys and girls to give much more time to religious education, and to give the time in such a way as to interest those whom we teach.

Woman's Home Mission Summer Schools at Northfield

The Interdenominational Women's Home Mission Summer School has closed a most successful and inspiring session. The registration has aggregated over 400, distributed among the various denominations as follows: Baptist, thirty-four women, forty-seven girls, two missionaries; Congregational, fifty-five women, fifty-five girls, three missionaries; Disciples, two women; Lutheran, eleven women, seventeen girls, two missionaries; Methodist Episcopal, nineteen women, fifty girls, three missionaries; Presbyterian, twenty-nine women, eight girls, one missionary; Dutch Reformed, thirteen women, fifty-five girls, three missionaries; additional delegates, three; total 412.

Interesting features and events characterized the entire school, among which were the presentation of a monologue, "Liberty Land," by Mrs. A. B. Strickland; "Little Journeys with Home Missionaries," by Rev. Fred Eastman; the Mount Hermon Pilgrimage, a pageant, "Striking America's Hour," and denominational rallies. In addition to these special features, the real work of the Summer School proceeded according to a regular schedule throughout the entire period. The most spectacular and dramatic work was the presentation of the pageant in the Auditorium, in which over fifty participated, and which was highly successful in setting, costuming and dramatic art.

The Summer School for Women's Foreign Missionary Societies opened July 12, continuing through the 19th. Among the speakers and teachers were the Rev. Charles E. Jefferson, D.D., of the Broadway Tabernacle, New York City, who gave daily studies in the Book of Acts and preached in the Auditorium Sunday morning, July 17; and Mrs. Helen Barrett Montgomery, the recently elected President of the Northern Baptist Convention. Mrs. Montgomery taught the text-book for the year, entitled "The Kingdom and the Nations."

WESTERN WASHINGTON

Seattle, First, A. M. Bailey pastor, for the second quarter of 1921 reports, $11,443.46; balance on hand, $792.76; new members received forty-two.

SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA

Calvary, Pasadena, sent its pastor, Rev. B. B. Jacques to the Northern Baptist Convention. A new building is in prospect.

Tremont, Pasadena, Rev. John Benzen, pastor, and Rev. Gordon Palmer, pastor of the South Park Church, served the church in the three weeks of evangelistic services in the month of March. Largely as a result of these meetings twenty-two were baptized, making a total of twenty-seven for the year, and a net gain for the year of fifty-two after subtracting those dismissed.

San Diego, First, Frank O. Belden, pastor, at its June communion welcomed thirty-three new members.

Since Rev. W. Earle Smith came to The First Church of Ontario as pastor March 1st, fifty-two additions have been made to the church. Recently Dr. O. P. Gifford addressed 140 men following a banquet given by the Men's Club. The young people of the church recently held an encampment for a week in the mountains near Ontario where the church has a cabin under construction.

Rocky Mountain States

COLORADO

Longmont—Ground has been broken on the well selected corner lots for a new church edifice.

Orchard—Rev. A. H. Ballard of Fort Morgan is now pastor on this field and at Wiggins.

Broadway, Denver—Our people are rejoicing over the coming of a new pastor, Rev. Frank E. Eden.

Kim—Baca County Missionary W. A. Pipkin conducted more than a month's special meetings at this place, resulting in a new church organization with fifty-seven members, twenty-eight of these being received by baptism. The church is located fifty miles southwest of Springfield and eighty miles east of Trinidad, in Las Animas county. The new church called Rev. J. W. Lummas as pastor for half time. In the membership of the church there are five Lancis, three Hatchetts and two Hammers. This all foretokens a new church building.

Branson—Our new church, but recently organized, has called Rev. A. L. Castberry as pastor.

Center—Rev. J. M. Graham, formerly of Flagler, has accepted our unanimous call to become pastor, and is now on the field.

Holly—Rev. Chas. B. Lewis accepted a call to this field and began in June.

Twin Lakes—Our new church building is rapidly nearing completion. This field is under the pastoral care of Rev. S. T. Magill, who also looks after the Shiloh church near Flagler.

MONTANA

Rev. C. A. Cook, after a notable pastorate of five years with the First Baptist Church in Butte closed his work on June 1 and has moved to Seattle.

Rev. J. A. Hoffman for six years a general field worker in this state will in addition to his other responsibilities give much of his time this year to evangelism.

Rev. Stuart Goude, a student of McMinnville College, is supplying the First Baptist Church of Butte during the summer vacation.

Rev. J. H. Spencer, stated supply pastor at Laurel, closed a ten months' period of service on July 1. After a month with his family in Colorado, he will become stated supply at Miles City.

On July 1, Rev. G. J. E. Keetch, who recently graduated at the Rochester Theological Seminary, became pastor of the Baptist Church at Eureka, one of Montana's most important and growing industrial centers.

Rev. R. O. Shannon of the class of '21, Rochester Theological Seminary, on July 1 became pastor of the First Baptist Church at Laurel, an important railroad center.

Montana's seven associations will hold their annual meetings of five sessions each during the month of September, with special emphasis given to local church programs, evangelism and methods for completing the N. W. M. subscription.

Rev. Daniel Bryant of Great Falls will supply the East Side Baptist Church of Portland, Ore., during the month of August while its pastor, Dr. W. B. Hinson, is on his annual vacation.

Rev. George MacDougall accompanied by Dr. R. R. Rathbone in an eighteen foot canoe recently covered a four hundred mile river trip from Dillon to Great Falls, navigating the Beaverhead, Jefferson and Missouri Rivers, being the first white men to successfully make this dangerous trip.

Miss H. Mary Sundell, after spending three months with our mission churches in Butte and Anaconda, is now with the mission at Polson for an indefinite period.

Miss Beatrice Sliter, a member of the First Baptist Church at Lewistown, after a year in the Missionary Training School in Chicago, goes on September 1 to the Upper Big Horn Mission on the Crow Indian Reservation as teacher in the mission school.

Rev. S. A. Nelson, colporteur for white work on the Crow Indian Reservation has been designated to give some attention to the Indian work at Crow Agency and St. Xavier.

The semi-annual conference of the Timber Creek Regional Baptist Church was held at Brockway on June 5 with Brethren Osborn, Mack and Sutherland giving the principal addresses of the day. The membership of this church covers an area embracing parts of four counties in eastern Montana.

One of the outstanding events in Baptist history in Montana was the assignment to the American Baptist Home Mission Society by the American Missionary Association (Congregational) of its missions among the Crow. The Congregational brethren have had two of the six districts on the Reservation for many years. This gives the Baptists the full responsibilities for Protestant missionary work among the Crows, a tribe of very responsive Indians, numbering about eighteen hundred. The enlarged amount of work continues under the general supervision of our veteran missionary, Wm. A. Petzoldt of Lodge Grass.

On June 5 the church at Havre dedicated a frame edifice of attractive appearance, seated with oak pews and equipped with furnace, indirect lighting system, with a seating capacity of two hundred fifty. This achievement during the depressed business conditions of the last year is a remarkable one. Great credit is due to Pastor Frank D. White and wife for their untiring efforts. The dedication sermon was delivered by Secretary Cress. There is practically no debt on the building.

On June 12 the church at Roundup dedicated a splendid brick edifice with full basement and all modern equipment. The main auditorium will seat two hundred fifty and there is a spacious pulpit and two private rooms on the main floor. Apart from a loan of $1,000.00 from the American Baptist Home Mission Society, the building is entirely free of debt and is the best ecclesiastical edifice in the city. Secretary G. Clifford Cress preached the sermon and raised over $500 at the dedication service. Rev. R. B. Thomas who has been pastor here for three years assisted by a hard working building committee has made this seemingly impossible task a reality.

REV. W. G. HOOPER is the new pastor at Jetmore. The work is prospering there. Six were baptized recently, six others await baptism and four have been received by relation. A B. Y. P. U. has been organized, and the outlook for the work was never brighter.

REV. R. S. CHITTUM is resigning at Wilmore to take effect the last of August. He has done a good work there under extreme difficulties.

PASTOR W. A. ELLIOTT and wife of Ottawa are away for a six weeks' period in Colorado. He will have charge of the platform work of the Colorado Chautauqua at Boulder, and will give the Bible messages. In his absence his church will be supplied by the following: July 3, 10, 17 and 31, by Dr. Frank Strong of Lawrence; July 24 by Dr. J. J. Ross of Chicago, who will be one of the speakers at the Assembly in session at that time; August 7 by Rev. Robt. W. Shaw of Milwaukee; August 14 by Rev. I. W. Bailey of Ottawa.

REV. F. W. DAISLEY, until recently pastor at Altamont, has been called to the Independence Avenue Baptist Church, Kansas City, Mo., and began his work there the first Sunday in July. We are sorry to lose him from the State.

PASTOR FRED COCHRAN of Parsons has had a leave of absence for several weeks owing to illness. In his absence Rev. Walter Tanner, Associational Missionary, Southeast Association, is supplying the church.

REV. J. M. BANDY of Mt. Hope, Kan., has been assisting in special meetings in one of the mission points in Jefferson City, Mo. A good interest has been developed.

THE CONFESSION OF FAITH passed by the conference at Des Moines has been placed before a number of churches in the state since the convention and has met with favor. It was unanimously adopted by the N. Topeka Church at the morning service July 3rd, and after a week's notice was presented at the prayer service of the First Church Topeka and after some discussion was adopted by a two-thirds vote. It will probably be taken up in most of the churches in the state sooner or later.

CHURCH VACATION SCHOOLS are now in progress at Bethel Neighborhood Center in Kansas City, Miss Nathana Clyde in charge; at Frontenac, just northeast from Pittsburg, Rev. E. F. Hallock and Miss Jessie Eades in charge; at Columbus, Mrs. Helen Hill Tanner and Miss Huddleston in charge; at Holton, Rev. Horace Goodin and Miss Elsie Rich in charge, and at Lawrence, Rev. F. E. Witcraft in charge. Very successful schools have just been conducted at Belleville, Morrill, Hiawatha, Horton, Chelsea Place in Kansas City, Ottawa, Eldorado, First Church Wichita and First Church Hutchinson.

ILLINOIS

Committee on Secretary and Headquarters

At the semi-annual meeting of the board of the Illinois Baptist State Convention, recently held, the following resolution was passed:

"That the chair appoint a committee of seven to recommend a successor to Dr. E. P. Brand, bring in a program for the future work of the state convention and name a location for state headquarters, the board to be called into session the first week in October to hear such report."

Pursuant to this instruction, Pres. Geo. M. Potter appointed the following to constitute such committee:

Dr. T. H. Marsh, Decatur; Dr. M. P. Boynton, Chicago; Mrs. W. P. Topping, Elgin; Rev. G. A. Sheets, Rockford; Rev. D. T. Magill, Alton; Mrs. N. J. Hilton, Minonk; B. E. Allen, Neponset.

This committee is anxious to serve the denomination of the state as best it can. Anyone having any suggestions along the lines of the resolution will please free to write to any member of the committee. —B. E. Allen, Secretary.

MICHIGAN

REV. G. W. LAWRENCE, director of rural church work, delivered two addresses at the rural conference held the last week in June at the Michigan Agricultural College. His topics were, June 29, "Town Church and the Farmer;" and on June 30, "Rural Church Programs."

REV. J. F. THOMPSON, who retired from the pastorate at Ewart with the first of May, because of his age and the ill health of his wife, is living at his home at Manton. Mr. Thompson desires to advise his many friends that he is no longer in active pastorate. Rev. A. Graham is doing splendid work at Manton, and Rev. W. O. Orton is the pastor at Ewart.

CONVENTION PASTOR JOSHUA ROBERTS preached in an abandoned Unitarian church at Harietta in the Osceola Association, where a new work was started in June, with encouraging outlook. At Edgetts also the work is meeting with cordial response on the part of the people. This has heretofore been a union congregation, but the outlook is toward a permanent work.

IN THE ALPENA ASSOCIATION are signs of promise; Tower church has been enheartened by the reception of eight new members by baptism, the Sunday school is growing and the spirit of co-operation is fine. At Hale, Pastor Elmer McGirr is doing fine work among the boys; and at Lott, Pastor Roberts baptized eight into the church.

A LARGE NUMBER from the circuit of churches served by Rev. Harold McGrath, Glennie, gathered at Jose Lake on one of the pleasant June Sundays where a most impressive service was held. Following the fine sermon of the convention pastor, Mr. McGrath had the joy of baptizing forty-five persons, whose ages ranged from eighty down to eight. These new members have cheered the churches into which they have come, and the service on this day was a most impressive one.

DR. C. M. CARTER, Highland Park, is to spend some weeks abroad. Immediately preceding his departure, the Jefferson Avenue Church, Detroit, which he has been supplying, unanimously voted its deep appreciation of his work which has resulted in uniting the Clinton, Jefferson, and Lakeview organizations into one church. The hope was emphatically expressed that upon his return, Dr. Carter would return to the field and perfect the organization.

REV. C. S. BURNS, of Ypsilanti, seems to be one of our pastors who never wearies. His burning passion is to help the student body in that pretty city to grow in the knowledge of our Lord and Saviour along with their mental development, and he and his church strive to enlist every Baptist student coming to either the Normal or Cleary College at once in some line of active church work.

INDIANA

MADISON—June the 5 marked the first anniversary of Pastor E. A. Shulls. The church has shown a marked advance in every way; each department is active. During the year 105 have been added to the church, 70 of which came by baptism, nearly all adults; there are now 516 resident members. The financial condition has equally prospered; we paid our N. W. M. fully 100%, all bills fully paid and a fine balance in the treasury. Just now we have launched a much needed program and expect to spend about $6,000 for repairs and improvements.

BICKNELL opened a daily vacation Bible school under the direction of Miss Fern McGuire about three weeks ago. An enrollment of about fifty was expected, but it has run to 200. A new community hall recently built by the church affords excellent room for the work of the school.

GARY, FIRST—Pastor O. B. Sarber is preaching a series of interesting sermons on the history and contents of the Bible.

Ohio Baptist Assembly

From Friday, July 29, to Sunday, August 7, Granville will entertain the Ohio Baptist Assembly.

The Assembly is a Summer Bible Training School maintained for the purpose of giving inspiration and practical help to all Christian workers. A number of state organizations hold annual conventions and summer conferences in connection with the Assembly, and the programs of all these meetings combined with that of the Assembly Training School make the session remarkable for its spiritual uplift and fine fellowship.

The morning and afternoon programs are devoted to lectures and conferences, while the evenings are given to popular lectures, concerts, and other high-grade entertainments.

The program for this year is broad in its scope, and the lecturers are all specialists in their various lines of work.

A number of state and national organizations have aided generously by sending to us their leading workers as Training School instructors and Conference lecturers.

The Ohio Baptist Young People's Union presents a very fine program in its annual convention, July 29-31. Every young peo-le's society should have its representatives present in this meeting. Dr. Chas. Williams of Denison University, Dr. Allyn K. Foster, Secretary of the Department of Student Work of the Northern Baptist Convention, Dr. M. M. McGorill, District Young People's Secretary of the American Baptist Publication Society, Miss Helen Crissman, Field Secretary of World Wide Guild Work, and other able speakers are on the program.

The Baptist Ministers' Conference

always a profitable meeting. This year he addresses by Dr. Allyn K. Foster, Pres. C. W. Chamberlain, Dr. W. P. Belian, Dr. H. E. Tralle, Dr. A. B. Strickland, Dr. M. M. McGorill and a good message each day by Pres. E. Y. Mullins will make the program of unusual merit. A man's preaching and pastoral work will be made stronger and better by such teaching and fellowship. The dates are Monday, August 1—Friday, August 5.

The Ohio Life Service League

was organized two years ago, and now enrolls over two hundred members. The League is proving a great power for good among our young people. The annual meeting and conferences will be interesting and helpful. Dr. Allyn K. Foster of New York will give the address in the meeting on Sunday afternoon, July 31st.

The Ohio World Wide Guild

will put on a series of conferences from Monday to Saturday, with attractive subjects and able leaders. Miss Crissman will be present again this year, and there will be a great crowd present, for the World Wide Guild girls are always loyal to the Assembly.

Leadership Courses

include Teacher Training Class, Mission Study Class, Personal Work, Young People's Society, Music and Pageantry, World Wide Guild, Rural Church Work, Women in Missions, Junior Society Work, Church Vacation School, Religious Education in the Local Church, Athletic and Recreational Activities, Work with "New Americans."

Atlantic Coast

MASSACHUSETTS

MARTHA'S VINEYARD ASSOCIATION will meet Aug. 6-14 at Oak Bluff. The program is organized on the plan of a Chautauqua.

RHODE ISLAND

CHESTNUT HILL CHURCH, J. C. Worden pastor, recently held its annual meeting. Secretary Livingston and Mrs. W. C. Murrelock addressed the congregation. Lunch was served on the lawn. It has been an unusual year in baptisms and contributions for local needs and the New World Movement.

REV. WILLIAM CLEMENTS who recently resigned from the Trinity Church, Providence, has accepted a call to a pastorate in Fall River. A happy social occasion was arranged by his friends and they presented him with a purse of $100. We regret that Rhode Island must yield to Massachusetts.

ALLENDALE CHURCH, Edwin F. Thornton of Brown, '21, acting pastor, has lost two of its oldest members by death, William N. Kinnecom and George W. Gould who had been church treasurer for more than 50 years. The church is being wisely led by Brother Thornton, and although he enters Newton in the fall he expects to continue with the church at Allendale.

VERNON A. LIBBY of this year's graduating class at Brown has resigned as acting pastor at Lime Rock. The work has greatly broadened during Brother Libby's ministry. Electric lights and a kitchen with other improvements has been added, and the community has been drawn towards the church.

DAILY VACATION SCHOOLS are being held in the Pleasant View Church Pawtucket; the Second Church, Newport; the Union Church, Providence; and the Fourth Church, Providence.

NEW JERSEY

FIRST CHURCH, BAYONNE, C. H. Rannels pastor, is rejoicing in continued spiritual blessings and numerical growth in spite of the summer season. Two received the hand of fellowship at the July communion service and two others were baptized July 10, making 100 additions to the membership since pastor Rannels began his work here in March, 1919.

EMMANUEL, RIDGEWOOD, Thomas H. Sprague, pastor—Five of the churches of the community are holding union Sunday evening services during the month of July. The first of the series was held on the 3rd inst. with Emmanuel church and was in charge of the pastor. Dr. Sprague left on vacation July 11 and will be back in his pulpit again September 11. During his absence the pulpit will be supplied by Dr. H. W. Vincent of the Ashland Ave. Church, Toledo, Ohio; Dr. J. J. Muir, of Temple Church, Washington, D. C.; Rev. Alfred E. Isaac of Rochester, and Rev. Adelbert Chapman of Ridgewood.

CONNECTICUT

REV. CLARENCE HILL FRANK, who has been for the past year connected with the Connecticut Sunday School Association, with headquarters at Hartford, has accepted the call to become pastor of the First Church, Poughkeepsie, New York. Before taking up Sunday-school work Dr. Frank was pastor for more than four years of the First Church, Stamford, this state, where he did a constructive work, especially along the line of religious education, in which particular field he had remarkable success in the Delaware Avenue Church, Buffalo and the Immanuel Church, Brooklyn. Dr. Frank is a graduate of Ewing College, Illinois, and the Divinity School of Chicago University.

Obituary

MRS. ALICE EVELYN WILLIAMS

Alice Evelyn Mills was born in Buffalo, N. Y., Nov. 25, 1857, the youngest of the five children born to Henry and Mary Mills, who a few years before had come from Hertfordshire, England.

In the simple, quiet, religious home, the little daughter became a Christian so early in life that she was never able to state the time of her conversion, but her baptism into the Prospect Ave. Baptist Church in Buffalo took place when she was fourteen years of age. Growing in spiritual strength and experience she became greatly interested in the missionary cause. At a prayer meeting in the spring of 1881, she met Dr. R. R. Williams who was on furlough from India and in July of the same year, they were married and sailed for Ramaputnam, India.

The young wife entered with great enthusiasm into the work showing marked ability in the language, unusual adaptability for the task, and love for the people. But the terrible heat of Southern India, and the demands of a pioneer missionary's life proved too much for her strength and in deep disappointment, Dr. and Mrs. Williams returned with their two children to this country for an extended furlough.

Her health was never regained after this experience and although for thirty-five years afterwards, she performed with rare devotion, ability and success the duties of mother, pastor's wife and missionary in widely different places, and under varied conditions, it was always in spite of the handicap of serious physical weakness.

The family returned to India after a time and remained until 1896. During these years, Mrs. Williams was much of the time on the hills with her children giving them the beginning of their education. Besides this, although often confined to her bed, she supervised a day school and Sunday school in a degraded Telugu settlement.

After returning to this country, the family lived for years in Kansas. Mrs. Williams started and supervised a Sunday school in a little prairie school house, miles from any other school or church. While the family were making their home in Ottawa, Mrs. Williams was a leader in the woman's work of that important church.

In 1909, the family came to Redlands to endeavor to build up the mother's strength but she was never able to take any prominent place in the life of this community and church, but many of the poor, the sick and the friendless of the city can testify that as she was able, and even beyond her strength, she visited their homes and helped them materially and spiritually.

Even when confined to her bed as she was for over a year in her last illness, she was constantly sending messages and taking an interest in many outside of the family circle.

It was within this circle, however, that her greatest work was done. She was the mother of six children. One little son, together with his father, awaited her coming in the glory world. Five children, four sons and one daughter, survive her and rise up to call her blessed. Two sisters also survive her.

Five Year Program

Northern Baptist Convention was the first great unified program ever initiated by an evangelical denomination which included great evangelistic, missionary and educational goals as well as financial objectives. It was the forerunner of the Methodist Centenary Movement and other similar campaigns launched since, all of which found in a large measure their springs of encouragement and their actual content and their methods of organization in our Five Year Program.

A Five Year Program having been adopted, the committee on United Missionary Campaign was appointed to act for the convention in developing the project, and under the able and progressive leadership of John M. Moore began to make definite plans for its future progress. Its personnel was as follows: Shailer Mathews, chairman; Arthur E. Bestor, vice chairman; John M. Moore, executive secretary; D. G. Garabrant, treasurer; F. A. Agar, F. W. Ayer, Clarence A. Barbour, L. C. Barnes, Samuel Zane Batten, Henry Bond, Ernest S. Butler, Mrs. George W. Coleman, W. A. Davison, Milton G. Evans, C. M. Gallup, Fred P. Haggard, Emory W. Hunt, Herbert S. Johnson, Guy C. Lamson, P. H. J. Lerrigo, Rivington Lord, Mrs. Helen Barrett Montgomery, H. L. Morehouse, Frank W. Padelford, A. J. Rowland, Charles H. Sears, E. T. Tomlinson, T. J. Villers, Mrs. Katherine S. Westfall, Charles L. White, Mornay Williams.

During the life of the committee the following changes in personnel have occurred. Death removed H. L. Morehouse and A. J. Rowland. Guy C. Lamson and Ernest S. Butler resigned and the following were appointed to the vacancies—J. Y. Aitchison, Gilbert N. Brink, George Huntington. The following have been added to the Committee: Rev. W. S. Abernethy, Rev. F. B. Bachelor, Rev. H. R. Best, G. C. Carpenter, Rev. C. H. Jones, Rev. F. B. Palmer, R. W. Ramsay, T. S. Tompkins, S. G. Young.

The Efficient Personnel

Shailer Mathews of Chicago was elected chairman of the committee and continued in that position during the whole five year period. D. G. Garabrant gave faithful and expert attention to the duties of treasurer.

The committee during its life has filled two vacancies in its executive staff. John M. Moore, whose years of experience as missionary educational secretary of the denomination had enabled him to offer most fruitful and valuable suggestions in the formulation of the plan, was appointed in 1916 executive secretary for the committee. In 1918, after a most resultful term of service, Dr. Moore resigned the office of executive secretary and P. H. J. Lerrigo was elected to succeed him and the enterprise was vigorously carried forward under his leadership until the Laymen's Movement undertook the raising of large sums of money for our missionary objectives. The Five Year Program Committee then merged its functions with those of the laymen's organization and Dr. Lerrigo resigned to become candidate secretary of the foreign Mission Society. Frederick A. Agar, who had been appointed field and methods secretary for the committee in 1916 and had served in that capacity throughout the life of the program, was named executive secretary and served to the end of the Five Year Period, while continuing to serve as church efficiency secretary of the Laymen's Movement, and later of the General Board of Promotion.

One of the most valuable features of work carried out by the Five Year Program Committee was the preparation and circulation of numerous educational and inspirational pieces of literature dealing with prayer, stewardship, evangelism and methods of church finance and organization. At least 117 pieces of literature were prepared and given circulation by the Five Year Program Committee, and a careful estimate of their circulation would place the distribution at more than 14 million separate pieces. It is apparent, therefore, that the profuse distribution of the printed page, while an occasion for some criticism, has helped to produce the progress manifested in our denominational life in recent years. Many of the pamphlets prepared by the Five Year Program Committee are still in constant demand by the local churches.

The final part of the five-year term granted to this committee was used in connection with the work of the General Board of Promotion. The general progress of the denomination became so accelerated that advance steps along organizational lines were called for and such duties lay beyond the scope of the Five Year Program Committee, but it has been generally recognized both by the Laymen's Committee and the General Board of Promotion that the underlying causes for much of the accelerated denominational progress were to be found in the genius and spirit of the Five Year Program.

The comparative table which follows indicates the basic condition regarding each goal in 1915 when the program started and then gives the latest figures obtainable before the meeting of the Northern Baptist Convention at Des Moines in 1921:

AN INTERESTING NOTICE

This summer the well-known hospitality of Philadelphia will be extended for the first time to the National Association of Organists, which holds its fourteenth annual convention at Wanamaker's, July 26-29. Organists have always had a high standing in that city, for thirty years ago the first American group of advanced players was formed there in the American Organ Players' Club. Shortly afterwards, in 1896, the American Guild of Organists was formed, but the youngest body, the National Association of Organists, was the first to hold conventions, where all organ problems should be touched, and eminent players should be heard. The first was in 1908, at Ocean Grove. Since then various cities, from Portland, Me., to Pittsburgh, have been selected.

There are three outstanding features of this convention, the practical talks on organ tone and construction, the recitals and round-table conferences on the vocation of the organist. Realizing the great need for more practical knowledge of the organ, a series of demonstrations of tone and mechanism will be given by Ernest M. Skinner, Wm. E. Haskell and Herbert Brown. The intricacies of the great organ at Wanamaker's will be revealed under Alexander Russell's guidance, and, following a supper to all delegates, at which Mr. Rodman Wanamaker will be host, Chas. M. Courboin, the Belgian virtuoso organist, will play that splendid instrument for the delegates and the general public.

The members may also have the unique opportunity of hearing organ music by wireless telephone, played 350 miles away on the Carnegie Institute organ at Pittsburgh. The organist, Charles Heinroth, has successfully employed this wonderful device,—being easily heard at long distances,—and it is expected that Wanamaker's receiving station will bring the sound of this organ to the entire audience.

Other well-known recitalists will be heard in the series of six organ concerts in churches, and at Girard College, and he members will learn the uplifting possibilities of the organ with moving pictures. The much neglected field of organ blowing is to be covered by a visit and lunch at the Kinetic factory.

The ideals of organists, their difficulties, and their possibilities of greater service will receive equal attention in the papers and discussions. A most attractive pilgrimage to Valley Forge has been planned for the last day, during which a special organ tribute to the nation's dead will be rendered by Philadelphia organists. That evening the banquet will be held in the Musical Art Club.

This outline shows what a feast is in store for all organists and friends who attend even a part of the convention. The sessions, except the business meeting, are open to all lovers of music. The association, which exists to promote good feeling among organists and good fellowship with the co-related ministries of song and exhortation, has worked hard to make this convention really helpful. Philadelphia, her great merchant, Mr. Vanamaker, and the American Organ Players' Club, have provided a cordial welcome, and there is no doubt of a record attendance, not only from the surrounding States, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Delaware and New York, but from much greater distances.

A complete advance program will be mailed upon request to Henry S. Fry, St. Clement's Church, 20th and Cherry Streets, Philadelphia, Pa.

NEW MUSIC REVIEW

From The Clayton F. Summy Co., Chicago, Ill.

Legacies .....Hill
Ole March Win' .....Hazard
Memory's Garden .....Hoff
Joy .....Scott
Irish Rose of My Heart.....Harling

This series of solo-songs from the well-known Chicago publisher contains much of interest and value. The first-named number, by Hill, is an exquisite short song, published in one key, but usable by almost all voices on account of its limited range. The sentiment of the poem is far removed from the sickly sentimental rubbish so often set to music by the song-writers of today. Both poem and music are welded together into a perfect little gem. "Ole March Win'" is a clever character-song, attractive for encore use, or to lighten a group in a recital program. It should be a fine teaching song, as the range is moderate, the notes easy, and the melodic pattern simple. About the same verdict can be rendered as to the next title, "Memory's Garden," though the text is of a more sentimental nature, and the range more extensive. "Joy" is a concert song, awing with vitality and melodic pulsation, a setting of a virile poem by Sara Teasdale. It is issued in two keys, and should be equally effective in either. The accompaniment is pianistic, and nowhere nearly as difficult as it looks to be at a casual glance. The singer fortunate enough to possess a sufficient range will glory in this song; the opportunities are there. Of a different character is the final listing; a somewhat conventional ballad of the Irish type so plentifully concocted by the Olcotts and such; it will probably gain circulation for its lilt, and the taking melody of the refrain. It is published in two keys.

From Carl Fischer Co., New York, N. Y.

Awake Out of Sleep.....Diggle
Our Native Land .....Lester
The Peace of God.....Lester

The first-named anthem, by a widely-known organist of Los Angeles, is a bright morning-anthem, valid musically and possessed of an infectious swing truly indicative of its joyous subject. It is easy, choral in form, and should produce a big effect with a minimum of effort. The two numbers by the conductor of this page are tuneful service numbers. The first is a setting of the well-known Wrexford patriotic text; it has already had a wide use for national occasions. It is marked by a big baritone solo, followed by a maestoso choral passage. The last title is a bigger anthem especially designed for festival occasions. There appear characteristic solos for all voices, set off by choral passages; concluding with a melodious tenor solo, which material is repeated, this time set for chorus, ending with a murmured prayer for guidance.

He is eminently fitted both by training and experience for a leadership of the finest type. The Poughkeepsie Church is to be congratulated. The new pastor will settle September 1.

MAINE

THE FIRST CHURCH OF WATERVILLE has called to its pastorate and leadership the Rev. Walter Quarrington of Detroit, Michigan. Mr. Quarrington is a graduate of McMaster University, Toronto, and holds degree from the University and the Theological Seminary. His present pastorate of nine years in the Fourteenth Avenue Church of Detroit has been successful in all lines and marks real progress in the efficiency and breadth of the service rendered by that church to the community and the world. A noble church edifice has been built at a cost of over $150,000. The number of additions by baptism has been very large as Mr. Quarrington is a preacher of the gospel that wins. He will receive a warm welcome from a church of over 900 members that furnishes in addition to this a very important parish composed of the nearly 700 students who come to Waterville to attend Colby College and Coburn Institute. The church with an allotment of $52,000 subscribed $55,000 in the New World Movement. Mr. Quarrington will be the successor of Dr. W. H. Spencer who served the church twenty years, Dr. E. C. Whittemore, pastor for fourteen years, and Dr. Arthur S. Phelps now of California, pastor of 1914-1920.

PASTOR-EVANGELIST BENJAMIN BEATTY is giving a period of service to the Littleton and Monticello churches in the South Aroostook Association.

REV. E. A. ROCKWELL, Colby '20, now a member of the middle class in Newton Theological Institution is caring for the church work in North Woodland and Colby.

The Deity of Christ

them power to persevere even when facing the wild beasts in the arena or the torture of the flames.

The history of mission is his story of triumph. The movement to spread his gospel has not been limited to any national consideration or any propaganda for selfish aggrandizement, but has been preached for the upbuilding of every race, and tongue, and color. Nations have been transformed, countless homes made happy, and millions of degraded beings have found a power to make their lives righteous and their hearts joyful. The sacrificial spirit of the Christian missionaries is suggestive. It has been well said that no labor union nor social settlement sends its members to live in tropical Africa to propagate its teachings. Yet thousands of Christian missionaries have done this gladly, not for their own advancement, but for the glory of their Master and the salvation of sin-sick souls.

Vast and vital changes have come to society through this unique religion. Christ came not as a reformer, but reforms came through Christ. The early Christians did not preach against the gladiatorial contests, but their teachings of love and reverence for human life finally overthrew the cruel sport. The Christians did not condemn slavery, but all agree that it has been the spirit of the Galilean which has freed men everywhere. Love of one's neighbor, the attempt to follow the Golden Rule, mercy toward those in distress have all come from him. Hospitals, orphanages, Red Cross societies, charitable organizations of all kinds have followed the entrance of the teachings of the Christ into the minds and hearts of men.

Jesus said of each who should believe on him, "Greater works than these shall he do because I go unto my Father." (John 14:12.) This promise to His disciples of all generations has been literally fulfilled. Countless eyes, blinded by sin, have been opened to visions of righteousness. Multitudes of souls dead in trespasses have been awakened to newness of life. Notable and numerous examples of the power of Christ to save to the uttermost mark every century. The impure Augustine becomes a white pillar of the church. John Newton, slave of slaves, becomes a living example of the truth which can make men free indeed. John B. Gough, the gutter drunkard, becomes the apostle of temperance. Jerry MacAuley, the degraded and hardened sinner, becomes an inspiration and light to thousands. These are but a few illustrations of the millions of miracles that the Risen Christ has accomplished through his disciples during the ages.

The Waters of Experience

We know that the sun has risen when we see its light shining on the hills even if we cannot see the sun itself. We may not see the risen Christ, but we see the glory of his transforming power in the souls of men. No adequate explanation of the relation of the Second Person in the Trinity to the Father and Holy Spirit can be given. We are dealing with that which is beyond human reason. However, many suggestions have been made which help us feel the reasonableness of the Trinity. We may stand on the shore of the ocean and view its wonderful extent and power. We look at the clouds above it, some of which are so transparent as to be invisible and we are told that they are formed of the same water as the ocean. Then our eyes fall on the bay nearer us where we can see very clearly the line of demarcation between the water and the land. The bay is a part of the ocean. We marvel at the infinite power of God the Creator and Sustainer. But God is manifest in the gracious showers of blessing that come from the Holy Spirit. Because we can see that the mysterious personality of our Lord is joined to that which is evidently human is no reason for failing to appreciate that his personality is a part of the Infinite. Another illustration may have a suggestion for us. We sit in the trolley car and have the sensation of being propelled by a mighty force. We ask what the power is and the answer is, "Electricity." There is a gentle warmth which pervades the car and makes us comfortable. To our query, "What heats the car?" there is the same reply—"Electricity." The night is dark without, but the interior of the car is cheerful with a bright glow. To our question, "What makes the light?" we have the same reply, "Electricity." The manifestations of power, of heat, of light, are from one source. When we behold the marvels of the universe on a starry night, we say "It is God." When the Holy Spirit is stirring the hearts of men and a revival is in progress, we likewise say, "It is God." Then why should it seem unreasonable when the soul of man, darkened by sin, has a vision of the Light of the Word to affirm "It is God?"

God, no longer thought of as a hideous monster, nor as blind force, is revealed through the Incarnate Word as Love. The Old Testament gives testimony as to the personality of the Son. Those who beheld his face speak in no uncertain terms. The Christ bears witness of himself. To detract from his deity is to weaken the authority, the claims, and the power of his gospel. Since the day of his triumph over the grave, his divine power has been shown in the victorious progress of missions, in the transformation of human society and in the miracles performed in the hearts of those dead in trespasses and sin. It is as Jean Paul Richter says, "Christ the holiest among the mighty, the mightiest among the holy, lifted with His pierced hand empires off their hinges, turned the stream of centuries out of its channel, and still governs the ages."

and she introduced her husband. And Mr. Minister asked about the banana business—was he making a good living?

"No," sighed Banana Beppo, "no good-a living; my boss, he get-a all de money I make-a!"

So in a week or so Mr. Minister found him a better way to make a living, and the first thing anybody knew there was a new fruit store in town, with Banana Beppo smiling behind the counter. Then after a month or so a big boat brought some new Italians over the ocean from Italy to America, and five of them belonged to Banana Beppo—for there was Mrs. Beppo, Catterina, Giovanni, Tony and the cute Bambino. All on account of Banana Beppo's better business they could now come over to live with him up over the store. And every single Sunday they were scrubbed within an inch of their lives and brought to the Biggest Church in Town, where there was a friendly minister and a warm welcome.

But you and I know how it was that little glass of water which first made that church walk right into Banana Beppo's life!

MESSENGERS OF THE PRINCE OF PEACE

THE group of young women here pictured is this year's graduating class of the Baptist Missionary Training School at Jaro, Philippine Islands. Miss Dorothy Dowell, a New England District missionary, who sailed in July, 1920, and who is now in charge of the school, is in the center. The graduates of this school go out as Bible teachers and evangelists throughout the islands. They represent cultured womanhood, trained intelligence and Christian passion and devotion—all placed at the service of their people. One can hardly conceive the total results when through such native workers every person shall hear the evangel spoken in his own tongue.

Mrs. George W. Coleman

By MRS. ORRIN R. JUDD

The election of Mrs. George W. Coleman to the presidency of the Woman's American Baptist Home Mission Society pays tribute to a great leader known and beloved from coast to coast. In honoring her, the society is itself honored.

Mrs. Coleman's official connection with the work began thirty-five years ago, when, as a young woman, she was elected a member of the executive board of the then Woman's American Baptist Home Mission Society with headquarters in Boston. Her marked qualifications for leadership soon became apparent, and in 1890 she was elected president, continuing in office until the merger of the society with the sister society of the West, whose comes to her new task fully equipped and trained.

Within the last two decades, the recognition of interdenominational relations has led to the organization of various inter-board agencies. One of these, the Council of Women for Home Missions federated the women's home mission boards. As representing our own society, Mrs. Coleman became one of the founders, and was for nine years the honored president of the council, her counsels helping to shape the policies of this important body. She continues to serve on the executive committee and other committees relating the work of women to the general work through the Home Missions headquarters were in Chicago. This was effected in 1909. In the reorganization the name of the New England Society was retained, the headquarters were removed to Chicago, and Mrs. Coleman became first vice-president, serving in that capacity until her recent election to the presidency. In these official relations to the home mission fields, the travel involved to schools and mission stations as well as among the constituency served to familiarize her with the conditions and needs in every part of the country, so that she

Council and the Federal Council of the Churches. For years until her retirement this year, Mrs. Coleman was the director of the Women's Home Mission Institute at Chatauqua. Her name appears among those of the trustees of Gordon College and Spelman Seminary. She has been president also of the New England District of the Woman's American Baptist Home Missionary Society and of the Woman's Baptist Social Union of Boston. Her active participation in civic affairs is demonstrated by her election to a term as president of the largest woman's organization in Boston, the City Club, numbering five thousand members. With Mr. Coleman she is interested in the Ford Hall Forum, and their home life at Boston, and in the summer at Sagamore Beach, is a practical exemplification of their belief and teaching that the love of God to men is to be revealed to all through the lives of his servants.

Mrs. Coleman's church membership is with the Clarendon Street Church of Boston, where years ago her life came under the influence of that prince of preachers, Dr. A. J. Gordon, who nourished her spiritual life and love of the Word.

When the removal of the Society's headquarters from Chicago to New York necessitated the reorganization of the board of managers, Mrs. Coleman was recognized as the logical chairman and was so chosen by unanimous consent. Her skill as a parliamentarian and her accurate knowledge of every detail were the admiration of all her co-laborers, while her sympathy and genuine Christian courtesy won their love and revealed in the leader the true friend. Who can ever forget the beautiful readings from Ephe- sians and the illuminating comments with which our meetings of the year began, and the tender, definite prayers?

In Mrs. Coleman, the society has a great leader, one who studies continually that she may the better serve; whose sympathy includes the world of plant and animal life as an overflow from the love of God and man; whose self-control has strengthened her body so that it is even more responsive than in the days of youth; and who works hard and prays in faith believing.

As she enters upon the office at the beginning of the Women's Home Mission Jubilee period shall we not pledge her our most loyal support, and rally with her to the accomplishment of our great task, the bringing of Christ to every home in our country.

Fresh from the Field

Friends of Dr. J. S. Dickerson, for so many years connected with The Standard and now secretary of the board of trustees of the University of Chicago, will be saddened by the announcement of the death of his wife, on July 14 after an operation. Mrs. Dickerson before her marriage only last August was Mrs. Leontine Farrington Thompson of Portland, Maine. She was a woman of wonderful charm of person, mind and spirit, and in the brief period of her presence in Chicago had won for herself many friends particularly in the University circles.

Miss Edith Roe Mabie, daughter of Rev. and Mrs. Harry S. Mabie of Welton, W. Va., was married on July 11 to Harry A. Phillips. The ceremony was performed by the bride's father, assisted by Rev. A. D. Hilton, pastor of the First Church, Wheeling, where the wedding took place. The bride is a grand-daughter of Dr. Henry C. Mabie and a great-grand-daughter of Rev. Erastus Westcott, pioneer Baptist minister of Minnesota.

Rev. Benjamin Cox, of Memphis, Tenn., preached on July 24 at the Calvary Church, Denver, Colo., and is to preach on July 31 at the First Church, San Francisco and during August at the Central Church, Los Angeles.

Go Thou and Do Likewise

An Ohio pastor sends a check for ten subscriptions to THE BAPTIST and says, "This money is the investment (note that word!) of one of my deacons." The church is in a small town and has less than 200 members but its gifts for the past year for the New World Movement amounted to $8,537.95. The deacon is making a gift to the work of the denomination worth many times the actual amount of his investment.

Killam's Kollum

Now Worth a Million

When THE BAPTIST first made its appearance one of our Baptist laymen subscribed for the paper. He is now worth a million dollars. We do not want to leave any false impressions and hasten to say that he was worth a million dollars when he subscribed. THE BAPTIST does not guarantee to fit its subscribers to secure a million dollars. It does guarantee to furnish during the course of the year first-hand, up-to-the-minute information which will help the thousands of Christian men and women to use their money where it will count for most. It will help them to become rich in treasures in heaven. He that secureth a subscriber doeth a good work.

Good For North Dakota

The North Dakota Convention has for the past year sent a copy of its bulletin to every English-speaking Baptist family in the state as far as their names could be secured. Of a large mailing list only 175 paid subscriptions are reported and these come for the most part from the foreign-speaking churches. If all the states would follow a similar plan it would greatly stimulate the circulation of THE BAPTIST and Missions. We have approached many individuals in the interest of THE BAPTIST. "We have a Baptist paper," has been the prompt and proud reply of all too many. Inquiry has developed the fact that they had subscribed 25 cents for the state bulletin. No one regrets this use of the bulletins more than the good men who need them in their state work. North Dakota points to the wise course to follow.

Editor Comforts Editor

"Nothing of very great importance was ever allowed to live without some sort of an attack and no man ever accomplished very much without making an enemy. For that very reason it cannot be decided that because you have failed to meet the approval of some Baptist readers in your Killam's Kollum, you should discontinue it. I am the editor of a publication myself and it really does me good to get a kick now and then from some one or other. Then I know that I am being read by at least a few of the 10,000 who receive our sheet. . . . I believe that your "Kollum" is worth while. I have seen nothing which would detract from the worth of the publication. If you turn out a paper as stiff as a 'biled' shirt, as free from open discussions as the pope's prayer, and as strictly proper as an uncomfortable swallowtail coat, I do not believe you will make any greater progress toward that goal of 100,000 subscribers. Think it over. Don't cut out your "Kollum" too hastily." Clifton F. Bridges, Billings, Montana. Brother editor, to perform an operation on that Kollum would be near-murder. It would interfere with circulatory functions.

How I Feel about the New Confession of Faith

By A FOREIGN MISSIONARY

For three years or so I have been viewing the prospects of our denomination with no small degree of apprehension. It has seemed as if we were drifting—or being driven—towards a split, into a radical camp, and a reactionary camp. And I have been asking myself pretty seriously the question Daniel Webster asked when it was proposed to break up the Whig party, "Where shall I go?" When I read the articles of Dr. Riley, it looked as if I should not be allowed to train with any crowd in which he was a leader. I wasn't at all sure that I wanted to; but that isn't the point. With some convictions I hold and cannot discard, I should not be allowed to anyway. Or perhaps I should say, without some convictions that I don't hold and can't acquire. It looked as if, in the event of a split, I should have to go with the radicals, because that would be the only place where there was room for a fellow who couldn't say shibboleth. And even so, I was afraid they might have a snickersnee ready for a man who did not say shibboleth. But somehow, I did not feel that I should be quite at home in that crowd either. I love to sing "There is a fountain filled with blood!"

"E'er since by faith I saw the stream

Thy flowing wounds supply,

Redeeming love has been my theme,

And shall be till I die."

I could not be at home in a church where that hymn was tabu, or at best tolerated with a scornful smile. The reactionaries, when all was said and done, stood for much that I hold precious, that I hold to be of the essence of the gospel. But it seemed as if they were minded to force anyone who wanted to have fellowship with them to say much more—much that I could not honestly say. The radicals would allow liberty, but they would introduce one to an atmosphere that I at least should find pretty arid. "Where should I go?"

When the paper came, containing the confession of faith drawn up by the Conference of Fundamentals at Des Moines, my good wife started to read me the confession. I braced myself for the worst. She read the first article. "What's the matter with that?" she asked. "That's all right," I replied. She read the second article. "What's the matter with that?" "That's all right." She read the third, the fourth, the fifth, the sixth, asking the same question, and getting the same reply. She read the seventh. "What's the matter with that?" "That's all right." I heaved a sigh of relief. I could "stay in the procession, and call myself a Baptist." I know now where I can go. Like the old colored lady in the story, "I've done been where I've gwine to." I am going to stay right where I've been for so these many years, with the great body of Baptists, on the platform of that confession. I cut that confession out and pasted it into my Bible.

I rejoice in the new confession. It seems to me great, great in what it says, great in what it refrains from saying. It seems to me to contain all that is precious and essential in our faith. It gives me all the liberty I want. It seems like the up-to-date formulation of the eternal verities of the gospel that I have been looking for.

It was probably wise that the convention was not asked to adopt it; but I expect that it will be very widely adopted by churches and associations.

Extemporaneous Eloquence

Some Anniversary Illustrations

By R. R. COON

In attendance on a dozen or more of our national anniversaries I have heard some notable addresses by notable speakers—Armitage, Bright, S. F. Smith, Ashmore, Broadbudd and others of a generation departed. Some speeches not called for by the printed program memory easily recalls.

At the eleven-day meeting in Philadelphia in 1893, the centenary of Baptist foreign mission work, a large oil painting of William Carey was presented for sale, the proceeds to be missionary. The person in charge of this was having but moderate success. Dr. Russell H. Conwell leaped upon the platform and pointing to the portrait exclaimed, "See the face of the great missionary statesman and founder and Bible translator." Briefly reminding the audience of his mighty work he started a wave of enthusiasm, and the painting brought a royal price.

The anniversaries met in the Immanuel Church in Chicago in 1890. That was the time and that was the place where the initial meeting was held, looking to the national young people's movement. A speaker from St. Louis in his address had presented views that, to one listener, seemed to sympathize too strongly with southern convictions. A fiery New England orator took the platform as a challenging critic. In his remarks he said: "I happen to have a copy of the American Constitution in my pocket," and theatrically taking it out read from it what seemed to oppose the address just made. A manifest restlessness possessed the audience. As he retired Dr. G. C. Lorimer, pastor of the church, appeared presumably to make announcements. But what is he saying? Actually referring to the annoying incident that everyone wanted to forget. With rare adroitness he "pours oil on the troubled waters," and almost quotes the words of the bold critic: "I happen to have a copy of the American flag in my pocket," and waved aloft the miniature banner. The effect was electrical. In a few words and with consummate skill he spoke peace to a restless audience.

At the important educational session in the convention at Washington (I forget the year) the location of the big new university was under discussion. Dr. Hoyt and others from the East had made strong plausible pleas for an Eastern location, maybe Washington. The president of a leading seminary spoke in the same line. It looked like an Eastern location. At that moment the moderator recognized some one who wished to speak. He took the platform, and his first remark was: "I consider the arguments of Dr. — of no weight whatever." In a brief address with powerful arguments and telling facts he made a plea for the West that was convincing. It was Dr. G. W. Northrop, the theologian, the logician, the orator. His words turned back the tide of opinion; the university was located in Chicago.

Such exhibitions of eloquence brighten and enliven a sometimes tedious and formal program. They illustrate not only the beauty but the magic power of "words fitly spoken."

Impressions of the Convention

By ALVIN G. HAUSE

1. The spirit of the convention.

Atmospheric heat was not the only kind of heat felt at Des Moines. There was another kind of heat, the kind that springs from the heart, set aflame by deep-seated convictions and opinions. No, the spirit of the convention was not spiritual. The air was too full of electricity for that. The Fundamentalists were afraid the Liberals would "put something over on them," and the Liberals were afraid the Fundamentalists would "put something over on them." Especially was this true during the first few days of the convention.

As long as this kind of a spirit dominates our great gathering we cannot expect Pentecostal days to be ours. And this kind of a spirit will continue to dominate our conventions as long as the convention is unable to find a common standing ground. That is why to me the confession of faith was so timely and needful. A denomination that cannot tell the world what it really believes is like a man who really believes nothing. He can never win converts to his way of thinking if he is not real sure what he thinks himself. The spiritual atmosphere was utterly lacking in the convention.

2. Reports and addresses.

The report of the Board of Promotion was great. The wonder of it all to me is that it was so exceedingly fine when you take into consideration that almost one half of our churches has not co-operated in the drive. The question is: What could we do if all of our churches would get behind the program?

The schools committee report was cheering. All the reports were encouraging and victory reports. But why read the long printed reports when we have them in our hands and can examine them at our leisure?

Some of the addresses were exceptionally fine. Some were not. Most of the speakers lacked fire and enthusiasm. Many read their addresses, which to the listener is poor eloquence. Most of the speakers did not consider the others on the program but took all the time they wanted without being halted by the president of the convention. Let's get a "stop-watch" next time.

3. A greater Baptist Consciousness.

The feeling is growing among us that a person can hardly continue to call himself a Baptist and refute all that Baptists have ever held dear to their hearts. If we are really Unitarians at heart, let us be honest with ourselves and the Christian world and say so. But the host of Baptists do not believe we will do this. Rather, do they believe that a Unitarian should go where he belongs and not try to drag the denomination with him as he goes.

The Baptist conscience has awakened. Watch it grow and grow! And it will be a happy day for us when it puts things "put." Then we will get down to business for the King.

Weep for a Real Thing, Brother

THE editor of the Watchman-Examiner threatens to weep. This determination we approve. Only let him weep for a real thing and not for the fake issue which he has raised in his leading editorial of the issue of July 21.

Deliberate Misrepresentation

Only with difficulty do we express ourselves temperately with regard to this particular editorial. What has become of the old newspaper ethics which had for one of its commandments that a man should never wilfully misrepresent a contemporary? How can any paper hope to build up a substantial constituency by such misrepresentation and appeals to prejudice? We hardly understand Dr. Law's previous expressions of goodwill towards the editors of THE BAPTIST in view of this studied attempt to keep alive a feeling of resentment against THE BAPTIST. For this is not a case where a man has spoken in ignorance of the facts. What was written was written with the facts staring the writer in the face. He could not possibly have seen the sub-title which he makes the subject of his lugubrious, sarcastic article without having seen also the sentence which immediately followed.

The "Sad News"

The editorial on which we comment is entitled, "Sad News for Many of Us." Its satire and underlying bitterness will become apparent to anybody who will take the trouble to read it. It seizes upon a sub-title of an editorial in THE BAPTIST of July 9, which read "Fundamentalism is Dead," confesses that the news is a shock and goes on to say that "less than a month ago we saw between a thousand and fifteen hundred of those fundamentalists in a hall out in Des Moines. . . . Without collusion . . . they stood together . . . and overwhelmingly dominated the convention. They voted enthusiastically to commend the Home Mission Society for its action in receiving a large gift to which certain doctrinal conditions were attached because those conditions were in perfect harmony with the fundamentals in which they believe. Two days later those same fundamentalists, with another certain and overwhelming victory for fundamentalism in sight, being men of peace and goodwill not desiring to fight over the same ground again, suggested the wisdom of having our seven boards study the whole matter of gifts with doctrinal conditions. . . . And now actually before some of these enthusiastic fundamentalists got home, the movement which they considered so prophetic of good things to come, collapsed and went out of existence. . . . Meanwhile all the poor misguided Baptists who have been interested in what they thought were fundamentals, while feeling sad at THE BAPTIST's announcement, will be glad that we have a paper among us that can so wonderfully interpret the signs of the times."

Is This Group Government?

First a comment on the above announcement that these Fundamentalists suggested referring the matter of gifts with doctrinal conditions to the seven boards. Mr. Brock presented the resolution. Did he do this at the bidding of some group? If so, what group? Prof. F. L. Anderson seconded it. Was this in accord with some secret understanding between groups? Who were mixed up in this bit of politics in the great convention? Certainly that great group of 1200 men was not convened to act on the matter. Rev. Joshua Gravett of Denver introduced another resolution. Isn't he a fundamentalist? Hadn't he been consulted? How did that awkward situation happen? Once upon a time we imagined that we had been delivered from the dominance of groups and had become a great democratic assembly. Are the groups again practicing upon us? Editor Laws seems to know all about it; is he democrat enough to let the people know and rule?

What We Said

And now as to the editorial in THE BAPTIST. Will those of you who have saved the number for July 9 open the magazine to page 717 and read. The headline, we admit, is startling. But what is this sentence which immediately follows? "Fundamentalism (using the term in its settled, technical sense, as designating an interdenominational movement to disseminate a certain group of theological ideas and to force a division in the churches along the line of those ideas) was definitely rejected." Isn't that true? Notice the word "interdenominational." Did the Conference on Fundamentals at Des Moines stand for the same things and announce the same things as the world conference at Denver which immediately preceded? Our editorial says: "Conclusions were embodied in a confession of faith. That confession is distinctly a Baptist document, essentially similar to dozens of other statements that have been given to the public by Baptist groups in the last two or three years. And it is distinctly not a Fundamentalist creed. One scans it in vain for the familiar Fundamentalist affirmations, negations and exactions. Concerning verbal inspiration and the literal method of interpretation of the Scriptures, the method of creation, the virgin birth of Jesus, the substitutionary theory of the atonement, the existence of a personal devil, the premillennial return of Christ, and eternal conscious punishment, it is silent. Not only does it not embody the Fundamentalist objection to a 'social Gospel' but it pronounces the social implications and fruits of the gospel 'inevitable.' And finally when it definitely rejects 'the adoption of a creed to which allegiance is demanded,' as being 'contrary to our historic Baptist principles and repugnant to our deepest spiritual instincts,' it severs the last bond between the Fundamentalist movement and even that group of Baptists which has been supposed to sympathize."

Conservatives or Fundamentalists

Now this is perfectly clear. It says nothing about the conservatives in our own denomination. What it does say is that those present at the pre-conference at Des Moines dissociated themselves by their own deliberate action from certain positions taken by the interdenominational body known as "Fundamentalists," and in the same way disavowed the extreme program of that body. Does the editor of the Watchman-Examiner mean that this is not so? Does he mean that the leaders of the "Conference on Baptist Fundamentals" hold the same program as the interdenominational body? Does he intimate that they are withholding a part of the program and only putting it forward step by step? If so will he not tell the people what is next on the program? Does he mean that the ultimate purpose is to capture the Baptist denomination for the extreme views and program of this interdenominational body? Wouldn't it be fair and democratic to say so at once? We had supposed that we were all Baptists; we want to know if we are now in process of becoming something else.

We may add further that this confusion in the meaning of the word "Fundamentalist" fully justifies the "Word and Way," which is certainly not a radical organ, but which is opposed to what it thinks the extreme program of the interdenominational group, in calling upon the ultra-conservative brethren of the North to put away this designation and to take for themselves some name which will not be subject to such confusion. What is the matter with the good old name of "Baptist"?

We Stand for All Baptists

People who read THE BAPTIST from week to week without prejudice know perfectly well that it stands first and foremost for the Baptist faith and the Baptist program. It endeavors to interpret fairly from week to week happenings within the Baptist denomination. It believes and has always believed that groups of the brethren have a perfect right to assemble anywhere at any time to discuss matters which may be of concern to them and that they have a right to present their findings at our national meetings. If they believe that there are things in the denominational life which are wrong, they have a duty to protest, as they have also a duty of co-operation when the body makes its findings and lays out courses of action. This paper has urged that a confession of faith might be a good thing for our churches; it rejoiced that the confession adopted by the pre-conference at Des Moines was so thoroughly in accord with Baptist history and beliefs, while at the same time it believes that such a confession should be framed by a known representative committee and not by one secretly named and should be open to discussion and not forced upon a body without opportunity for amendment. If there are men in our ranks who are untrue to the gospel as our churches commonly understand it, we deprecate the fact as much as anybody. And this attempt of the Watchman-Examiner to make it appear that we had been attacking a splendid body of men and women in the denomination is a wicked thing because it is so flagrantly contrary to the facts. If the editor must weep, let him weep for this unbrotherly attack.

THE BAPTIST is the organ of the churches of the Northern convention. It is trying to represent them all. What else ought it to do so long as churches are in fellowship with their associations, state conventions and the Northern Baptist Convention. Dr. Laws has said that the Watchman-Examiner is his personal pulpit, that it does not pretend to represent all the churches but that it is the organ of an influential theological group. We could not take a position like that, even if we wished to do so. We must, to the best of our ability, represent fairly all the churches. Perhaps the task is an impossible one. But at any rate it is our task.

We Back the Entire Program

THE BAPTIST stands for the entire program of the convention and to the best of its ability is going to keep on promoting that program. The denomination, in its representative body, has deliberately framed this program. Who are we that we should say that we will back one part of it and not back another? The body that made the program can change it in any way it wishes and when the action is taken THE BAPTIST will follow the expressed will of the people. But to show discrimination as between parts of the program before such action would be unpardonable presumption on our part.

We Want Baptist Progress

THE BAPTIST believes that the great body of our churches are sound in their faith and are doing their best to do the Lord's work where they are. And it shares their feeling of resentment at any group, whether called ultra-conservative or modernist, which shows radical departure from the commonly accepted faiths and which keeps the whole body in turmoil. The paper will give all groups a fair hearing, knowing that matters of belief are of importance. But it also will do its best to keep forwarding the practical matters of church life, knowing that for the average church member to possess the mind which is in Christ and to be doing the Lord's work day by day is the greater thing. If there are differences of opinion, for pity's sake, let's air them all, let's discuss them all and let us reach conclusions. And when a thing is settled, let it stay settled, at least for twenty-four hours. The world, the flesh and the devil will overwhelm our churches if we keep on fighting among ourselves and neglect the main thing for which our Lord has called us.

And now a word in conclusion. Towards Dr. Laws we have a warm feeling of Christian love. We have always felt that the Watchman-Examiner would not stoop to the unethical practices which we have occasionally observed in some other religious papers. And hence we have risen in our righteous indignation to say these few things. We trust that they will be received as the chastening, not perhaps of the Lord, but at least of Christian brothers who are anxious that the kingdom of Jesus Christ shall come and his will be done on earth as it is in heaven and who deprecate therefore any utterances which are untrue to fact and mischievous in their tendency.

Not Retroactive

DESPITE explanations there are yet some who do not seem to have a clear understanding of what was actually done at Des Moines in regard to gifts with creedal conditions. The following are the facts:

The resolution of Judge Freeman was adopted by a substantial majority at an afternoon meeting of the Home Mission Society. This resolution approved the action of the board in accepting the gift of $1,750,000 from an unnamed donor and thanked the latter for the gift. The action taken at this time was not affected by the subsequent action of the convention. At the present moment the gift in question stands approved and the incident is closed.

The later resolution offered by Mr. Brock, by which the whole matter of gifts to which doctrinal conditions are attached was referred to a special committee, was not retroactive. It looks towards the future. The boards of the various societies constitute a committee which is to consider the whole question and report to the next convention, the thought being that in so important a matter as this, there should be no hasty action but rather the most careful consideration, first by a representative committee and then by the convention as a whole, in the hope that a common policy for all the societies and boards can be determined upon. Whatever has been true in the past Baptists interests will best be served if the denomination can come to a definite decision on this matter.

There are some people who talk as if the doctrinal conditions attached to this particular gift were in question. So far as we know this is not the case anywhere. The discussion of the year has to do with the general policy.

Right, of Course

THE editors are in receipt of a letter from Mrs. M. Grant Edmands which calls attention to certain things which were not said in a recent editorial. We shall allow her to say them for us, merely remarking that we had in mind, when we wrote, such executive positions as that to which Mrs. Montgomery has been elected. The letter reads:

"In an editorial in the issue of July 9, entitled, 'A Woman Leads the Baptists,' you say, 'But when the application was made to our general denominational organizations the word has been, Men only. Naturally women will now feel that an honor has been done them in this election.'

"The statement of fact which I wish to call to your attention is as follows: In June, 1914, when the Northern Baptist Convention met in Boston, the nominating committee brought in a recommendation in substance like this, 'Believing the time has come when our women, who have shown such ability in their mission work, should be given a part in the administration of our denominational affairs, we present a woman's name as a member of the executive committee of the convention, and further recommend that other women be added from time to time.' The recommendation was adopted, and I was elected as the first woman member of the executive committee. Others were added later, and last year at Buffalo I was honored, after six years' service on the executive committee, by being elected a vice-president of the convention. In addition to this, Mrs. MacLeish and myself have represented the executive committee on the General Board of Promotion for two years. I am sure you will be glad to recognize the fact that the election of Mrs. Montgomery to the presidency of the convention was not a radical step but the logical outcome of the policy adopted seven years ago."

We may add that, owing to the illness of Pres. Tustin, Mrs. Edmands was called upon to preside over the later sessions of the convention at Des Moines, being the first woman to have had this honor, and performed the duties of her office with marked wisdom and skill.

Quit Cursing and Co-operate

CURRENT public complaint runs about in this fashion: "Millions are unemployed, there is no market for our goods, our railroads are running into bankruptcy, taxes are outrageous, farmers are in distress, houses are scarce, rents have risen beyond all reason, schools are closing for lack of funds; something is terribly wrong—what shall we do?"

There is nothing effective to be done.

And the reason we can do nothing to remedy such conditions is that we do not intend to do anything. We are waiting for private profiteers to find a way to make money by doing something for us.

Whenever we make up our minds that people are more important than profits the remedy for such conditions will be found lying right at hand and easy to put into practice. Otherwise we may expect to go on playing Micawber while the whole world drifts in the direction of deeper disaster.

One undying hope remains that a glimmer of common sense may yet brighten the landscape. When the people discover that their only salvation lies in their own co-operative effort and that hanging to the coat-tails of private profiteers is the very thing that brought civilization into its present muddle, they will know what to do and how to do it.

But the melancholy fact must be recognized that the American people have not yet learned to co-operate for high common ends. Till they learn that lesson, we must simply wait and permit the use of palliatives that aggravate the various distempers.

Let the People Know

PRESIDENT MULLINS, in an address to the constituency of the Southern Baptist Convention, presents a clear confirmation of the opinion expressed recently by THE BAPTIST that committees of the Northern Baptist Convention having important matters to report to that body ought to give advance publicity to those reports through the papers. He suggests for the Southern Convention, "that all such reports be given to the denominational press at least two or three weeks in advance of the meeting of the convention," adding, "I am fully persuaded that such a method would inevitably result in general discussion of proposed measures in the convention itself, and that is what we need."

The Kingship of Christ—Christ and the Family

In the home religious ideals and Christian faith are first and chiefly to be passed along to future generations. Shall the family say, "Come in, Lord Jesus."?

By E. B. POLLARD

AMONG the most beautiful and suggestive of the narratives of Jesus' life are those that tell of his birth, his infancy and childhood. The Lord of life came to earth a member of a family; and while he was too busy at making many homes happy to set up a home of his own, he honored home life by his presence and taught men to exalt the family relations. He was obedient to his parents and loyally fulfilled his duties in the home at Nazareth as son and elder brother. He honored motherhood and loved the children, whom he welcomed and blessed. He set himself squarely against those sins that destroy the family and corrupt the home; teaching that marriage is of divine appointment; that husband and wife become one in life and purpose; that unchastity is the one capital offense against the family relation. His teachings concerning love and brotherhood, and all the pervasive character of his Kingdom, place him first as friend of the home, and give him right to reign in this central and sacred realm, the family.

1. The Place of the Family

The primary purpose of Christianity is to culture personalities and to build a society in accordance with the will of God as revealed in Jesus Christ. In both features of his dual aim, the family is strategic. It is doubtless the very oldest of the social units. Promiscuity, guessed by some evolutionists to have been older than the family, is unproved. It does not prevail even among all the lower animals; and where it does exist, to determine how far the artificial limitations due to their domestication by man have been its cause, would be difficult. It is hardly probable that the earliest human pairs were behind the birds and the beasts in building some sort of nest or selecting a cave for the co-operative rearing of their offspring.

But the family has not been and cannot be, a static institution. It has passed through many stages—changes due to social, industrial, political and religious influences. It is so vitally related to all other social institutions, that of necessity it is profoundly modified by them, as indeed they are profoundly influenced by it. There are permanent as well as transient elements in family forms. Mother right may have preceded father rule. The patriarchal family among Semites in the days of Abraham, varied widely from the Roman family of the days of Caesar, and both from the European family of the Middle Ages. The Mohammedan family is quite unlike the Christian household. But however varied may be the forms of family life, social experience through mileniums has demonstrated beyond doubt the worth of the family to the individual and the social well-being. It is a biological and a sociological necessity. It is "the structural cell of the social organism." It is the primary, the fundamental social unit. It is here life begins, ideals are imbedded, character built. Here body, mind and soul have their first fashioning. Surely, it is of central consequence whether or not Christ be regnant in so basal an institution.

The physical elements which condition a healthy home life are of vital concern. A true king is worthy of a palace. To invite the Christ to abide in homes whose physical forms stifle or corrupt the soul, is not to honor but to affront him. That his mind be regnant in the domain of the family, it is first demanded that the natural laws which shape and govern human life be heeded. These are mainly biological and economic. Jesus cannot be truly Lord of the family in which physical laws are ignored. Heredity and environment are here most vital.

2. The Physical Basis

The science of biology has made some important contributions to human welfare. Only life begets life, and likes beget likes. If the family is to be an efficient agency for personal and social salvation, it must itself be sound. The young science of Eugenics has not spoken its final word; but some things are made sufficiently clear. If care in the breeding of beasts be important, who will declare that the proper mating of men and women is of no concern? The child has a right to be well born, and not "damned into the world" by the awful handicap of an unsound heredity. The first gift of grace in the salvation of any life, is that it be permitted to come of a clean parental stock. There must therefore be the marriage of the fit, and not of the unfit. The sense of parental obligation for the bearing and rearing of strong, healthy children; personal love and care, social purity, the single standard of sex morality, rational training in sex hygiene, will do much to render the family life wholesome and strong. It were foolish to claim that selective breeding alone will save the race, or that eugenic legislation or even careful education in sex morality, will solve all the racial and domestic problems; but it may be affirmed that family life cannot be morally or religiously satisfactory unless it be biologically sound.

No less important to the Christian welfare of the family are rightful economic and industrial conditions. The family is the quick spot in the social body. It is here that bad industrial conditions are first and most keenly felt. The basic problems in economics are home problems. The basis must be sound or no proper superstructure can be reared. An adequate family life cannot be maintained apart from a standard of living which affords opportunity for a certain freedom of spirit, a goodly margin beyond the pinching anxiety of the bread line. Industry was born in the home; and now that the invention of machinery and the rise of the era of capitalism have produced the factory system, taking all the great industries out of the home, family life is none the less vitally concerned in the industrial conditions under which men and women must labor as they follow their work into the factory. It goes without saying that there can be no sound family life without an adequate wage. It is doubtful whether any industry has the right to exist if it be unable to pay those who work in it a living compensation. No industrial enterprise is so sacred as to have the right to debase men and women or destroy the family. Economic conditions must not be such as to cause marriage to be avoided or unduly postponed. Men and women should have their sacred right to set up homes and rear children. They should not be compelled to put off marriage to a period when it is difficult for the warmth of natural love to pervade, when the capacity for adaptation and growth into one another's life is no longer easy. The forcing of large numbers of women and children into the factory because of small wages, is not only dysgenic and highly hurtful to the family life, but tends still further to depress the wages of men. The absence of the mother from the home increases juvenile delinquency and often unfits the woman to be the bearer and trainer of healthy children.

Let the spirit of Christ once become dominant, and society will see that conditions under which men perform their daily task shall not dwarf and destroy; shall not crush out or depress the nobler human impulses; but that family life shall be stabilized by comfortable housing, reasonable hours of labor, proper opportunities for recreation and self-improvement; that the family solidarity shall not be destroyed either by the hard hand of necessity or the subtle allurements of unescapable, vice-breeding influences. It is idle to talk of a Christlike home where there is no margin of resource for the higher things; and where property interests blind the eye to human welfare and race progress.

These biological and economic considerations may be looked upon as purely physical and material, and so as touching only the surface of the spiritual welfare of the family. But life is a unity, and its total good must be conditioned upon all its factors. Rare is it that a healthy kernel can be found in a mildewed and diseased shell. If the human body may be fairly called a "temple of the Holy Spirit," then the physical conditions and environment of the family life may make a hovel or construct a palace, in which the Christ is asked to take up his abode.

3. Moral and Spiritual Influences

Turning to those influences that are more directly spiritual, we may affirm that biological and economic laws alone will not save the family. Men are more than animals and can never be adequately judged by merely physical laws of social progress. Human beings may come into the world perfect specimens of animal life; may have ideal economic conditions to assist their advancement, and yet, Christ may not be regnant in heart or by hearthstone. Consider, therefore, some of the moral and spiritual elements that must be present if the home be made Christian.

It is in the family first that the social experiences of the race—those hard lessons wrung from failure, wrong and loss—are passed along to each succeeding generation. The great body of what we call morals, comes not fresh with each new conscience; but has been built up, acquired through experience, and is transmitted from father to son, from generation to generation. It is in the family first that the child gets his earliest lessons in the need of obedience to law, without which he can become no worthy member of society, but will grow a soul that is self-centred, anti-social, anarchic. Here he may learn to respect the rights of others, the principles of justice and self-control. By adjusting his life to that of parents and to brothers and sisters, he comes to understand the significance of authority, the demand for reciprocity and the necessity of co-operation. In other words, it is in the home that one learns to become a fit member of society. Here the basal virtue of loyalty, without which no worthy character can be developed, is earliest imbibed. If the family life be as it should, the rights of personality will be sacredly guarded; not overridden by imperious parenthood nor in any respect encroached upon by the strong. Self-expression is as imperative as is self-restraint. Every soul has the right to "say its say" and to attain its highest reach of character and power.

Whether or not the modern family is functioning religiously in a positive and vital way, is often doubted. The Romans called the hearthstone the focus. The home was the place where was kept burning the fire that was to light the sacrifices to the gods. It were sacrilege for the altar fires to go out. The primitive deities were household gods. In religion the hearthstone is still focal.

The organic character of the family, its solidarity, has not been sufficiently stressed in some religious circles. Jesus rediscovered the individual, and his careful followers have zealously guarded all infringements upon the sacred rights of every single soul lest the individual again lose his precious birthright. And yet there is another, a complementary fact, that must not be overlooked. The individual is never actually isolated from relationships. He is a social being, having entered the world as member of a group. The family is an organism, not simply an aggregation of individual units gathered by consent under one roof. The "social contract" theory of the state, the formation of churches "by covenant", have never been wholly satisfactory, for church and state are more than voluntary organizations. Even more is the spiritual freedom of the child by rejection of the proxy conception of religion, sponsorship and the numerous false implications of infant baptism. It cannot be denied that there is an inescapable unity of the family life which may work, and does work powerfully in every home. It is the business of parents to educate their children religiously; and as a matter of fact that education in some sort, goes on, whether the parent is conscious of it or not. The live hand of example is ever laid upon the head of the child, ordaining him to a life of religion or of irreligion. The subtle power of companionship is atmospheric and generally determinative in its consequences. As the body of the infant has taken shape, organic with its mother, so the family is the second matrix in which young life takes its predestined form.

It is clear, therefore, that there is a certain religious solidarity of the family which is not only inevitable but should be definitely aimed at. The "unequally yoked" the Apostle Paul inveighs against, and those looking toward the establishment of a family may still do well to hear him. Certainly there is no virtue in allowing the children to drift religiously, till they reach "the age of accountability", when they may "decide for themselves." This mock-pious attitude is not in the interest of the child's religious freedom, but may foreshadow its spiritual bondage. Parents cannot begin too early to teach the child the basal principles of religion, the elemental teachings of Jesus. To these he has undisputed moral right. The home thus breathing the very atmosphere of Christliness will become quite securely united in Christ Jesus. Religious solidarity will be attained, not by compromise with conscience nor by an over-riding of the soul's freedom, but by the growth that is due to natural processes, educative and vital.

4. Disruptive Forces

There are many influences, however, that are working to break down the family solidarity, and so to destroy its religious functioning and efficiency. Among the changes that have had its effect may be noted the breaking up of the home industries, in which all the members once had a place, and the substitution of the factory system which called the various members of the household out in different directions; the consequent fact that families no longer eat together and talk together and pray together as once was their opportunity, by which there was a passing over of ideals from age to youth; the growing freedom of womanhood, the enlarged opportunities in modern communities for outside friendships among young people; community recreation and amusements, both commercialized and uncommercialized, bidding for the evenings of boys and girls as well as of their parents; the growth of the apartment and the tenement, making family life less real, less positive and colorful; the progress toward suburban residence, with its distance from the "church home" on the one hand, and the proximity of many different churches in the older communities, on the other, whereby varied personal choice or casual whim may divide the family in respect to church affiliation; all these things coupled with the mad rush of a feverish age which allows little time for the family to get together in serious concerns, have gone far in breaking down the family unity in matters spiritual. Many of these changes are inevitable, and some have their unquestioned good; but it behooves the family to give itself for the more difficult task these conditions impose, and find a way by which its spiritual integrity may be maintained in the face of every adverse influence. For it must still be in the home that religious ideals and Christian faith are first and chiefly to be passed along to future generations.

5. Promoting Christian Ideals

Consider some of the more vital of these ideals. It is in the bosom of the family the child first learns reverence, without which there can be no sound basis for religious character. The newcomer into the world brings with him a capacity for religion which needs only the proper stimulus to draw out that consciousness of God which is the peculiar treasure of the creature made in the divine likeness. It is not difficult for the little child to see God everywhere, and to have fascinating fellowship with the heaven that lies all about him in his infancy. The open-eyed wonder, the sense of mystery and surprise, the awe and child-like admiration, leading to reverence and incipient worship—all this is religion in the making, the parents' first chance to lay well the foundations of a truly religious life. But we live in an irreverent age. Knowing and doing are more coveted than worshipping. Knowledge is power and deeds are imperative; but no great character is won apart from reverence. Men need the three galleries of Wilhelm Meister, reverence for those above us, for things around us, and even for things beneath us; and the family is the first schoolhouse of reverence, the mother's knee the first altar.

So too, it is there that the faith

faculty is first brought into exercise. The little child finds it easy to believe. The world is full of miracles but they give him no difficulty. The simple trust of the child heart, as it yields itself to the guidance of father and mother, its teachable spirit and its hero worship—these are the raw materials on which the life of faith may be reared; and these are the Christian parents' opportunities. The family too, is love's kindergarten, and love is central in the Christian life. Here one may first know the meaning of fatherhood, of sonship and of brotherhood, and so get one's earliest lessons in what the Master was pleased to call "the greatest commandment of all—wholehearted love for God the Father, and the love of the brother as one's self. The truly Christian home in this way becomes the best earthly representative and prophecy of heaven, home of the blessed. It is in the life of the family that the first hard lessons in unselfishness, in mutual sacrifice and service, are set up and mastered. These are fundamentally religious lessons that can be learned nowhere else so well.

But with all this primacy in the culture of the religious life, the modern family finds itself hard pressed and spiritually impoverished. The constant tendency is for the family to yield its sacred obligations to other institutions and agencies. Just as the modern industrial order has absorbed home industries, so the state and the school have taken over the mental and practical education of the children; the community furnishes the recreation and amusement, the church gives the religious instruction, and the family—well, is in some danger of losing consciousness of any high mission. Only when it can be clearly discerned that government, school, church, community are not substitutes for but supplements to family effort, will the home find its primary place in the culturing of child life and the Christianizing of the world order.

The family must therefore zealously guard its hallowed trust and resist all encroachments upon its sacred prerogatives. Social forces that would weaken home life must be overcome or redirected. All the causes that break up homes must themselves be destroyed. Cold self-seeking, the flames of lust and of intemperance, all the fruitful causes of divorce and the neglect of and sins against childhood must be banished, if Christ is to reign in the home realm. This can be accomplished by making the family a yet more positive force in Christian culture. It must re-capture its rightful proportion of the recreational life so rapidly running into commercialized channels. Companionship between parents and children must be more directly established and maintained. The home must re-conquer much of its lost ground—lost to the school and the church, and thus both church and school made stronger; because church and school can receive only the raw materials furnished by the family. As Mr. George Wharton Pepper declares in his Yale Lectures, "A Voice from the Crowd", "Indifference to religious education in the home and its absence from multitudes of schools, usually results in furnishing the preacher a congregation uninstructed in the fundamentals of religion" (p. 69). The family altar must be set up, not in the same ancient form, but in some form. God must be a very real Presence, and his Name revered not only in the closet but in the drawing room, about the table and around the evening lamp. God's minutes should be very precious moments, and God's Book hold place of honor and guidance.

6. The Rule of Christ

But we are living in a new age, says the critic; an age of freedom and democracy. Old methods cannot be made vital. True enough. The family must feel the force of progress; yea, must be in the forefront of the progressive influences. The family cannot but follow the trend of all social advancement. Autocracy in the home must yield to democracy in democracy's day. But this may be made a gain and not a loss. The parent-autocrat becomes a parent-companion and friend. The variety of modern life furnishes fruitful opportunity for the substitution of wholesome comradeship for dictatorial authority. Jesus Christ may rule all the more beautifully in a home which is a democracy of equals, where affection rules, and not force; where the principles of friendship are the laws that control, and the accents of love are more powerful than the accident of birth. As Todd has pointed out, it was in an autocracy that wife and child are both neuter (Das Weib und das Kind). The rising democracy may change family forms and methods, but the family is too firmly established in human experience to be allowed to break down by any social changes however great. The onslaught of certain modern movements that would nationize the women and socialize the children, let us kindly trust, can never shake the sure place won by the family in the long mil-leniums of human experiment, the place ordained it by God himself. "A democratic community still expects and needs that family life shall be the normal portion of the great majority of its citizens, shall produce well born, well educated, well disciplined children, shall promote close friendships and discriminating confidences, and shall yield the virtues of obedience, courtesy, helpfulness, co-operation, tolerance, and hospitality, to say nothing of those finer, less tangible, aesthetic values which sound home life should create." (Arthur J. Todd, "Democracy and the Family"; p. 97).

The inevitable trend of the social order must be made to minister to a stronger, surer family life. Nature will take care of progress if men can but obey her laws; which is to say, God leads safely over the untried paths if we boldly trust him and obey his commandments. We may be well assured that whatever destroys or weakens the family is bad for society and dishonoring to Christ. It behooves those who believe in the abiding value of goodness, to give their best endeavor to strengthen and sweeten this divine, basic, social institution—this "one enduring institution" (Patten)— out of which all others have doubtless grown and upon whose health all others must depend; the foster-ground for all the finer ideals and richer loyalties, the agency through which all the best human experiences and heritancies are conserved and transmitted.

In such a realm as this the Christ spirit must be regnant, his Name honored in word and deed if the social order is to abide. The German artist's simple picture of the Master visitant, welcomed to the lowly peasant's board, with hearty "Come in Lord Jesus," may well be writ large over the door of every home.

The Minister in Reconstruction Days

An address delivered before the Ministers' Conference of the Northern Baptist Convention, June 21, 1921

BY AMBROSE W. BAILEY

THERE have been four great epochs in the world's life. We are entering upon the fifth. Each of these decisive epochs—like the creative days of Genesis—began with an evening but ended with a morning. The fifth epoch also has begun with an evening so black that it recalls the words of Amos—"The day of the Lord, is it? The day of the Lord is a day of deep darkness and not light, yea very dark and no brightness in it."

The first epoch was characterized by the great migration, when the white man started on his long western march of conquest from the central plateau of Asia. When the stream came to the Himalayas it divided, half traveling southward and becoming the source of the people of India, half continuing westward and becoming the source of the European and the American. In that decisive epoch which began in a twilight of disintegration it was determined that the white race was to rule the world.

Jesus to Rule Hearts

The second decisive epoch began with the fall of the Roman republic. "And it came to pass in those days that there went out a decree from Caesar Augustus that all the world should be taxed. And all went to be taxed, everyone to his own city. And Joseph also went up from Galilee to be taxed with Mary his espoused wife being great with child. And she brought forth her first-born son and laid him in a manger. And lo the angel of the Lord came upon them and the glory of the Lord shone round about them. And the angel said, Unto you is born this day in the City of David a Savior who is Christ, the Lord." The issue of that epoch was that Jesus Christ and his gospel were to rule the hearts of men.

America to Rule World

The birthday of the third great epoch may be harder to date on the calendar, but its outlines are no less clear and its issue no less decisive. Begin it as you please, with Mohamed or with the Crusades, or with the Papal Schism, or with the fall of Constantinople. The result is the same—the geographical discovery of America by Columbus, the intellectual discovery of the humanities by the Greek scholars, and the religious rediscovery of salvation through faith by Martin Luther. The issue of that epoch was that education and intellectuality, and all the ideals that we associate with America at her best, were to rule the world.

The fourth great epoch began with the darkness of the French Revolution and the Napoleonic wars. But when the darkness passed and the day dawned it had been determined that liberty was to be the dominant force of the world. The white race, Christianity, education, and liberty were to be the great world forces born from the womb of destruction.

The fifth great epoch may be dated from August 1, 1914. It too began in a night of destruction. The presiding genius of those days was Apollyon, the destroyer. Millions of human lives were lost, millions more were maimed, billions of wealth were destroyed, institutions and treasures of art which it had taken centuries to produce were annihilated, kingdoms and states vanished over night, and worst of all spiritual values disappeared. Europe was reduced to a petty quarreling neighborhood where hatred and division threatened the future well being of the world.

A New World Coming

The world, as we knew it, has disintegrated and a new world must be reconstructed politically, economically, and I make bold to say religiously. That day of reconstruction, we believe, has begun. That is what the optimistic program maker meant, I opine, by the assigned subject, "in these reconstruction days." Reconstruction is a bigger word than either normalcy, or socialism, or individual democracy. It is into a high moment like this that the minister of Jesus Christ is born. He comes into an evolving world. In a sense in which he has never believed it possible the minister hears it declared "by Him that sitteth on the throne—the former things are passed away—behold I make all things new." (Rev. 21:4-5.) In these days what place is the minister to occupy?

I. I suggest that his place will be his ancient place, his recognized place, his assigned place, like that of the suffering servant of Jehovah of sacrificial service. His Master has said "The servant is not greater than his Lord. If they have called the master of the house Beelzebub, much more they of his household."

This is not the first time that the world has gone to pieces and needed rebuilding. Only a blind man or an egotist imagines that this moment is different or worse than some which have preceded it, or more fraught with destiny. Are different or greater qualities needed than those of the men of God who were God's representatives in all ages? The roll is a long one.

Statesmen of Reconstruction

Moses lived in a day of disintegration and reconstruction. Do we need greater statesmanship, moral insight, or power of leadership than he? Is our problem more difficult than his? Will our opposers be more influential? Is privilege more entrenched in public life than in those days when lonely Elijah had his controversy with the priests of Baal on Mt. Carmel? His days were days of reconstruction, and he the reconstructor, though few could see it then.

Ezekiel, and Haggai, and Zachariah, and Ezra, and Nehemiah, were all men of the days of reconstruction following the Exile. To Ezekiel was given the vision to see the social order of his day as a moral graveyard, a valley of dry and lifeless bones. Yet to him was also given the faith to see the Spirit of God bringing about a reconstruction. Do we need a different or more optimistic faith than that?

Haggai and Zechariah met the issue with action; and Nehemiah saw "the foundations destroyed" but instead of sitting down to say, "What can the righteous do?" he began to build the foundations anew.

Who can doubt that the first three centuries and a quarter of the Christian era were days of reconstruction? Rome was crumbling while the cross was rising. Do we need greater courage than the martyrs who died in Nero's garden? It was in the darkest moment of all this that John wrote from Patmos "I saw a new heaven and a new earth, for the first heaven and the first earth were passed away."

The student of Christian history very well knows that the book of Hebrews was written at a moment when the Temple was being torn down, stone from stone. That too was a day of destruction and reconstruction. It was a day of reconstruction only in the sense that those who had the vision and courage and faith to interpret the meaning of history might make it so. The list of names in the eleventh chapter is more than a series of rhetorical periods to be intoned to a drowsy congregation on a spring Sabbath morning. History is but a long list of crises when values were leveled and the builder started anew.

Then came the day when Goth and Vandal and Hun crossed the Alps and raided the civilization of Rome. Yet in that day two men of God met the issue. Augustine wrote "The City of God" and showed how out from destruction God was raising his eternal city. And Boniface, realizing that the only hope of the world was to bring the Christian spirit into the heart of the barbarian, went up into the German forests and converted whole nations to Christ.

The days of the Reformation also were days of social ferment. Romanism was impossible, intellectually adamant, morally rotten. The world was reconstructed because there were men like Wycliff, Huss, Tynedale and Luther. The time fails me to speak of Washington, Lincoln, Judson and Livingstone. The fact is, as this historical resume may reveal, that every day can be a reconstruction day if the men of that day are big enough men, and that while the moment that we meet is unusual it is not unique nor unknown, and that other servants of God have had faith and courage similar to that which God expects of us.

Genuine Leaders Needed

II. Again, the place of the minister today must be one of vision and sanity, initiative, and leadership. One of the powerful groups of Lorado Taft, the sculptor, is entitled "The Blind." Those of this group are from an almshouse and are all either insane or blind, except one—a child. Twilight has come on them and they are lost. A blind mother has hoisted this her child, possessing sight, to her shoulder, and the child affords the vision to bring the helpless multitude to safety. Someone today must be eyes to the blind. "For if the blind lead the blind shall not both fall in the ditch."

Brethren, today men are as they were in the days of Jesus, like lost sheep without a shepherd. There are a thousand contradictory voices, a thousand paths in the labyrinth, a thousand confusing shadows. Yet two or three things must be as plain as a gingham apron.

(1) This is no time for shortcuts in the ministry, nor for men hewn out of society's poorest material. Good guides over the mountain serve a long apprenticeship and are well seasoned.

(2) This is no time for men who must find their answer in the back of the book, or who can afford to hire an amanuensis to find the answer for them. Henry Ford may get his answer that way if he will. You and I cannot.

(3) This is no time for Hamlets, mumbling

"The time is out of joint, O cursed spite,

That ever I was born, to set it right," but for Mordecais who say with faith, "Who knoweth but thou hast come to the kingdom for such a time as this."

(4) Brethren of the pure heart—we have seen God. We know and see as A'Kempis in the darkness of his day saw that Jesus is the light of the world. "He that followeth Him shall not walk in darkness but shall have the light of life."

Following the Glean

A Christian, whatever else he is, is a student of the teachings of Jesus. He sees the ideal world that Jesus began to construct. In all stages of destruction or construction or reconstruction that ideal of Jesus in his blue print. "See thou make all things according to the pattern thou hast seen in the Mount."

I said there were no answers in the back of the book. There are none. The crowd will look for its answer in the inspired front page of the newspaper, in the party shibboleth or campaign document, or in the denunciations of the agitator. The real minister will see the world as Christ wants it, and he will seek to lead people that way.

My subject calls this time in which we live, "these days of reconstruction." These will be days of reconstruction only to a reconstructionist. You are the hope of the world. If you, we, I, see the things that are down because they ought to be down and see on God's blue print the things that ought to go up, and if we set ourselves—like Nehemiah—to remove the rubbish and build, these will be days of reconstruction indeed.

"But life shall on and upward go;
Th' eternal step of Progress beats
To that great anthem calm and slow,
Which God repeats.

"Take heart!—The waster builds again—

A charmed life old Goodness hath;
The tares may perish—but the grain
Is not for death.

"God works in all things; all obey
His first propulsion from the night;

Wake thou and watch! The world is gray

With morning light!"

Ministers as Sky Pilots

III. Again, his position must be one of supervision and direction and salvation.

Somewhat recently I visited the Olympic peninsula. For forty-two miles I traveled a road where on both sides to a total width of over thirty miles the wind had wrought terrible destruction. Eleven billion feet of fir, spruce, cedar and hemlock lie prostrate. Great trees that had been growing for over 250 years were down in sickening profusion. On the twenty-ninth day of January a storm, such as had never before in the memory of man visited that part of the Pacific Coast, swept the area. Nothing stood before it. Only a road had been cut through. Thousands of great trees are there, ten or twelve feet across, and 300 feet high. It is impossible to salvage this. To build a road in and build mills on the spot would cost more than the lumber is worth. There it lies a total loss to industry and a menace to any human habitation in the territory, for the fire hazard will be immeasurable for many years to come. And what is the answer? There is none unless that of scrupulous supervision and infinite patience, while man watches God reconstruct that which God first grew and then destroyed. The most astute wisdom in statecraft and woodcraft, after days of investigation, has decided that there is only one thing that the state of Washington can do. We can put men so as to watch the situation, so to scrutinize tourists and campers, and so to patrol for forest fires, that a bad situation does not become an impossible one. If for fifteen years a disastrous fire can be prevented, nature will begin to heal and reforestation will have begun.

The parallel to my mind is a fair one. That destruction seems to be unrelieved. Yet it might be worse. And our entire task for fifteen years will be to keep the fire hazard away. Mountain patrols have been put through the region and the entire situation is being closely watched and guarded. Even the aeroplane circles over the timber watching for the blue curl of smoke which is the hieroglyph of peril.

So the destructive forces of war in Europe seem spent. Yet a worse fate may await the world. A continuance of hatred, an invincible blindness to the lessons war has taught, an unchastened attitude of heart and mind and soul, and the very same thing—only worse—may have to be gone through again. You are the watchman upon the mountain top, the episcopus or overseer, the sky pilot, who seeks to supervise, direct, and save.

Just here the temptation to become specific and practical, instead of general only, in the statement of principles is very great. For example, I live where one of the greatest sources of peril lies. The Japanese question is one that must vex our statesmen as keenly as the men prior to 1861 were vexed, both North and South, in America. It is a question comparable to European

---

THERE is a contagion of doubt as well as a contagion of faith. With facts still favorable to a victory, an army may lose morale. When the general and all his officers keep hopeful, their confidence works its way down to the enlisted men. If the hopeful word is on many lips the morale is saved, and the whole army is confident of victory. Witnessing to any belief has a tremendous psychic influence for good or evil. The facts concerning any great subject are never deeply analyzed by the masses; yet the people possess a rare power for sensing the spirit of their times. In the fight for Eternal Life the morale of the church is too low. The confidence at the top is not always as rugged and commanding as it might be.

problems just passed. An answer must be found that will be just to two great races in accordance with the principles of Jesus Christ and which does not involve the world in war. The question of whether Japan becomes permanently pagan or Christian will not precede but will follow the solution which we of America find. Has the Christian minister no place in finding such a solution? His solution must be the only one.

Prophets of Economic Justice

The solution of our economic problem has scarcely begun. Here, as in the case of Japan, the blind agitator, the misguided enthusiast who thinks he shouts for justice but who in reality has heard but half the story—and there are such shouters at both extreme wings of society—the yellow newspaper whose policy is to use the mob to increase its circulation, these are the ones who seek to shape the answer. The minister today, like the Hebrew prophet, is the one who must give the answer, make society accept it, and keep things stable until the answer is accepted. What clarity of vision, what purity of heart, what bigness of soul, what elevation of purpose, what steadfastness of resolution, what richness of personality, what cleanliness of conduct, what self denial of life, all this demands. It is in the light of demands such as all these place upon him that he will glimpse his Master's quiet face as he set himself steadfastly to go toward Jerusalem and his cross. And in the light of these demands he will hear his Lord say "If any man would come after me let him take up his cross and follow after me."

IV. And now lastly, ours is the place of supreme privilege, opportunity, and obligation. Jesus might very well again say, of the preachers of this generation, as he said in that day and as recorded in the tenth chapter of the gospel of Luke—"Blessed are the eyes that see the things which ye see; for I say unto you, that many prophets and kings desired to see the things which ye see and saw them not; and to hear the things which ye hear and heard them not."

A Higher Voice Than Philosophy

If we have no higher voice than philosophy, we may hear Hegel telling us that all life moves through the three cycles of thesis, antithesis, and synthesis. The world is in the third stage of composite synthetic reconstruction. A few hours ago I was on my way out here over one of the great trunk lines from the far west. One stretch of track has often been described to me by an old man who during his lifetime was a member of our church. He was a member of a party of surveyors who surveyed the first Hill line across the continent. That was over forty years ago. At one spot they encountered a severe storm and for hours on snow shoes they mushed along through slushy snow at the foot of the mountain. At each step their feet were plunged into ice cold water. At the close of the day they had advanced but four miles and their feet were almost frozen. But we rounded the same bend at fifty miles per hour. Brethren, their work was necessary that we might travel. We too are builders. We too, as Tennyson said, are "pioneers and in the morn of destiny".

Such, my friends, is the place you and I occupy as ministers of Christ in these days of reconstruction. Our place is the one that all brave men of God have always occupied, who have sought to reconstruct a broken world. It is a place of sanity and leadership, a place of supervision and salvation, and a place of privilege and power.

Objectives and Program for the Churches

Report of the committee to study and suggest the promotional program for 1921-22. Adopted by the General Board of Promotion, June 25, 1921

The Local Church and the New World Movement: The first year of the New World Movement program marked the beginning of a new epoch in our history. For the churches that entered heartily into the Movement it is a record of unusual spiritual achievement. From several states we are advised that larger figures for baptisms appear in the case of nearly every church alongside larger figures for giving to the New World Movement,—a perfectly normal development!

The Northern Baptist Convention and the New World Movement: Our people have been handicapped seriously by the prevailing business depression, but the year's record shows an advance of nearly three hundred per cent over the previous year in the amount contributed by the churches. We have been saved from humiliating deficits and consequent retrenchment unavoidable apart from this Movement. The annual report of the Board of Promotion may well raise the questions:

"What if the Survey had not been made? What if the financial campaign had not resulted in securing subscriptions for over $48,000,000? What if all those churches which responded had not heeded the call? What would be our financial condition today, if, when our denomination sounded the call for an advance along all lines, these churches had not blazed a new path?"

Denominational Goals for 1921-22

Let us thank God for victories won, face and correct our mistakes and reach forward to the goals before us. We should be greatly enheartened by the year's experience and face the future with higher courage and more victorious faith.

We suggest as promotional goals for the denomination:

First, 200,000 members added to the churches by baptism and restoration.

Second, 200,000 members enrolled in stewardship leagues.

Third, 1,000 churches paying the pastor's pension premium (in the Ministers and Missionaries Benefit Board).

Fourth, A total of $87,500,000 pledged toward the $100,000,000. (This means $29,675,700.15 in addition to the amount pledged to April 30, 1921. These additional pledges must be secured before May 1, 1922 if conditional pledges of $3,000,000 are made available.

Fifth, A total of $20,000,000 paid on account of the New World Movement.

What the Local Church May Do

Only the local church can make these goals effective. Therefore, we suggest that after careful preparation a meeting be called by each church at a suitable date, not later than September to consider and adopt (1) so many of the Objectives and (2) so much of the Program suggested in this report as seems to the church to be necessary in order that it may share fully in our Baptist task.

I. OBJECTIVES

(Suggested for consideration and adoption by the Local Church)

A. Devotional

We humbly acknowledge allegiance to him who has the right to say regarding the New World Movement and every other spiritual undertaking, "Without me ye can do nothing;" therefore

OBJECTIVE NO. 1

This church will give first place to the promotion of prayer for the achievement of our world task.

The prayer life of our people must be cultivated definitely and conscientiously if it is to function victoriously.

B. Educational

Our membership must be informed in order to become loyal, enthusiastic "fellow-workers with God" in the tasks committed to the denomination; and we recognize the educational value of our missionary publications; therefore

OBJECTIVE NO. 2

This church will aim to have every family in the membership a subscriber to "Missions," "The Baptist," and other denominational periodicals, also

OBJECTIVE NO. 3

This church will provide missionary instruction for all its groups.

The denomination is making available an extensive program of missionary education, including:

- Missionary stories for the Sunday school.
- An educational program of mission study and reading for the young peoples society.
- An educational program for the World Wide Guild and Children's World Crusade.
- Mission study class literature and an educational program for adult groups.
- Materials for "National Missionary Reading Contests."
- Missionary institutes, stereopticon lectures and pamphlet literatures.

OBJECTIVE NO. 4

This church will encourage its young people to enlist for a life of service and assist them to obtain an adequate training for Christian leadership in whatever positions they may occupy.

C. Financial

OBJECTIVE NO. 5

This church will aim to have every member a subscriber to the local budget and to the New World Movement.

The reasonable denominational objective for world missions should be $20,000,000 for the New World Movement for the year 1921-22. This amount should be realized if we are to complete the $100,000,000 Fund in due time and make the advance that is imperative in our mission fields throughout the world.

OBJECTIVE NO. 6

This church will urge every member to unite with the Stewardship League.

Seeking the dedication of life as well as money, it is suggested that we aim to enroll at least 200,000 members of the Stewardship League during 1921-22. Let the church decide how many it will seek to enroll; and take advantage of the helps provided by various agencies including the Baptist Young People's Union, emphasizing the fundamental principles of stewardship—the consecration of life and the practice of tithing as a minimum basis of giving.

In view of the insistent calls upon the churches for contributions for every worthy object of benevolence we reaffirm our primary responsibility before God as Baptist churches to complete the task laid upon our denomination by his Spirit and will see to it that

OBJECTIVE NO. 7

This church will give first place to the support of denominational enterprises.

OBJECTIVE NO. 8

This church will remit monthly all contributions for the New World Movement.

II. PROGRAM

(Suggested for consideration and adoption by the Local Church)

It is suggested that during the coming months the local church give emphasis in its program to these "objectives" in about the following order: (Keep in mind that this is not a complete church program, including for instance a program of community service, but deals mainly with the great denominational objectives.

September—Preparation

The meetings of the church to plan the work of the year will be held during this month. The woman's organization will be asked to visit every family in the church to secure their participation in these preparatory meetings.

October—Education

(1) Conferences, both regional, state and associational, will be held in which local churches will be urged to participate. In these conferences teams will be trained whose task will be to visit churches and missions for the purposes of giving first-hand information concerning the New World Movement and to make available their own experience in former campaigns.

(2) The missionary education program of the local church should be launched. (See under Objective No. 3.)

(3) The "Groups" should be reorganized and instructed during this month.

(4) The "Minute Men" should be re-enlisted and instructed.

November—Financial Canvass

A simultaneous every-member canvass for church expenses and the New World Movement is most advantageous. In any case, before November 30,

(1) if the church has not participated in the New World Movement a worthy attempt should be made to secure subscriptions to the full amount of its obligation; and,

(2) if the church previously has made the canvass, solicitation should be made for pledges from new members and friends and all others not now giving according to the higher standard.

Also before November 30 a concerted effort should be made in a Christlike spirit to secure payment of pledges due on that date. (It is desirable that this be done at least twice a year, preferably in November and April. The third Sunday in each of these months may be observed as "pay-up Sunday.")

January—Intercession

This month is generally observed throughout Christendom as a season for special prayer. Let us make the most of the opportunity to relate ourselves and our tasks to him who alone can empower us for final and complete success.

February—Stewardship

During this month a new study should be made of the principles and practice of stewardship, and the enrollment of a strong stewardship league should be completed. Valuable helps will be available for use during this period.

March—Evangelism

We recommend that evangelism be emphasized throughout the year, but that the month of March be set apart for concerted soul-winning efforts.

April—Anniversary Tasks

During the month every reasonable effort should be made

(1) to insure the payment of all pledges due; having in mind the attainment of the proposed objective of $20,000,000 total payments for the year;

(2) to secure new subscriptions toward the completion of the Hundred Million Dollar Fund. Conditional pledges of $3,000,000 will be available if a total of $87,500,000 is pledged by May 1, 1922.

ASSISTING THE LOCAL CHURCH

With a view to the achievement of these objectives during the year 1921-22 the General Board of Promotion will undertake to assist the churches through.

1. The preparation and circulation of such literature as seems necessary for the adequate promotional work of the denomination. This literature will include a quarterly bulletin for subscribers, and a prayer calendar in pamphlet or book form.

2. Co-operation in the conduct of regional conferences and institutes especially in connection with the state conventions, associations and summer assemblies, chiefly for the preparation of persons who enlist for team work involving the carrying of the message of the New World Movement and the "Objectives of 1921-22" to the local church.

3. Provision for conferences with members of the faculties of our Baptist institutions with a view to securing their sympathetic co-operation in the denominational program.

4. The correlation and enlargement of effort through the denomination to secure the adoption of the principle of tithing as the minimum basis for reasonable Christian giving.

5. Suggestions for use of special days for thank offerings. Inasmuch as the spirit of Christmas, Easter and Children's Day has found expression through many years in our churches and Sunday schools by the making of gifts to appropriate objects, the Board of Promotion will suggest objects for thank offerings on these dates by the members of our churches and Sunday schools.

6. Co-operation in observing Anniversary Week. Wherever Anniversary Week was fully observed last year it resulted in a notable reaction of enthusiasts as well as increased giving. It helped very greatly toward the full payment of pledges at the close of the last fiscal year. In view of this fact the Board of Promotion will furnish whatever helps are necessary in order that the churches may make the most of Anniversary Week in April 1922 (see under Program, "April—Anniversary Tasks").

7. The co-ordination of life-work agencies of the denomination with a view not only to increasing the number of qualified ministers and missionaries, but also in order to encourage the higher education and the complete dedication to God of the promising young people of our churches.

8. Giving prominent place to the cultivation of our constituency with a view to securing individual gifts, making large use of volunteer workers of the women's and laymen's organizations.

9. Securing the consideration and adoption of the "Objectives and Program" for 1921-22 so far as practicable and helpful to the local church.

A Study in Contrasts

Look on This Picture

"An Essay of Silence" concerning some types of school buildings could well be written with the above picture as a text. This type is not the best nor is it creditable as representing the work of a great society in a city of 520,000 people—Madras, S. India. It did for a start, however, as combined school and chapel. But it was no beauty, especially after the monsoon rains.

And Then on This

A building of this sort, a new dormitory, needs no essay or epistle of commendation. It speaks for itself and for the Woman's Christian College, Madras, of which it forms a part. Our Woman's American Baptist Foreign Mission Society is a vital partner in maintaining the college with its fine faculty and high-grade work.

North Dakota Baptists Meet

Report of State Convention in Minot, July 13-17

THE thirty-eighth annual meeting of the North Dakota State Convention met in Minot, July 13-17. Friends in the extreme West tell us the old story of a wonderful climate but North Dakota citizens talk with the same fervor of the marvelous distances. No one need feel crowded in that land. Baptists are far apart geographically but with a splendid unity and a spirit of determination are doing their part in laying the foundations of a great Christian commonwealth.

There are three things which need to be said concerning this convention. First, there were an unusually large number proportionately of the delegates young people. This was in no small measure due to the work of the director of religious education and to the fact that an assembly program followed that of the convention. The second matter was the faithfulness of the delegates to all of the sessions. The attendance was not large in number, about 150, although a good representative group. They were however for the most part present at the opening sessions and they were on hand for the closing ones. The third item has to do with the quality of the program. From the president's address and the annual sermon to the addresses of Miss Isabel Crawford, Dr. W. E. Chalmers, Dr. Hugh E. Heath, Dr. Bruce Kinney and Dr. Carl D. Case an unusually high standard was maintained. This was in no small measure due to the time given to the speakers. The business was transacted promptly and with perfect harmony and did not interfere with the inspirational character of the meetings.

The President's Address

The president, Mr. R. B. Griffith of Grand Forks, gave an address in which he traced the religious history of that vast territory now known as North Dakota. During the past 150 years the territory has belonged in turn to England, Spain, France and the United States. It was a part of the Louisiana Purchase. A fort was built and a trading post opened at Grand Forks in 1801 by John Cameron.

The earliest religious movement of Protestants was in Walthalla in 1852. Its leaders, Elijah Terry and James Tanner were Baptists. Elijah Terry, who was a member of the First Church at St. Paul, Minn., was killed and scalped by the Indians in 1852. This ended the first attempt to evangelize this region. The first Protestant church organized in the territory was a Presbyterian church at Bismarck in 1873. The first Baptist church was that at Fargo in 1879. In 1881 Rev. G. W. Huntley was appointed general missionary for the great country now known as North Dakota. When he began his work there were twelve churches with a total membership of 164, or one Baptist for every 225 of the population. The 1920 annual shows ninety churches with a membership of 6,765, or one Baptist for every ninety-five of the population.

Turning from historical matters, Mr. Griffith discussed the present world conditions which called more loudly than ever for the message and service of the churches. He quoted from the report of the National Surety Co., which showed the losses paid by thirty insurance companies each year. It was shown that there were in 1910 embezzlements amounting to $1,396,081 and burglaries of $886,045 and in 1920 embezzlements of $5,623,819 and burglaries of $10,189,853. It is said that there are now seven burglaries to every fire, while before the war there were but three. Well-known business and professional men were quoted bearing witness to a general conviction that the churches hold the key to the alarming situation. Summing up the matter the president said, "If the hope of our country is religion we must have more religion. Religion in the homes, religion in the schools, religion in society, religion in business, religion everywhere. As Baptist churches we have a responsibility resting upon us to popularize religion, to talk religion, to live religion. You ask, 'What do you mean by religion?' My answer is found in James 1:27. It is the helping hand and the pure life. Christianity is not a dead theory—it is a living fact. Baptists have no time to lose in vain theological discussions. Our Master has work for us to do. The world is to be saved. Mankind is to be brought to Christ—to accept his standards of life." Then followed a discussion of disarmament and law enforcement. It was an address worthy of fuller publicity.

Summary of the Report of Rev. Fred E. Stockton

The following report covers a period of nine months from October 1 to June 1. Three things stand out in the work of the convention since our meeting in Bismarck.

First: Our churches have made for themselves a new record in the matter of contributions to our New World Movement. The fiscal year ending May 1, 1921 shows an increase in giving to missionary objects of 400 per cent over the previous year. The total contributions from our churches during the year to missionary and benevolent objects is $46,634.43, or a per capita amount of $8.50. The contributions from the North Dakota German Baptist churches have also been much larger than in any previous year.

Second: Along with increased giving has come an increased interest in evangelism. The state-wide campaign inaugurated at the Bismarck convention has been continued throughout the year. Thirty-five series of meetings have been conducted under the direction of the state office. This is an average of almost one meeting per week for the entire nine months. Including the revival campaigns conducted independently, and by our German churches, the total is above fifty series of meetings. Many of these campaigns have been remarkable in the results accomplished under difficult circumstances. We have been assisted in this work by Dr. J. E. Norcross of New York for six weeks, and by Rev. J. S. Umberger of Denver for six weeks.

Third: Especial attention has been given during the past nine months to matters of religious education under the leadership of our Director, Rev. E. Wiese. Director Wiese has been devoting himself enthusiastically to the task of developing our churches and Sunday-schools along the lines of missionary and religious education. His task has been a difficult one. He has visited most of the Baptist churches in North Dakota, and in this short time has familiarized himself with the conditions and needs in our state.

Missionary Activities: During the period covered by this report twenty-eight missionaries and general workers have been employed for all or part time. The general superintendent completed his first year of service in North Dakota March first last. In addition to the regular workers, deputation work has been done in the state by Rev. John Alexander Frey of Riga, Latvia, Russia, and Miss Isabel Crawford of Red House, New York. Mr. Frey visited nearly all of the Russian and German churches in the state, besides many of the English and Scandinavian churches. Miss Crawford has attended the yearly conferences and conventions, and visited thirty-seven of our churches.

New Workers: Only two convention workers have resigned during the period covered by this report. Pastor-at-Large Olaf Breding, closed his work January 15 to accept the pastorate of the First Dano-Norwegian Baptist church of Minneapolis. Rev. J. E. Boen closed his work at Park River March 15. Rev. E. Lansing Holland became pastor at Page January 15. His son, T. Ewing Holland, became pastor at Lisbon April 1. Richard Jensen was engaged as stated supply for the Park River church May 1. A. A. McGahey took up the work at Lidgerwood April 1. Rev. W. A. Barclay has been engaged as district missionary for the Kenmare district, and began his services May 15. Mr. Barclay came to us from Fort Worth, Texas, where he has been attending the Southwestern Baptist Theological Seminary. Rev. Paul Perverzoff of Rochester, N. Y., has been engaged for the summer to help in the work among our Russian churches. Miss Lottie Lund has given valuable help in the conducting of music in several evangelistic campaigns during the year. Miss Emma E. Anderson has been assigned by the Woman's American Baptist Home Mission Society to North Dakota. She will begin her service September 1.

Swedish Work: Since the first of January Rev. L. M. Stolberg has been engaged as colporteur for the territory west of the Missouri River.

Rev. Ole Larson has given his time during the year in the help of the work in our Scandinavian churches. Rev. C. J. Hill has done especially efficient work as colporteur and evangelist during the past year. Rev. C. W. Finwall, who also speaks the Norwegian language, is engaged as an English-speaking missionary, although he has helped in many of our Norwegian churches. He has devoted his energies largely during the year to evangelism. Rev. W. J. Horner has been engaged by the Grand Forks Norwegian church to preach each Sunday evening.

Russian Work: Miss Sadie Barnick—now Mrs. Lalka—closed her work July 1. Rev. Paul Perverzoff is helping in revival meetings during the summer. Mr. Nesdoly has devoted himself to our several Russian fields during the year. We are much in need of another strong, regular worker, among the Russians.

German Work: Miss Alethea Kose has been engaged by the German Baptist churches of North Dakota as a missionary, with headquarters at Grand Forks. Our German churches, during the year, have been unusually successful in their evangelistic campaigns, and have contributed large sums for missionary purposes. Rev. S. J. Fuxa has transferred his work from Medina to Rosenfeld. Rev. O. Lohse has come to North Dakota, and is located as pastor at Martin.

Negro Work: Rev. D. E. Beasley has cared for the work of our Negro churches at Minot and Bismarek during the year. The church at Minot has purchased a dwelling house, which has been remodeled into a church building.

New Officers

The women were in evidence in all the sessions of the convention. They also held a number of separate meetings. The officers for the coming year are Mrs. C. E. Webster of Fargo; who was re-elected president; Mrs. R. B. Griffith of Grand Forks, vice-president; Mrs. N. J. Nelson of East Grand Forks, treasurer; and Mrs. W. R. Rice of Fargo, secretary. Mrs. Vernon Squires of Grand Forks was elected as state college counsellor.

Mr. R. B. Griffith of Grand Forks was re-elected president of the convention. The vice-presidents elected were Rev. O. Enget, representing the Norwegian Conference, Rev. E. Gunther of the German Conference, Rev. Nestor Nesdoly of the Russian Conference. Frank D. Hall of Fargo was re-elected as recording secretary and Dr. R. W. Hobbs will represent the state on the General Board of Promotion.

The convention adopted the suggested program for the convention year. It adopted some very definite goals touching THE BAPTIST and Missions, the work of religious education and the denominational objectives. We hope to give in another number a summary of the plans of Rev. E. Wiesel, director of religious education. It was a good convention and in 1922 at Kenmare we predict that North Dakota Baptists will report a new high mark in all their work.

Basement Sunday Schools

By GEORGE E. MERRILL

THE Sunday school, as we know it in Protestant churches, began in a dismal hole under the church; and ever since the efforts of teachers and administrators and lovers of children have been directed, not without some success, towards lifting it out into the light of day.

The Western Church itself may be said to have begun under ground—in candle-lighted mosaic-lined chapels cut into the walls of the catacombs—and the tradition of underground worship (with candles) persisted in the vast crypt which underlay every Gothic altar. In the crypt were the shrines of the lesser saints and the tombs of knights and learned doctors and wealthy bourgeoisie; here were treasures of those adored relics which were magnets for the eager footsteps of innumerable pilgrims. The feverish religious life of those pious centuries overflowed even the vast spaces of the cathedral and filled the vaults below with the incense and color of Catholic ceremony.

Putting Children in the Crypt

When that deep color had faded under the too-scorching sun of the Reformation, which, in destroying a great evil, destroyed, without intending it, a great and solemn beauty; when the fresh cold air of religious liberty, blowing from the north, had cleared from those vaults, now silent, the last wreath of drowsy incense; when the relics had been broken and scattered by a people who could no longer believe in them; then, in the name of enlightenment, our economical fathers conceived a new usefulness for the crypt. Thenceforth it was to confine, not dried and decaying relics, not the dead bodies of saints, but the live ruddy bodies of our little children. And to this day you may see on a Sunday morning, in any city of this our country—which, above all others, is proud of its progress, its concern for education—thousands of boys and girls setting out to endure their hour of religious instruction (how precious that single hour!) in the stale air and dim light of the church basement. And that stale air and dim light, experienced thus in the impressionable days of their adolescence, are to remain for them forever associated with the religion of Christ.

Yes, with the religion of Christ, who taught, as I remember it, upon the mountain top and in the open market place and beside the good invigorating air that moved across the waters of Galilee!

The idea seems to have been that the fine golden oak pews, glittering in their shining varnish, the tasseled cushions, richly plushed, the thick Brussels carpets, were far too precious to be exposed to childish hands and childish feet; the sanctuary (or perhaps the presence of the minister) too awful a thing for childish eyes to contemplate. The voices of children, (who, we are told, make up the choir of heaven) were too shrill to be brooked in the still and sanctimonious atmosphere which, to our father's view, was alone fitted for Christian worship. Away with them, then, to the basement; let their natural instinct for air and sunshine be, on this holy day, rigorously suppressed; suffer them not to come into the upper spaces of the Lord's Temple!

Well, the bright varnished pews are still there, little marred by the feet that never found the way into them. The pages of the song books were long preserved, unthumbed by the little hands that never learned to open them with joy or healthful gladness. But those boys and girls (now men and women) who were to sit in those pews, who were to sing from those song books,—where are they? How many of them, I wonder, prefer this Sunday morning the crisp air of the links or the exhilarating sunshine of the open road? Who now is to help them to unlearn that false lesson, indelibly stamped upon their minds, that joyousness and light are incompatible with Christian worship? Who can undo now the infinite harm wrought, all unintentionally, of course, by our fathers' woe-ful lack of prescience?

What Chance Has a Teacher

The other day I visited a Sunday school—just a few miles from New York City—and there I saw no less than 300 children, of every age and size, crowded into a basement room fifty feet square. The ceiling was low—as it must be in a basement room—and the floor, several feet below the level of the ground, was encumbered by two rows of iron pillars supporting the floor above. Light struggled into this room through three narrow windows; its dull radiance made the more melancholy by the colored tones of the glass, those "twilight saints and dim emblazonings" (so meet for school room use!) without which, I suppose, church could scarcely be a church. And in one corner there was a furnace, stoked to its fullest capacity in order to heat the auditorium above, where services were soon to begin.

Here, then, in a tropic temperature (though the day outside was spring-like and sparkling), in air that, before twenty minutes had passed, was foul and poisonous, 300 children were to receive their only contact for that week with any sort of organized or systematic religious instruction.

The teachers in this Sunday school seemed competent and earnest, the superintendent able and energetic; they felt, patently, the weight of their responsibility, the splendor of their opportunity; but under what a frightful handicap were they called upon to do their work! Is it not enough, then, that they should bear, without pay, all the natural inevitable burdens of a teacher's calling (which, God knows, are heavy enough), without this artificial anathema applied to the pupil's mind, this shameful needless drugging of his senses by a narcotic atmosphere, a sluggish light?

Midway through the exercises, when the teachers, having divided the children into groups, were struggling, not without heroism, to give each group some individual instruction (in spite of the strident competition of colleagues), I left this Sunday school (for I, being a visitor, could escape) and climbed up into the auditorium over its head. There the air was still, the room high and spacious, the light warm and bright—and the seats empty. The room trembled slightly with the low tones of the prelude which the organist, in practice for the coming service, ran over on the organ, and behind the reading desk, dressed in his solemn frock, the minister arranged a mass of exquisitely-colored flowers and potted palm-trees. The morning service was to commence after the Sunday school should be dismissed.

Pry Them Out

Here was light, air, space unused and perfectly available; yet, for nothing more than an ancient prejudice, for an outworn convention merely, (I cannot believe that there was any other motive) the children were denied its use. The church could not afford (up to that time) to build independent first-story rooms for the Sunday-school; the church proper was thought "unsuitable" for their use; ergo, they must be condemned to the basement.

Oh, for some mighty derrick, some Archimedian lever, that I might pry that floor-full of children and teachers out of their toxic cellar into the clean air of that decent auditorium! To see the brightening eyes of the scholars, the relieved faces of the surprised teachers, as they found themselves, by my unaccountable magic, suddenly free of the intolerable weight of stupefying air and lethargic light, their faces wreathed with unexpected smiles, their lightened spirits shining with a newer radiance! I cannot believe that the auditorium would suffer by their presence or be made less suitable for the more solemn service of their elders which is to follow it. I cannot believe that that room would become less hallowed in the sight of God or the prayers offered there any less acceptable. The flowers I think would have lost none of their perfume because the children had

Crumbs from the Master's Table

By R. E. NEIGHBOR

I

TRULY the kingdom of God cometh "not with observation," yet it is a great and glorious thing to believe that it comes—not that it will come sometime, but that it is coming all the time. Is it not so? Surely we need to amend our common conceptions in regard to both the nature and the coming of Christ's kingdom, and need to be able to see, through the obscurities (obscurities to us) of the passing years, the outlines of it as continuously growing more and more definite. It may be difficult, or even impossible, for us to understand, and to adjust to the fact of that kingdom's coming, all that happens in this strange world under the overruling providences of God, whose ways are not as our ways, yet we cannot but believe that he is steadily realizing his purposes—purposes always of grace in their final issues. He has a plan, as Dr. Stimson used to say, and he'll execute it. Here is this from Mrs. Browning:

"And I smiled to think of God's greatness
Flowed around our incompleteness—
Round our restlessness his rest."

Certainly my own heart re-echoes this. Terrible would it be if my short-sightedness were not transcended by his illimitable vision, my weakness by his almightiness, and my ignorance by his wisdom. No; the kingdom indeed comes not with observation, neither shall any of us be able to say of it, "Lo, here!" or "Lo, there!" any more than we can say of the springtime that today or tomorrow it will be here; yet it is coming all the while without noise or bluster, unheralded by blare of trumpets or other startling signals of its approach. All the same there comes a time when we can confidently say of it, "It is here!" And then we know it has been coming while we worked and while we slept, gradually and steadily coming, thank God.

II

In connection with these reflections as to the certainty of the kingdom's coming there occurred to me the other day a new thought touching that generally perplexing statement of Christ that if we ask, "believing that we receive," we do really receive, no matter what may be the sort of answer we get, or even if the answer be "No," which (as my pastor sometimes reminds us) may also be our Heavenly Father's answer. That is to say, the prayer always is answered. What flashed into my always more or less sluggish comprehension was that no prayer is true prayer unless we believe that God, who is our Heavenly Father, is in fact a prayer-hearing and a prayer-answering God; in other words, that he will always do what he says he will do, viz.: answer the cry of the child who appeals to him. Prayer can never be in vain, can never remain unanswered. Of course, I must believe that if I believe him, must I not? And so my prayer is answered because—

(a) I have committed to him the whole matter that has been burdening me; I have put it into his hands definitely to take care of for me, and in such ways as to him shall seem fitting. Therefore—

(b) Whatever he may in his wisdom really do about it satisfies me—even as a little child is satisfied with what its father does about the thing it has gone to him about, provided of course, the child has perfect confidence in its father's love and wisdom and ability of resource, and that, as Mrs. Browning says, his greatness flows around its own incompleteness and around its restlessness his rest. And if in like manner we are persuaded of this in our relation to our Heavenly Father, we can "smile," as she says, no matter what happen to us or happen in the world.

Furthermore, these words of Christ illustrate how perfect and absolute was his own confidence in God as his Father, and how sure he was about the successful outcome of all true prayer. Christ knew that God would answer the prayers of his children on earth—answer them, of course, in his own way and at his own time. But Jesus was quite content and happy to have him do that. I have been thinking too of how, in spite of all this confidence of his in prayer, he was nevertheless left to suffer and go through with the agonies of Gethsemane and the cross, of how many a martyr has suffered, and of how many of God's believing children today are suffering though they pray, and of how the apostle wrote that we "through much tribulation" must enter the kingdom. But these words of Christ give no ground for anyone's expecting an absolute exemption from suffering and from what we call "the ills of life." These come to all of us, whether we are Christian believers or not, but in the case of the believer the conviction of the love and the infinite good-will of his Heavenly Father overflows it all with a sustaining power. Apropos of this I recall some lines which I came upon one day when reading Wordsworth (and the great poets are ever our great teachers, prophets whom earlier ages used to call "seers," as they were and still are, i. e., the men who see things the rest of us do not see:

"They felt

And did acknowledge, wheresoe'er they moved,
A spiritual presence, oftimes misconceived,

But still a high dependence, a divine Bounty and government, that filled their hearts

With joy and gratitude and fear and love,
And from their fervent lips drew hymns of praise

That through the desert rang."

Aye, indeed. It is even so: "Praise that through the desert rang"! For if we believe in God and in the validity of our appeal to him when we pray, the desert wastes may perhaps environ us, but when they do we shall hear across them the ringing of the bells of heaven and find in our souls a response to their melody. Indianapolis.

"When all my hopes are gone,

'Tis well my hands must still keep toiling on for others' sake;

For strength to bear is found in duty done,

And he is blest who makes the joy of others heal his own heartache."

The Father's Love

Rest and be still;

Naught happens thee but of His blessed will.

There's not a wind that blows,

There's not a lily grows

Without His bidding—and His child shall He

Forget and leave uncomforted? Nay, see How not a small brown sparrow (sorry thing!)

Without His hand can droop or raise a wing!

And thou art better far unto thy God!

*Lo! if He calls thee to a way untrod,
Where stones and rugged places tear thy feet,*

*And bitter herbs alone are for thy meat,
Or if He sets thee high, and with a song
Fill Thy rejoicing mouth, and make thee strong;*

Yet know thou this: He loves thee just as dear

When dimpling laughter lights thy face, or tear

With bitter tear goes chasing down thy cheek,

And thy poor heart may break but cannot speak!

Rest and be still.

'God hath not good and ill.

*All that He sends is good, altho' our eye
For weeping scarce His rainbow can describe.*

*He is our Father, and His name is Love.
E'en when thy grief is greatest—look above!*

Look up! look up! and thou shalt surely see

*A Father's loving face down-bent to thee!
—Life and Work.*

Who Signed the Petition?

Several prominent clergymen, representing the Committee on Reduction of Armaments of the Church Peace Union, presented to President Harding a petition signed by 20,503 Protestant ministers, Catholic priests, and Jewish rabbis.

The petition asks the President and Congress to call an international conference to discuss reduction of armaments. The signatures were gathered by mail by the Church Peace Union from all over the country. Of the clergymen who answered the appeal sent out several weeks ago jointly by national organizations representing Protestants, Catholics and Jews, only 209 declined to sign the petition or to participate in the national movement of the great religious bodies for limitation of armaments. The signers of the petition are divided denominationally as follows:

Baptists .....	3,650
Meth. Episcopalians .....	4,950
Presbyterians .....	1,950
Lutherans .....	1,900
Meth. Epis. South .....	1,500
Episcopalians .....	1,400
Disciples of Christ .....	1,400
Miscellaneous .....	1,400
Congregationalists .....	1,150
Catholics .....	950
Unitarians .....	150
Friars .....	50
Rabbis .....	53

You Have It for What It Is Worth

The other day this story came from across the desk of the secretary of a large manufacturing corporation. He had long been the good angel who visited the factories of the concern to keep things sweet among the workers. On a recent visit to one of the plants, the whistle blew at eleven o'clock, as on other occasions when there was to be a meeting of the workers. But this time a committee from the men came to the secretary to ask in advance some questions. "Is it true," said they, "that the company is losing thousands of dollars every week?" "Yes." "Is it true that you officers have cut your salaries thirty per cent?" "Yes." "Is it true that all the office force has been reduced in salary?" "Yes." "Is it true that all the salesmen on the road have had their pay cut?" "Yes." "Then we are ready to take our share of the loss. You may cut us at the same rate." The secretary was saved from an unpleasant task.

Adding Depravity to Heathenism

The Alliance of Honour counts many ex-soldiers among its workers in all lands. One who served all through the Great War, and within four months of demobilization sailed for the Congo to take up missionary work there, has written to the Alliance with a view to introducing its teaching into that forlorn region. Very melancholy is the picture he gives of the moral condition of the population and its need for earnest Christian propaganda. "The question of moral purity," says he, "is the very gravest which faces those engaged in Christian work in Africa. As though the shameless immorality of the average heathen native were not enough, we now find the worst vices of the white man spreading to the remotest forest villages, and diseases that are the result of sin, and which were unknown until the advent of the trader from Europe, are everywhere gripping the natives. The birth rate is consequently alarmingly low and infant mortality as pathetically high."

A Job Would Be Better Than a Shrine

Shrines by the wayside are common in Roman Catholic countries. The important feature of most of them is an image of the Saviour hanging on the cross. The idea is that travelers may stop and engage in some act of worship before them. We are sorry to see that an effort is being made to establish this custom in this country. And strange to say, it is not being done by Catholics. One such shrine has been erected near Philadelphia, in memory of a soldier of the World War, and it is urged that this shall be done all over the country. We believe in having places of worship and we believe in prayer. But when it is proposed that people shall kneel by the side of the road to pray, we cannot help thinking of what our Saviour said about praying in the streets. And when the only thing about the structure to suggest that it is a place of worship is the image of the Saviour, we think of the commandment against making graven images and bowing down to them.

What Are the Fundamentals?

When a man has an unshaken hold on God and on Christ, as any man may have and many have had and do have, and is striving to regulate his life thereby, he is in possession of the two fundamentals of the Christian religion. Belief in them and the honest purpose to conform one's life to them are all that should be required for church membership. They are all Christ himself would require. They are the staple of the gospel which the church should carry to the mission field. They are dynamic beliefs, charged with sufficient power to heal the sick, cast out demons, and raise the dead. If all round the globe we can get men to believe in these two fundamentals, we shall have a Christian world. They are sufficient bases for Christian unity and for Christian union. Within the limits of these fundamentals, there is room for different theories of the Atonement or of the inspiration of the Scriptures or of the future Advent of our Lord. But these two beliefs are the Biblical fundamentals. Other beliefs are important, but they are secondary. Still other beliefs may be justified by a single passage of Scripture or by a class of passages, but ultimately the whole of the Bible wins out against any particularistic teachings within it. As sturdy old John Wesley said, "Give me the whole Bible for my staff." The Christian religion is not buttressed or determined by any single utterance of Jesus, but by the whole body, sweep and spirit of his teachings. In the long years, the ultra-liberal and the ultra-conservative lose out. The particularistic sects and the various cults, after making—some of them at least—their peculiar contributions to the enlargement and enrichment of Christian faith, find their subordinate place in the ranks, while the Christian Church, composed of the great and varied host of believers in God and Christ, goes on its conquering way.—Exchange.

Protestants Outrun Population

Thirty years ago the first religious census of the United States showed that the churches had a membership of about 21,000,000 out of a population of 63,000,000. With a seventy per cent gain in population since that time this country records a gain of one hundred per cent in church membership. Recent figures are placed at 45,000,000. Of course the ways of counting membership are not uniform, but the gains are undoubtedly genuine in the main. More than three-fifths of church members live in rural sections, while the proportion of population is about equal between country and town. Eighteen denominations have contributed $200,000,000 during the past year, of which the Methodists of the North have contributed the largest share and Southern Presbyterians the largest per capita amount.

Census in India Brings Persecution of Christians

Rev. H. J. Sheets, a Methodist missionary of Bijur, United Provinces, India, writes of the severe persecution endured by many Indian Christians during the recent census. The reason for persecution is the desire on the part of many Hindus and Mohammedans to keep down the number of Christians reported.

Mr. Sheets writes:

"The Government census is over at last and we are glad for in this District our enemies, the Arya Samajhists, have been using lies, innuendoes, threats, bribes, flattery, every means, both foul and fair, to get our Christians to enroll themselves as Hindus. It is a long story and even if I tried to tell it I would be unable to make you realize what a tremendous pressure was brought to bear on these people. One munshi was severely beaten, two preachers were jailed under false charges, Christians were dismissed from their jobs, Christ and the Christians were vilified, though as Stanley Jones says the people of India are not anti-Christ, but anti-Christian. Many of our Christians out of fear denied Christ in the census, many denied because for years they had been denying Him by their lives, but some few who were not Christians insisted on confessing Him. Our old sweeper was ready to fight the census enumerator because at first the latter refused to enroll him as a Christian, he averred: "True I have not been baptized, but Jesus is in my heart and I have not yet been baptized because the day I am is going to be the biggest day of my life. I am waiting until I have enough money to give all the school boys a treat, so that they may all enter into my joy." In Meerut District I am told there were 500 non-Christians who insisted on being enrolled as Christians.

The Red Flag Vicar

We have at least two living instances of men who, bred in royal or aristocratic circles, have associated themselves with the extreme left wing of the social movement. Son of Henry Ponsonby, Queen Victoria's Private Secretary, Mr. Arthur Ponsonby was born in Buckingham Palace and is now a member of the Independent Labour Party; and the Rev. Conrad Le Despenser Roden Noel, grandson of the Earl of Gainsborough and son of a Groom of the Privy Chamber, was for a time secretary of the Church Socialist League, and has lately figured in the public press in connection with certain proceedings at the old-world Church of Thaxted, Essex, of which he is vicar. He recently hung the following manifesto, chalked on a large blackboard, at the entrance to the Church:

"The rich man wars on the workers. It has always been so. The few live in comfort and folly by robbing the many. The rich killed Jesus, the poor man's Friend. The King, the Empire, the Rich and their toadies killed Christ. Our Ruler, the Empire, the Rich and those who surround them kill Him now. Inasmuch as ye have done it unto the least of these (the Irish and the Miners) ye have done it unto Me." In the chancel the Vicar hung the Red flag and the Sinn Féin emblem. These flags were removed by students and presented to the Bishop of Chelmsford, who confessed himself em-

A Newton Publication

THE BAPTIST is in receipt of a pamphlet of 108 pages which is a report of the conference of the Baptist leaders of New England held at the Newton Theological Institution March 14-17, 1921. This conference, made up of ministers who are on the board of the New England Baptist societies who came together as the guests of the seminary, considered addresses of such importance and interest that it was thought worth while to give them wider publicity. So here they are. The titles are as follows: Our Spiritual Resources, by Pres. Horr; Making Our Resources Effective, by R. M. Vaughan; The Principles of Jesus and Race Problems, by Woodman Bradbury; Religious Education and Religious Experience, by James P. Berkeley; The Methods and Aims of Religious Education, by Chas. N. Arbuckle; Internationalism and War, by W. N. Donovan; Religion and Higher Education, by C. D. Gray; The Principles of Jesus and the Industrial Conflict, by H. K. Rowe; Evangelism, by H. F. Stillwell; The Propagation of Christianity, by F. L. Anderson. Personally we have taken much delight in these various presentations and believe that many of our ministers would do the same. We do not know the price of the pamphlet, which is one of the bulletins of the institution, but are informed that it can be had of Pres. Geo. E. Horr, at Newton Center, Mass.

A Living and Abiding Force

Dr. Clifford (who recently entered upon his sixty-eighth year as a recognized preacher of the Gospel) made one of those delightful speeches which he is accustomed to give when he is amongst "his own folk." Most interesting and encouraging reports had been given by the treasurer and the secretary of the church, and the veteran pastor (who received an affectionate and upstanding welcome) began by expressing his delight at what he had heard:—

"In the prosperity of this church," he said, "my heart finds cheer and ever-fresh hope. All the anticipations in which I indulged concerning my successor in the pastorate have been and are being realized. Grateful, indeed, am I tonight to know that the work of the Lord is prospering here, that souls are being saved, and that the activities of the church are being changed and adjusted to the needs of the time. It is necessary that the church should keep an alert mind eager to meet the changed conditions which arise as the years pass. The Christian faith is not simply a great tradition, but a living and abiding force through all the changes that time brings. The thinking of the world is false to a very great extent. It needs the true interpretation of human life and of God as given to us in Jesus Christ.—Baptist Times and Freeman.

Bates Versus Oxford

Bates College in Lewiston, Maine, has an unusual record in the debating field. Out of fifty intercollegiate debates, she has won thirty-nine, and among the institutions which have been downed by the skill of her debaters have been no less formidable institutions than Harvard, Yale, Cornell, and Queen's College in Canada.

Much attention was paid in this country to the Anglo-American polo matches. But those interested in our Baptist colleges and in their intellectual achievements should not fail to take notice that on June 16 a team of three debaters from Bates met at Oxford a similar team, representing that institution in a debate dealing with the American policy of non-intervention in European affairs. The American team had the affirmative. At the close of the arguments the question was put to the vote of the house, according to the custom at Oxford, and the vote was against the side the Americans had taken. All accounts agree, however, that the Bates men made an exceptionally good showing. And it is well to remember that, while in the United States the judges decide on the merits of the argument, in Oxford the assembly naturally votes on what it thinks to be the merits of the question. It would seem that Oxford men believe that the United States ought to intervene in some measure in European affairs.

The Fish You String

The Methodist Protestant has this to say about the exaggerated claim which churches make after revival services; "It is the fish you string who help the church and whom the church helps. It is hardly true that you can have a hundred conversions and but twenty-five receptions. You must be counting the nibbles."

Church members in U. S.

The following statistics are based upon the last census: There are in this country 202 denominations. Thirty-one new denominations came into existence during the last ten years and seventeen died out. Of the 100,000,000 people in the United States there are 41,926,854 church members, an increase of 6,860,000 in ten years or nearly 20 per cent. The value of the church property is estimated at $1,676,000,000, an increase of $420,000,000 in ten years, an increase of 35 per cent. There are 15,721,815 Roman Catholics, which includes all the baptized children and those nominally Catholic. This shows that less than one-third of the church members of the United States are Roman Catholic. The Roman Catholic proportion in the total membership was over 40½ per cent in 1906; in 1919 it was 37½ per cent. In ten years the Roman Catholics gained 10 3-5 per cent, while the Protestant churches gained 23 2-5 per cent.

Forecast of Principal Farm Crops

Forecast of the country's principal farm crops, made by the Department of Agriculture from July 1 condition, indicated that there will be no record-breaking production in any crop, with the possible exception of corn. Conditions during June caused a reduction in the production forecasts of every crop, as compared with last month's estimate. The potato crop will be smaller by 53,000,000 bushels than a year ago; rice production will be only a little more than half as large as last year, and apple production will be less than half of last year's crop. The wheat showed a decline of 21,000,000 bushels during June. Corn this year was in the best condition it has been on July 1 in more than a score of years, it being 6.5 points higher than a year ago, and 7.4 points higher than the 10 year average. With favorable weather officials believe the crop may surpass last year's record-breaking crop. The acreage of corn this year is 4.1 per cent larger than last year. America has never had a famine year. There is no land in the world that gives the agriculturist such rich returns for his labor, and there is no land in the world which produces such a wide variety of fruits, cereals and vegetables. To live in a land of such bounty should be occasion for all hearts to daily offer praise and thanksgiving before God.—United Presbyterian.

International Uniform Lesson for August 14

PAUL IN ICONIUM AND LYSTRA

Acts 14:1-28. Golden Text: Matt. 4:10

By JOHN A. EARL

The Lesson Text

The lesson is a vivid commentary on Acts 13:46. Lystra furnishes a picture of heathenism in its primitive form. In his missionary work, Paul met three types of people, viz., the Jew, the educated Greek, and the primitive pagan. Up to the present in our studies he has been dealing mainly with the Jew; later we shall find him addressing the cultivated Athenians; but today he is facing idolatry in all its native ignorance and superstition.

The Lesson Taught

Three lines from the hymn, "From Greenland's Icy Mountains," suggest the teaching points of this lesson: "The heathen in his blindness," "O ye whose souls are lighted," and, "Waft, waft, ye winds, this story."

"The Heathen in His Blindness"

In this line the poet has characterized heathenism in all ages and in every land. The heathen of Lystra were blind. They were blind with reference to the knowledge of the true and living God. They worshipped Zeus and Hermes and all the host of lesser gods of Greek mythology. When the lame man was healed by faith in the living Christ they thought that the gods had come down in the likeness of men, and proceeded to show their appreciation by sacrifices offered to Barnabas and Paul. One must know something of the Jewish abhorrence of idolatry to appreciate the revulsion of feelings which seized Paul and Barnabas as they sprang into the midst of the multitude to prevent, if possible, such an act of sacrilege. The address of Paul reveals the fact that he pitied the heathen in their blindness. He makes large allowance for their ignorance, and yet suggests that nature itself might have led them to a better conception of God than the idolatrous notions entertained by them. He had no other background upon which he might make an appeal to them. It was easier for Paul to heal the lame man than to cure the mental and moral blindness of the heathen of Lystra. The spiritual miracle is always the greater miracle. The heathen today will flock to Christian clinics for the relief that the missionary physician and surgeon may bring to them; but they are not so eager for spiritual healing. However, the true missionary never forgets that he is dealing with blindness of age-long standing, and he must cultivate patience in waiting for the spiritual miracle to work itself out through the slow process of Christian education. The idea that the heathen may be evangelized by some rapid-fire method is certainly not based either upon a sound exegesis of the New Testament or upon the facts of missionary history.

"O Ye Whose Souls Are Lighted"

We turn from the heathen of Lystra for a moment to look at the fearless missionaries, Paul and Barnabas. Nothing could stop them from preaching the gospel. When they were driven out of one city by the combined action of Jews and Gentiles, they immediately tramped to another city and began at once to reach the people with the good news of salvation. Driven out of Iconium they went to Lystra. At Lystra Paul was stoned until they thought he was dead and dragged him outside the city walls. It was their plan to put Paul out of the way as he was the chief preacher and leader. Paul, however, like his Master, could not die a minute before his appointed time. From Lystra they went to Derbe, and from Derbe they returned through the cities of Lystra and Iconium instead of going south from Derbe to Tarsus the home of Paul. One would think that after such treatment as Paul and Barnabas received at Lystra and Iconium they would have continued their journey southeast from Derbe to Tarsus and rested at Tarsus. But such is not the temper of the true missionary. When he enters upon his life work the missionary must go with Paul and never turn back with Mark. If he is called upon to leave his children in America during the years when he would greatly enjoy having them with him, he must make the sacrifice with a smile. If financial limitation due to meagre salary pinches and hurts he must never organize with his missionary brethren for larger stipend lest he lose the chief glory of a missionary—the glory of selfless service. If he is ever tempted to compare his salary with that of many pastors and most secretaries at home, he must resist the temptation remembering that missionaries should live above such worldly considerations. If he is overworked and overlooked he must take it all in good grace because he is a missionary, and it would be a sign of unspirituality for a missionary to complain. The missionary is in the true succession from Paul. He keeps the Acts of the Apostles from ever being a closed book. Iconium, Lystra and Derbe are now Yokohama, Peking and Madras.

"Waft, Waft Ye Winds This Story"

This line shows poetic license. The winds have their work to do and they do it well; but the winds were never called upon to carry the story of the Christ to pagan lands, unless the poet had in mind the old sailing vessel that has long since been discarded. The winds carried Paul and Barnabas to Cyprus, and from Cyprus to Pamphylia, and from Attalia back to Antioch in Syria; but the winds can never waft the story of the gospel anywhere as it carries vegetation. It must have human messengers in the person of Paul and Barnabas and all their successors. The Lystra of this lesson is only a very small section of the great unevangelized, unChristianized world which is open and hospitable to the gospel. The call is for men and women who will go in the spirit of Paul and with the message of Paul and with the training of Paul. No greater call comes to the young Christian today than the call to foreign missionary work. Who will answer, "Here am I, send me"?

The Church School

A plan to meet the chasm between the Sunday-school and the church.

By G. P. BURTON

There are few, if any Sunday-schools, but that are depleting the ranks of the church. We have great Sunday-schools, but hardly a corporal's guard attend the morning preaching services. Our young people are not being reached through the church. This situation is prevalent everywhere. It is up to the church to find a solution.

An executive board of classes was organized in our local Sunday-school at the suggestion of my deacons. Each class from the juniors up has a representative. These representatives form the executive board of classes. The superintendent and pastor are ex-officio members. The classes cannot be represented by the teachers. The meetings are monthly. One of the very first proposals of this board was to find a plan to meet this falling away of the morning attendance. It was proposed to work a credit system; but after several attempts it failed. Then it was suggested to merge the two into one, with the preaching service first. I was asked how long such a service should last. I suggested one hour and a half. That is three-quarters of an hour for each. Our first attempt was launched by putting on a special program lasting through the first half of the session. There were special numbers, with a short talk from the pastor. Then we assembled for the study period. It worked beautifully, starting at ten and out at eleven-thirty. The church voted to try out the plan for a month. After that period of time voted as a unit to adopt the plan. We are meeting our problem. Our boys and girls are getting the milk of the Word and our adults the meat.

Some weeks ago a visitor from a neighboring church was over. She went home and told her husband, a non-Christian man, about the new plan, and in her remarks she said: "The order of the little tots was perfect." Some days later the same man in his address before the Commercial Club said: "The Baptists of this city have met the problem between the Sunday-school and the church."

Ladies' Home Journeys

FIVE of them came to drink tea on Mrs. Willow's front porch in the suburbs—and every single one would have preferred to be on a vacation somewhere or other, but circumstances kept them home; even as you and I are hindered, perhaps.

"But I tell you what," said Mrs. Trotter, "I never let a little thing like staying home keep me from having a vacation!"

"What a paradox! Tell us how you manage?" the other four cried.

"Don't laugh," she begged, "but when things get at sixes and sevens because of the heat and the general impossibility of everything I just go—to S-Switzerland."

The others regarded her dumbly: "Meaning?"

"Oh, a personal Switzerland, of course, but when you've once been to the real place it's a true vacation to try this stunt of mine! I saw a little paragraph in Life several years ago headed: 'Have You a Little Switzerland?' All I have to do now is to quote it to myself and I feel cooled off mentally and physically as if I'd been in a far country, resting!"

"Quote it to us," the others begged.

"It isn't verbatim, this—but listen:

'Everybody should have a little Switzerland. Everybody should have a cool and lofty place in his mind, inaccessible to warring factions, and neutral. But it isn't safe to have a neutral spot unless it is protected by natural advantages. No neutral spot should be too low! Many cherished ideas of the mind, of permanent and abiding value, have been wiped out because of the inroads of nearly discordant elements. Think of the number of people whose minds are all low countries! If you have not in you at present a Switzerland, make one at once. Get a small but select group of snow-topped mountain peaks, reaching up into the blue vault of thought. Protect them by mountain passes. Thus, when you tire of the strife of the lower soul, of battle, murder and sudden death, of lusts and lootings and lies, you may have a protected vantage-ground, where battle-scarred thoughts may be nursed back to life, and calm cool actions planned. Where you can learn to yodel and the pure echo may be carried back through the clear air to your own heart!'

"Perfect!" they said, and a little silence came as a tribute to the Switzerland each was raising in her own mind.

Then the Lady-Who-Dwelt-in-a-Deadly-Apartment-House laughed: "Isn't it delicious what mere print does for us poor cribbed, cabined and confined mortals? Now here I am, an ardent worshipper of country nights with Katydid chirring in the meadow and a myriad stars twinkling at me from the vasty dome of heaven—and every summer I nearly die of yearning for a farm! Yet all I can hear is the chirr of city traffic and all I can see is a slip of sky up through the canyon of the tall neighboring apartment houses. Dead-dull on a sweltering summer evening. Then someone sent me a poem on 'City Stars' and I've had my eyes opened to the beauty of street canyons ever since."

"Quote it, do!" laughed Mrs. Trotter, "I may make it a substitute vacation for Switzerland!"

"I'm sure you will—this is the way it goes:

*"The ivory towers melt
Into the sapphire sky.*

* * *

*Golden and steady shine the city stars
From every window space
Helping the stars above.
Each light a glowing testament of toil,
Token of eager hand, and brain, and heart,
United for the service of the world.
On nights of cloud or mist or storm
When heaven's stars are dim
The city stars shine still,
Golden as dreams, radiant as love or work.*

* * *

*Human stars, not distant, no, nor cold,
Cheering stars, aglimmer at our need.
You who see no romance in city streets
To whom the city's changing voice is evil
And her beauty but a snare,
Do you not know the poem
Rewritten every twilight
To echo through the night?
The poem wrought of service,
Warm-hearted, earnest, constant,
Within the nimbus of each golden light.
The poem of tall towers of ivory
Fading against a tender sapphire sky—
The poem of city stars.*

* * *

*If your heart has not ears it cannot hear,
If your soul has not eyes it cannot see!"*

"Who wrote it?" asked the librarian. "Someone named Anna Bird Stewart," said the Apartment House Victim.

The Lady-With-Four-Children spoke up with a quavering voice: "Switzerland and stars seem vague sorts of vacations to me when there's the perpetual drudgery of dishes and deserts and beds and mending and sweeping! Here in my bag I've a letter that the postman handed me just as I was leaving the house in which my sister sends me a poem by Josephine Preston Peabody to prove I ought to leave the children for a while this summer! Listen, and see if you agree:

*'The little Road says Go,
The little House says Stay,
And oh, it's bonny here at home
But I must go away.*

*The little Road like me
Would seek and turn and know,
And forth I must, to learn the things
The little Road would show.*

*And go I must, my dears,
And journey while I may,
Though heart be sore for the little House
That had no word but Stay.*

*Maybe, no other way
Your child could ever know
Why a little House would have you stay
When the little Road says, Go!"*

A chorus of voices greeted her: "Oh, do leave them, even if it's only for a day! Families don't half appreciate a mother until they miss the things she does!"

"Maybe that's so," the little mother sighed, "anyhow I know I'm continually getting in a stew over nothing. If I could only know some way to start a day right!"

"Wait a minute!" cried their hostess, disappearing to return soon with a card which she usually kept in her mirror: "I never thought of this before as a home journey, but of course it is, for it always carries me straight off to a wonderful conference at Northfield where Mrs. Speer once gave us each this motto to begin our day with. I've always suspected that she wrote it herself, it's signed E. B. S. Listen to her: 'A Good Day':

'To waken in the morning serene and quiet with the thought of His love and His strength—joyous in the thought of those whom He has given us to love and serve,—humble in our weakness, and free from the shadow of self.

'To care for our bodies as His temple, and for our homes as His dwelling-place; striving to maintain in them that order, that beauty, and that law which He has ordained in His world.

'To meet those who serve us with appreciation and sympathy, and those whom we serve with forethought and consideration.

'To do the small duties with a sense that all faithful service ranks equally with God.

'To pass over the rough places with joy, and through the dark places with peace.

'To practice always His presence.

'To see the beauty He has made.

'To be where we are needed, and to make time for those who need us.

'To make little children happy, and to bring cheer to all whom we touch.

'To pass on our way unhurried, without care, realizing that His is the Kingdom, the power, and the glory, and in this knowledge welcoming the light.'"

By this time all four of them looked at the fifth young woman who had not spoken: "Ellen," they smiled, "what's a librarian for if she isn't to provide quotations for other helpless females? Haven't you a contribution to our home journeys?"

"Indeed I have," the librarian answered, "don't I sit mumbling it under my breath every one of these stifling days when that insufferable public-library-book-smell permeates the very air I breathe—sort of a sickish defunct leather decay smell! Ugh! Being a Cape Cod product I had to fish up something about the sea and the shore, so this is the poem which sits propped on my desk all day:

*The sea sang to me, Come away!
Come away from the drowsy shore;
The world beyond this sheltered bay
Is the world you are sighing for.*

*The shore sang to me, Stay, O stay,
On the bright and peaceful strand;*

*There's joy where the laughing billows play,
And there's rest on the golden sand.*

*There are dreams just as bright by the foaming shore,
As the faraway waters can brew,
And there's music as sweet in the breaker's roar,
As the whispers from infinite blue.*

*But the sea sang on, O come away
To the freedom of God's open door!
Better die on the way to gates of day,
Than dream like a slave on the shore."*

"I love it!" sighed the Switzerland exponent.

"I, too!" said She-of-the-City-Stars. While the Mother-of-Four-Children said: "Do you know? I've been to prayer-meetings in my day; but, my dears, nothing has ever opened such comforting vistas as these stay-at-home journeys on a front porch!"

The Young Reserves

Will o' the Wisp

ONCE upon a time there was a small white baby who was turned into a Church Bell, a Book-Seller, and a Regular All-Around Missionary whom everybody followed, greatly to the delight of his mother and father, who tried the experiment when everything else had failed.

For they had not been in this hot little village of India very long, and when Sunday mornings came around nobody ever seemed to know it. And of course Mr. Missionary did so much want to have people there to hear his sermon. Mrs. Missionary said nobody came because Sunday was so exactly like every other day in the week that there was no possible way for heathen men and women to know Sunday from Monday. "What we need is a church bell," she said; then she sighed, knowing the mission could never, never afford to buy one.

But of course there was Willie! Why not turn him into a church bell? So she put him inside his baby-carriage and handed him the little toy drum which some one had given him on Christmas. Then she trundled him down the dusty village street.

"Thump! Thump! Thumpety-thump-thump!" banged Willie, chuckling and dimpling all over his dear little round face. And neighbors came rushing to their doorways to see what in the world was happening.

"We're on our way to church," Mrs. Missionary would call out pleasantly. "Won't you come along with us?"

And it is a fact that one by one people tagged along, until a regular procession followed Willie's perambulator, where Willie himself sat beaming and thumping his noisy drum.

Mr. Missionary was never more astonished, and whispered to dear Mrs. Missionary that she was a "perfect genius," but she laughed and said she was sure anybody anywhere would follow such an adorable Will o' the Wisp! So after that, every single time there was to be a church service she turned Willie into a church bell again, and trundled him down the village roadway while he merrily thumped his toy drum.

Then there came a day when a big package full of Bibles arrived for Mr. Missionary. He had been waiting and waiting for those Bibles, because it made his heart ache to see grown men and women kneel in heathen temples and bow their heads in the dust before painted idols, carved from wood and stone. Like great, ugly dolls those idols sat in stony silence, while the heathen people brought rich presents to lay at their feet, and burned sweet-smelling incense to please them. But never a wooden idol budged one tiniest inch to touch the lovely present, or sniffed with delight at the incense. Do you wonder Mr. Missionary told the people in his village to read for themselves what the Bible tells of God, our Heavenly Father? But try as he would, he had a hard time persuading any one to buy.

"I have no money," said one man.

"I do not know how to read," said another.

"I am very busy," cried a third.

"Why should I have still another god to worship?" groaned a fourth. And so they one and all made excuses and excuses, until Mr. Missionary became almost discouraged.

But Mrs. Missionary knew there was always Willie. Surely Willie would be a born Book-Seller! So she put him into his baby-carriage with Bibles all around him, and she trundled him down the village roadway to the bazaar, or marketplace, where merchants were selling food and baskets and jewelry and clothes. She wheeled Willie under the shade of a great palm tree; then she opened one of the Bibles and put it in Willie's hands. He looked at it in the greatest surprise, and seemed so spellbound that a man passing by said to Mrs. Missionary: "Oh, mem sahib, I cannot believe my eyes, yet isn't this little white baby of yours reading?"

"It looks that way," laughed Mrs. Missionary. And at just that moment the baby solemnly turned over a page!

"Well, I never!" gasped the Hindu man, and peeped over the baby's shoulder to see what this foreigner's book was like.

"You really ought to own a copy for yourself," said Mrs. Missionary, and was about to get one from the bottom of the baby-carriage when Willie did the most unexpected thing. He crowed with delight and poked his Bible up into the face of the strange brown man! You may be sure the brown man took the book, and paid for it, and spread the news far and wide that the baby of the white sahib was selling books at the edge of the bazaar. "See, here is the very book that baby sold me! It is too comical; you should see him sitting there reading, like some ancient scholar!"

By this time quite a crowd had gathered to see the wonderful Baby-Who-Could-Read, and certainly he flapped the pages over, one by one, in the wisest kind of way, chuckling at his audience.

"It is amazing!" laughed these bystanders, and a number of them bought Bibles—some because they were amused, some because they were curious to see the book for themselves, and some because of the whiteness of this dimpled baby.

"Oh, mem sahib," they kept asking, "is he really white all over? Even under his clothes?"

"Oh, yes, he's white all over," Mrs. Missionary assured them, smiling. Whereupon one woman bought a Bible because she hoped it would make her little chocolate-colored baby turn white, also!

Willie proved such a successful Bible-seller that everywhere that Willie went Bibles were sure to go, too, and he thought it great fun to flap the leaves and have so many grown people try to take the book away from him. And always, everywhere, brown mothers would say enviously: "A Bible baby seems so different from a heathen baby."

"Very different," said Mrs. Missionary, and within a few weeks she was welcome inside almost every hut to tell people how a Bible Christian baby should be washed and fed and treated.

So that year when Mr. Missionary sent home his report to his church in America, he wrote: "There is one new missionary on this field who is not receiving any salary, yet he regularly goes out and brings people to hear me preach, he is a remarkable book-seller, and has ably assisted my wife in starting a weekly Mothers' Meeting. Thinking you may care to see a picture of this helpful young Will o' the Wisp, we are enclosing his latest photograph."

And everybody in that church in America smiled lovingly at the picture of that dear little two-year-old missionary sitting

TRUE TEMPERANCE IN HEART AND IN LIFE

1 Thess. 5:4-11

(Temperance Meeting)

By O. G. CHRISTGAU,

Editor American Issue

"We are not of the night, nor of darkness. Therefore let us not sleep, as do others; but let us watch and be sober."

True temperance in heart and life means much more than the definition of the word found in the dictionary and very much more than the ordinary idea of what temperance means. Although temperance is usually defined as moderation in eating and drinking the use of the word has made it mean total abstinence from the use of intoxicating liquors.

Considering temperance as abstinence the Christian's duty relative thereto is two-fold. He should practice and he should promote temperance. While the former is important the latter is infinitely more important. The practice of temperance gives Christians the mental and physical strength insured by sobriety. It gives to those dependent upon them and associated with them the benefits and blessings resulting from clean, temperate and efficient living. Thus while the practice of personal temperance is of great value to the Christian himself and of considerable value to others it is after all a selfish virtue. The good of personal temperance is limited to only a few. Personal temperance is temperance in life but not really temperance in heart.

True temperance in heart means the desire to promote temperance, that is, to bring its blessings to others. In the age-long conflict against alcoholic intemperance it has been learned that prohibition is the most effective way to promote temperance. Prohibition as we understand it with reference to alcoholic beverages means the laws forbidding men to make others intemperate. Most Christian citizens believe that it is good citizenship as well as good Christianity for them to observe prohibition laws. Many however do not realize as they should that merely observing the laws is selfish temperance. By insisting upon and assisting in the enforcement of prohibition Christian citizens help bring its benefits to their fellow men not only in America now but eventually to the people of all the world.

This is my first convention and it has made me love my church and Sunday school and B. Y. P. U. and the best of all Christ, who died on the cross for my sins.—Mrs. Pearl Payles.

This is my first convention I have attended but it has shown me clearer than ever before the meaning of Christianity and the great task before our young people in going to the whole world with the message of salvation.—Myrtle Pettit.

I believe this convention has drawn our Baptist young people closer to God and has given us strength to live better lives for his glory.—Ernestine Marsh.

This was my first convention but it has helped me to see the great work to be done and has prepared me for better service. I hope to attend the one at St. Paul next year.—Ruth Wietholter.

Each convention of our B. Y. P. U. proves to our young people that we each have a small but great place to fill in the ranks lined up for service to our God, carrying the precious message of salvation by grace through faith in Jesus Christ as Saviour unto all the world, and not just to our own beloved U. S. A.—Stella Marsh.

This convention has made me want more than ever to be either a foreign or home missionary.—Thelma McIntyre.

This convention has given me greater courage to speak to others about their soul's salvation, and with prayer I expect to do same.—Ethel Reedy.

This convention has made me realize what wonderful things consecrated prayer can do.—Clara Highland.

This convention has been the greatest inspiration of my life. I have pledged myself to God's service, through its influence, I pray God I may be able to use the talents he has given me.—Beryl Foster Irwin.

This convention has caused me to see the vast needs of the world and to give myself over entirely to work for Christ in such a way or place that the Lord thinks best.—Gaylord Lee.

I think this convention has made me a stronger Christian and will help me in our B. Y. P. U. work of winning souls to Christ.—Beatrice Marsh.

This convention has filled me with a desire to help carry on the work of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ unto the whole world.—Jennie Truitt.

This convention has shown the divine spirit of God, and in my heart is created a desire to love him and serve him more than ever.—Mrs. Angeline Nicastro.

This convention has made me realize the need of Christian workers. It has given me vigor and zeal to live a life for Jesus.—Marjorie Drake.

This convention has inspired me to do a greater and larger work for my Lord and Master.—Ruth Gregg.

The Cincinnati convention, although the first I have ever attended and that I am an infant in B. Y. P. U. work, has given me an inspiration that I had never dreamed of, and I am going back to my union better prepared to do the work of my Master, and determined to do it.—R. F. Sexton.

Though Cincinnati is my first B. Y. P. U. convention, I can now say to my Master, "I'll go where you want me to go, dear Lord, o'er mountain or plain, or sea. I'll be what you want me to be, dear Lord. I'll do what you want me to do."—Clara Godwin.

This convention has given me the real and only life. May God's will be that I may give all I have and more.—Fern Warner.

This convention has drawn me closer to my Lord, and I pray for the grace and strength to do his will at all times.—Thomas H. Field.

God has blessed me very much. I am going back to win souls for my Jesus.—A. C. Johnson.

I never before realized how important it is for every Baptist to attend this convention. Wisconsin will be on the map next year at St. Paul.—Blenda Jackson.

The convention has been a great thing to me. It has drawn me closer to heathen fields.—Roy W. Dodson.

I am going home from this convention to do more for Christ's Kingdom than ever before.—William Lansing.

The convention has been a great inspiration to me, and has helped me to consecrate my life to the Master.—Edythe Rawson.

The convention held at Cincinnati, Ohio, has made me dedicate my life more fully to the work of the Lord.—Lois Sanders.

This convention has been full of Christian love among the young people.—Mrs. B. E. Drake.

This convention has given me a new passion for lost souls.—Richard Holland.

I am leaving the convention with a longing in my heart that at the St. Paul convention the Minnesota young people may hear Dr. Gibson's messages on soul winning and Mr. Greenlaw's inspirational singing.—Hannah Olson.

"A Warless World by 1923," Says C. E. Convention

With the adoption of a new slogan, "A Warless World by 1923," the Sixth World's Christian Endeavor Convention closed Monday night, July 11, and, as Dr. Francis E. Clark, founder and president of the Christian Endeavor Society, declared, it was in many respects the greatest gathering of the kind ever held. The previous slogan, adopted at the convention in Atlantic City in 1911, was "A Saloonless Nation by 1920."

There was intense enthusiasm the last evening when the 16,000 and more delegates, representative of the entire world, adopted the new slogan. Throughout the entire convention there was one belief expressed by every speaker, by banker and statistician, by foreign missionary and statesman, by preacher and economist, and even mentioned in letters received from both the President and Vice-President of the United States. Briefly, it was that the only solution of existing world problems lay in a general adoption and application of Christian principles.

Dr. Francis E. Clark was jubilant the last evening as he dismissed the representatives of the great organization he founded, an organization now having 4,000,000 members, in 80,000 societies, living on five continents and speaking over 100 languages. "Despite the heat," he said, "their spirit has been splendid from start to finish. The officers of the Christian Endeavor Society are most grateful to the city of New York for its hearty reception and cordial co-operation. May I especially cite the Mayor of this great municipality, the Police Department and the Park Department for making possible the inspiring Christian Citizenship Parade and Demonstration of Saturday."

"We are most thankful that this final day has brought, in the announcement of President Harding's invitation for a disarmament conference, an answer to our prayers. We fully realize as our new slogan testifies, the great need of the hour, the rare opportunity for organized Christian Endeavor to meet the perils threatening modern civilization."

"We have gained from this convention the spirit and incentive to go back to our homes and carry forward the great work to which we are consecrated. Christian Endeavor is stronger than ever, better organized, and has a mighty fine staff of field secretaries throughout the world. Our future was never so bright, especially as we find the various denominations growing more receptive, almost day by day."

"We have planned and await the opportunity to launch a great campaign in Russia. Christian Endeavor is well established in Finland, Latvia, Hungary, Estonia, Poland and Jugo-Slovakia, also in Persia, India, China and Korea, so that we can march into poor Russia from every side when the gates are opened. The Greek Catholic Church of Russia is favorable to our plans and will co-operate heartily. Christian Endeavor, you know, does its work through existing denominational churches and does not establish itself independently."

Commencement of the Bethel Institute

By G. A. HAGSTROM

The usual series of events associated with the closing of the Bethel Academy began early in May and culminated in the commencement, when the spacious Academy auditorium was filled to overflowing. The exercises included the usual numbers, among which it is worthy of note that the salutatorian, August Berg, and the valedictorian, Bengt Anderson, have neither of them been in this land more than six years. Greetings were presented on behalf of the school board by its time-honored president, Dr. Frank Peterson. The commencement speaker was Rev. Walter E. Woodbury pastor of Trinity Church, Minneapolis, who chose as his theme "Achieving the impossible," and gave a message of high order with a sterling ring. The president conferred diplomas on a class numbering thirty-nine in the academic department, twenty-six in the commercial department, and one in the music department. Fifteen received scholarships and prizes. The senior class left as its gift to the school an electric clock and signal system, connecting the office and class rooms. Of the senior class, five were born in Sweden, one in Finland, the remainder in the United States. The average age of the Academic graduates was twenty-two. No less than 85 per cent came from Baptist homes and all the graduates, except three, were professing Christians and members of some church. Nineteen of the thirty-nine academic graduates and several of the others have definitely consecrated their lives to Christian work, seven of them purposing to enter Bethel Theological Seminary. Between 55 and 60 per cent of the graduates plan to continue their education in some higher institution of learning. Self support was strong among these graduates, for 85 per cent of them have supported themselves in whole or in part during their entire course. Of the senior class one, Vernon Berg, died after four weeks' illness, only four days previous to the graduation of his class.

Four days later the commencement of the Bethel Theological Seminary was held in the Bethel Swedish Church, Minneapolis. It has, during the whole fifty years of its existence, been the custom to hold its commencement in one of the churches. The enrollment of the seminary has been fifteen this year, of whom three graduated, having completed the regular three year, Th. B., course. These seniors have settled in pastorates as follows: Axel A. Anderson, Eveleth, Minn.; Arthur B. Nelson, Grantsburg, Wis.; Fred L. Moberg, Maynard and Leentho, Minn. Five scholarships were distributed at this time. All of the seminary students and fourteen of the ministerial students in the academy, with the exception of four who comprise Bethel quartette, are acting as student supplies in the churches and on fields from the Atlantic to the Pacific Coast. The quartette is touring, with a pianist and violinist, throughout the East in the interest of the school. The death during the year of the highly valued and deeply lamented Dr. Emanuel Schmidt, has compelled the remaining members of the faculty to take on his subjects, distributing them among Dean C. G. Lagergren, Prof. Adolf Olson, and the undersigned, with the exception of one subject which has been taught by Prof. E. A. Finstrom of the Bethel Academy, thus giving the students their full course.

New teachers for the academy for the coming year will be Miss Violet Wallendorf, St. Paul, daughter of Y. P. and S. S. Director G. E. Wallendorf; and Mrs. Edna Peterson Kent, Spokane, Wash. The vacancy in the theological seminary will be filled by election at the annual meeting of the Swedish General Conference in September, which gathering is to be held in the Twin Cities, when the fiftieth jubilee of the founding of the seminary by Dr. J. A. Edgren will be observed.

Among the announcements of gifts are the following: $1,000 preferred stock Thompson Smith Shoe Company, St. Paul, by D. D. Smith of St. Paul; $1,000 Liberty Bond by William Granholm, Alba, Mich.; one set of coils for wireless and electrical work from Noyes Bros. and Cutler, through Mr. G. I. Hedberg; donations of books from Mr. & Mrs. A. F. Gale, Rev. and Mrs. J. J. Runyan, Minneapolis, and Mrs. J. M. Hill, Northfield, Minn., and others.

Among needs for the coming year is a new dormitory to house the out-of-town girls and we are praying and hoping that some good Baptist will be prompted by a kind Providence to erect one as a memorial building to the memory of some loved one and the glory of the Lord.

A former student of the Academy, David E. Matson, was drowned at Lake Phalen June 25. The wife of a recent graduate of the Academy, Rev. Arthur H. Nelson, passed to her heavenly reward, June 28.

Thus, with the minor and major notes in the festivities of the year before us, we look forward to a new year with courage, good cheer, and trust in the God who in his goodness and wisdom has planted this institution.

St. Paul, Minn.

Wisconsin News and Notes

The State Convention

Wisconsin Baptists are not as large numerically as Baptists in some other states, but their state convention is one of the most efficient in the territory of the Northern Baptist Convention. One of the most important offices is that of secretary-treasurer, but most of the men of the state forget that and simply call the one who holds this place the business manager. And he is all of that. A few years ago when the convention came into possession of some trust funds, and there was a need for some one to have charge of the office in the absence of the state superintendent, Mr. H. W. Bardenwerper, who had been the treasurer of the convention for fifteen years was secured to give his full time to the work. He grew up with the B. Y. P. U. movement, and graduated into a first-class layman with all the interests of the local church on his heart. Now when you visit the Baptist Headquarters at 1717 Wells Street, Milwaukee, you will meet a genial gentleman, who carries practically all the business of the convention. Such an officer is a paying investment, for in the two years Mr. Bardenwerper has saved his salary to the convention several times over. He does it by being on the job, and taking advantage of every opportunity to turn a bond or a piece of property to a good advantage. Besides doing all this he saves the superintendent much time and worry, by his careful management of the office affairs. This is written because Wisconsin believes such an officer indispensable, and because other states in this as in many other matters, are following Wisconsin's lead in creating a similar office in their conventions.

A Novel Experiment

This year the church at Hudson, with Vernon Robbins as pastor did a unique piece of work. For some time it had been apparent to many that the machinery was not functioning properly. There was a determination to find out just what the matter was and so a novel plan was worked out. Several committees were appointed to study the church in all of its departments. It not only did this, but it also took pains to discover the standing of the church among the people of the community. And then after all of this was done there was a meeting of the church at which the reports of the various committees were given. But it did not stop there. It at once began plans to rectify all the weak places discovered with the result that the church is moving forward in a splendid way. Some other churches might try this. Some splendid property improvements are being made in both the church building and the parsonage.

The Rural Fields

In Wisconsin we have many rural fields. In fact probably 85 per cent of our fields would be so classified. The Home Mission Society is making some experiments in rural work in this state. At the last meeting of the state convention a rural department was created, and a committee appointed to have charge of the work. The committee has had several meetings. It has been instrumental in inducing the regents of the State University at Madison to open a school for rural pastors next year at the summer sessions. Score one for the Baptists who did this work alone! This will be a great help to all the denominations of this state.

Vacation Days

We are now in the midst of vacation days. The summer assembly at Green Lake comes off in August, and a record enrollment has already been made. The workmen are busy putting up Hurlburt Hall so as to have it for the sessions. Several outside speakers will be present as well as some of our own people.

Some of our pastors will spend their vacation at home, heroically holding down the job, that is so they say, but as a matter of fact the high cost of vacationing is keeping them at home. Several will go to Winona Lake, and others will simply go north and rest. Rev. R. G. Pierson expects to make a trip eastward, and will preach two Sundays in the Church of the Redeemer, Yonkers, N. Y., Rev. Robert W. Shaw expects to go into Kansas and will preach one Sunday at Ottawa where he attended college.

More Improvements

The Wauwatosa Church, George C. Alborn, pastor expects to provide a splendid Sunday-school equipment for itself this autumn.

The Waushara group of Baptist churches with H. E. Mansfield as pastor is repairing and enlarging some of the plants. This is a group of Baptist churches working together and doing an aggressive work. This summer the convention provided an assistant for the pastor and things are coming along splendidly.

The church at Appleton expects to build a new edifice next summer.

Pastor's Wives Attention

Our splendid church at Beaver Dam this year decided to do the unusual thing. It told the pastor to remain at home and take care of the children and sent his wife to the convention at Des Moines, with expenses paid. Mrs. Morris served as one of the committee-men from Wisconsin. She has a large place in the affections of the students of Wayland Academy.

I rise to second the motion of Dr. W. H. Geistweit. Let's quit, and get onto our job! A prominent layman said to the writer at Des Moines, "If you preachers don't stop your bickering over theology, we laymen will have to push you aside and take the leadership ourselves." Who would blame them if we continue to keep up our wrangling? Yes, let's quit, and get onto the job of making Christ known to a world that needs him so much.

WESTERN WASHINGTON

Summer Assembly

Western Washington Baptist Summer Assembly, under the direction of Carl B. Forland, state president B. Y. P. U., Rev. T. H. Hagen, dean of faculty, will be held on the Assembly grounds at Burton (Vashon Island), August 9-19. Some improvements have been made on the grounds since the last assembly which will add to the attractiveness and the convenience of campers, among them being a tennis court.

Daily schedule includes Bible study and various classes in young people's and Sunday-school work and missions, with the various recreational features that the young people enjoy.

The faculty, in addition to the dean, will be: Rev. John Snape, Oakland, Cal.—Bible Study; Rev. T. B. Frizelle, Philadelphia, Pa.—B. Y. P. U. Work; Rev. A. W. Rider, Los Angeles, Cal.—Missions; Rev. H. R. Chapman, Ann Arbor, Mich.—Missions; Mrs. A. W. Rider, Los Angeles, Cal.—Sunday-school Work; Mrs. J. E. Noftsinger, Mt. Vernon, Wash.—Junior B. Y. P. U. Work; Miss Nan F. Heflin, Tacoma, Wash.—Intermediate B. Y. P. U.; Mrs. F. B. Matthews, Seattle, Wash.—Intermediate Girls (W. W. G.); Mrs. J. C. Keith, Seattle, Wash.—Church School of Missions; Mrs. Frieda C. Davidson, Seattle, Wash.—Course for Junior Boys and Girls; Rev. Earl Cochran, Lyman, Wash.—Musical Director.

Among the preachers and lecturers will be heard Rev. E. M. Poteat, of New York; Rev. C. O. Johnson, of Tacoma; Rev. W. E. Henry, of Everett; Rev. Geo. L. White, of Los Angeles, Cal.; Rev. L. C. Barnes, of New York; Prof. G. E. Schlauch, McMinnville, Ore.; Miss Luciele Withers, China; and Rev. J. F. Watson, of Seattle. The indications are there will be a large attendance.

THE BAPTIST MINISTERS' CONFERENCE OF SEATTLE held its last session for the season in the form of a picnic for the preachers and their families at Woodland Park, Seattle, on July 11. There was a large attendance, over eighty being present, of whom about twenty-five were young people who had a table by themselves. At a short business session, Rev. F. B. Matthews was elected president for the coming year, Rev. F. E. Dark, vice-president, and Rev. A. H. Nickell, secretary of the association. The afternoon was spent in social visiting and various recreational features and games. After supper, brief reports were given of the Northern Baptist Convention by Drs. A. M. Bailey, J. F. Watson and G. F. Holt.

ON SUNDAY, JULY 10, the Lynden Church, Rev. Charles Baker, pastor, rededicated its building which has been greatly enlarged and improved. Dr. J. F. Watson, executive secretary of the Western Washington Convention, preached the dedicatory sermon. They have been using the enlarged building for a few weeks and both the Sunday school and congregations have shown a gratifying increase. With these greater facilities for their work, it is expected that this vigorous church will make steady growth.

At 3:30, Dr. Lucile Withers will give an inspirational address.

SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA

J. HARVEY GUNN has closed his pastorate at San Luis Obispo and moved to his ranch at Pasadena. His friends may address him R. F. D. No. 2 that place. After a period of rest he will engage in some other work in an effort to completely recover his health. At a reception, largely attended, given by the church members of the church and outsiders spoke words of esteem in which Mr. and Mrs. Gunn were held. The church presented them with a costly electric lamp as a token of their love.

KANSAS

Rev. C. C. OVEREEM is resigning at Morristown to take effect Aug. 1. He has not announced his plans for the future.

PASTOR H. T. CLARK of Williamstown was assisted recently by Rev. E. H. Williamson of Kansas City. The work was greatly strengthened.

EVANGELIST H. A. HUNT conducted special meetings recently at Horace with fifteen additions to the church. The field is now being cultivated by Missionary-Evangelist H. D. Hughes.

THE NEW CHURCH BASEMENT at Anthony was set apart July 7. This added equipment will be a great help in the work, especially in the Sunday-school and young people's work. Pastor J. P. Woods and people feel encouraged with the outlook for the future.

A NEW CHURCH BASEMENT has just been completed at Greensburg, giving much needed room for the growing work there. Forty-seven new members have been received recently, thirty-nine of them by baptism. Pastor A. H. Dent is rejoicing in the development of this important work.

Rev. J. W. BAYLES has accepted a call to the Western Wichita Church, and will enter upon the work there Aug. 1. Pastor Bayles did a good work at Salina and goes to the church in Wichita with constructive plans for the work there.

ON JUNE 12 the Beloit and Asherville churches joined in their fiftieth anniversary in Chautauqua Park near Beloit. L. B. Parker is pastor at Beloit and C. F. Wilson at Asherville.

Rev. W. C. BARCLAY, pastor of the Ruby Avenue Church in Kansas City, was recently united in marriage to Miss Goodrich, who was until recently assistant to Pastor F. L. Streeter of Armourdale. The young couple are already occupying the Ruby Avenue parsonage.

PASTOR J. H. REYNOLDS of Overland Park was assisted recently in special meetings by Rev. W. E. Dederick of Frederick. A good work was accomplished.

THE NEGRO BAPTISTS of Kansas held a helpful summer school July 4 to 8 at the State Industrial Institute, just east of Topeka. They are making this a permanent phase of their work. Prof. W. A. Sharp and Prof. L. M. Denton of Kansas City Seminary and Director J. M. Gurley had places on their program.

MISSIONARY W. A. AYRES of Wichita has just brought out a history of the Walnut Valley Association. He is quite comprehensive in his treatment, giving many life sketches and vital details. It is a valuable contribution to the historical documents of our Baptist work in the State.

Rev. W. A. FARRELL, until recently pastor at Neodesha, has accepted a call to the church at Eureka, and goes on the field at once.

IOWA

ON JULY 9-10, JOSEPH E. REED was ordained to the gospel ministry at Willage Creek, Iowa, by a council which had been duly called for that purpose. Dr. G. P. Mitchell was moderator and Rev. A. G. Lagerquist clerk. The sermon was preached by Dr. Mitchell. Willage Creek occupies an interesting place in Swedish Baptist history, for here is located a church of sixty members organized by Rev. Mr. Viberg in 1853 on a visit to this country from Sweden. The highest peak in the center of the valley is to this day known as "The Pulpit" from the name given it by Mr. Viberg. The church, which is best known as "Center Church," has sent out many strong men into the Lord's work, including Dr. Frank Peterson of Minneapolis, and Dr. Robert Earl, an able physician and surgeon of St. Paul. The Swedish Baptist Conference of America held its annual conference here in 1879.

FIRST CHURCH, COUNCIL BLUFFS: As a result of a forward drive from May 8 to June 19, twenty-three new members were received into full fellowship of the church, ten of these coming by baptism, while seven others are awaiting the administration of that ordinance. Several others have sent for their church letters. Ninety-six new scholars were enrolled in the Sunday school and the average attendance for the month of June showed an increase of eighteen over the preceding month. June 1 Miss Cynthia Gilbert, who had been the assistant at the First Church of Sioux City, came to assist in the work for a period of six months. The church paid the pastor's expenses to the Northern Baptist Convention. Twenty other members of the church attended that meeting. Eight of our young people are planning to attend the Assembly at Iowa Falls. July 14 the church held a farewell reception for Miss Anne Ruth Harris, who sails for China in August. After a splendid program in charge of Mrs. J. B. Long, she was presented with a steamer rug and a purse as a slight token of the esteem in which she is held and a wish for a safe journey to her field.

MICHIGAN

BELDING:—Walter A. Biss began the tenth year of his pastorate with the Belding church Sunday, June 5. Past year has been one of steady progress. The church took a strong part in sending contributions to the N. W. M. and will endeavor to meet its obligations. It is facing the problem of a new Sunday school room. The men's Bible class, of which the pastor is teacher, held a picnic at a nearby lake on July 9. The members of the class took their wives along and the afternoon was most enjoyable. Congregations continue good even though the hot weather is trying.

DETROIT, SCOTTEN AVE. The daily vacation Bible school is a big success under the leadership of Pastor N. A. Steinkraus. Sunday congregations are the largest in years during the summer.

OHIO

GREEN CAMP, MARION ASSOCIATION, Rev. W. W. Crabtree, pastor. A fine new church building costing some $27,000 was dedicated on July 17, a day of unusual victory for both pastor and church. It is a village church of some 125 resident members. On the day of dedication, after a brief sermon by Dr. T. W. Powell, Pastor Crabtree announced that there was debt of $10,000 that must be provided for before the prayer of dedication. And with an optimism that surprised everybody he proclaimed, "It will be done this very hour! We will begin with $500 pledges. We must have six." Then he said, "I have here the offer of one man from Marion that he will give the last thousand dollars provided the rest is all raised now." And then this hopeful persistent pastor went on with tact and talent for money raising until in less than an hour not only the whole debt was pledged but by evening that total had amounted to $11,796. Then the pastor, by request of the other ministers present, offered the heartfelt prayer of joyful dedication. At the afternoon service, twenty-two young converts were baptized, after a sermon by Rev. H. K. Freeman who had been assisting the pastor in ten days revival services. Much inspiration in the meetings and in the Sabbath dedication was given by the songs of the noted singers from Newport, Ky., Mr. & Mrs. Hughes who were heard in such delight at the Lima state convention in May. The two weeks of these two sweet singers in Green Camp will never be forgotten. But the great victory belongs to the consecrated men and women of the Green Camp church led on by a great evangelist pastor.—T. W. P.

FIRST, CHESTER, J. A. Maxwell, pastor, passed a resolution reaffirming, "in the spirit of unity and love," its faith in the doctrines set forth in the conference at Des Moines.

BLOCKLEY CHURCH, Philadelphia, John A. Hainer, pastor, has adopted the Des Moines confession.

THE SUMMER ASSEMBLY for Northeastern Pennsylvania was held at Keystone Academy, July 4-11, with Principal Curtis P. Coe as dean. About seventy-five registered. All were delighted with the Academy and its surroundings, and with the courses of instruction and have expressed the purpose of returning next year, bringing others with them. Dr. H. J. Whalen, of Greensburg, delivered lectures on the first two nights and conducted a very informing course on Baptist history. The choir of the Calvary Church, Taylor, under the leadership of the musical director of the assembly, Mr. R. E. Watkins, gave a delightful evening program. Dr. Sumner N. Vinton impressed the young people greatly with his two illustrated missionary lectures. The courses in the Bible, given by Pres. Milton G. Evans and Prof. I. D. Matthews, of Crozer Seminary, laid a solid foundation for future individual study. The A. B. P. S. contributed largely to the value of the assembly in furnishing as instructors Rev. S. L. Roberts, Milton M. McGorrell and Mrs. Elizabeth Finn. The mission study course was taught by Miss Elizabeth Sargent and Rev. Floyd Carr, of Wilkesburg, presented Baptist missions. A class in social service was conducted by Rev. Will C. Chappell, of Pittsburgh, and one on psychology by Rev. O. C. Horsman of Erie. Rev. C. O. Wright general secretary of the Christian Association, U. of P., was physical director, and presented courses in "Successful Teaching" and "Teen Age Activities." He also preached at the Sunday morning and evening services. The life work service was conducted by Rev. Rittenhouse Neisser, associate secretary of the education board, which is charged with the conduct of the summer assemblies. The local churches were very cordial in their support during the entire week.

WESTERN PENNSYLVANIA

REV. W. J. JOHN, Canonsburg, reports Daily Vacation Bible Schools at four new centers this season. The interest awakened in the community is marked by strong enthusiasm.

JOHNSTON AVE. CHURCH, Rev. W. Spencer Skinner, pastor, has been closed for three Sundays while the work of remodeling was going on. It was opened again on July 17. About $3,000 has been spent on improvements. Concrete steps lead to the main entrance. Both Sunday-school room and auditorium are much larger. A new heating plant has been installed, and both church and parsonage have been painted.

THE TRAINING INSTITUTE for Vacation School workers, conducted June 27-29 in the Smithfield Street M. E. Church, was an unprecedented success. Fifteen instructors were employed and over 130 were in attendance. Rev. E. A. Harrar was the acknowledged leader among the speakers and he also had charge of the craft, or expressional work; but he was ably assisted by experienced workers from various denominations.

REV. W. W. WEST, pastor at Sheraden, was operated upon recently for cataract. The operation was successful, and Mr. West expects to resume his labors in full at an early date.

NEW YORK

After the Northern Baptist Convention at Des Moines Dr. A. W. Beaven, pastor of the Lake Avenue Church of Rochester, went to Lake Geneva, Wis., where he was the conference pastor for the Employed Officers' Conference of the International Y. M. C. A., speaking three times on three consecutive days. Dr. Beaven will be out of the pulpit of the Lake Avenue Church for his vacation during the weeks from July 17 to Aug. 14, inclusive. During his absence the pulpit will be supplied by Rev. S. D. Bawden, of Kavali, India, missionary pastor of the church; Rev. S. W. Beaven, associate pastor of the church; Rev. C. H. Moehlman, Rochester, N. Y., and Dr. Edward Holyoke, of Providence, R. I.

THE CLOSE of the first full year of work at the First Church, Batavia, under the direction of Rev. George K. Warren, finds all departments in a well organized condition, showing great increase of attendance and interest. The church has raised more money for current expenses and missions than in any year of its history. Two new features introduced, a calling committee of thirty women, each one assigned a special territory, and a junior choir of thirty voices for the evening service have done valuable work.

CONNECTICUT

THE FIRST CHURCH OF NEW LONDON has engaged Miss Mabel E. Brown as pastor's assistant. Miss Brown was formerly assistant to Rev. A. C. Archibald at the First Church of Lowell, Mass., and later at the First Church of Brookline. The New London Church has reorganized its educational work. A board of religious education has been elected by the church to have charge of all the educational work of the church. The expenses of the church school are now met by the church treasury. Miss Brown will give herself to the development of this educational work. A vacation school is being conducted for a five-week period. The pastor, Rev. Chester H. Howe, is to conduct courses on the Bible at the Rhode Island Summer School of Sunday-school Methods. Audiences at all the church services have been well maintained.

REV. E. E. GATES was the preacher at Colchester on July 3, when at the close of the service three Russian convicts were baptized by Rev. I. E. Wasilenko of New York.

REV. J. G. WARD, pastor of the Plainville Church, baptized two candidates on July 10.

ON SUNDAY EVENING July 10, Major E. V. Preston, a life-long prominent member of the Asylum Avenue Church, Hartford, passed away, aged 84. Mr. Preston was a Civil War veteran, and for more than half a century one of the outstanding figures in the insurance world, being a prominent official of the Travelers Insurance Company.

REV. E. E. GATES baptized three candidates at the Naugatuck Church, Sunday evening, July 17, Rev. F. C. Lamb, pastor.

VERMONT

THE FIRST CHURCH, BRATTLEBORO, and the many friends of the Rev. Clark T. Brownell throughout the state and elsewhere will rejoice in the honor which was conferred upon him by Colgate University giving him the degree of doctor of divinity. Dr. Brownell is a thorough student and excellent preacher and pastor and is in every way worthy of this honor from his alma mater.

REV. A. J. BOWSER, pastor at Windsor, has received a call from the First Church, Delaware, Ohio, and has tended his resignation to take effect at Windsor, Aug. 1. Mr. Bowser has had three pastorates in the state; namely, Readsboro, Addison and Windsor, doing good work on each field, both from a spiritual and financial standpoint.

THE EAST DOVER CHURCH, Rev. C. O. Dunham, pastor, is moving steadily forward along all lines. Recently seven were received into the church by baptism, five of them being from one family—father, mother and three children. New horse sheds have been built and the church edifice has been renovated and redecorated so that it is now very attractive. Other improvements have been made to the church property and cushions have been added to the pews for the comfort of the worshippers.

THE ENOSBURG FALLS CHURCH, Rev. E. E. Scates, pastor, recently secured an interchangeable letter sign for the public announcement of its services. On the seventh anniversary of the wedding of Pastor and Mrs. Scates, the Ladies' Aid Society presented them with a mammoth wedding cake and a new electric grill. The Sunday-school observed its annual picnic at Lake Carmi and on a recent Sunday the Modern Woodmen of America attended church in a body.

REV. A. S. WAHL has declined the call extended him by the Wallingford Church and will remove from Vermont Aug. 1.

THE CHURCH AT WEST HAVEN has extended a call to the Rev. George E. Williams, formerly pastor at West Pawlet. Mr. Williams has accepted the same and is already at work on the field. We are glad to welcome him back to the state.

REV. C. B. DANSE, for several years one of our faithful pastors, laboring at East Randolph, Lincoln, and North Troy, has tendered his resignation to the last named church and will remove to Rumney, N. H., Aug. 1 where he becomes pastor. Mr. Danse has proven himself a versatile worker and we regret losing him from the state.

MAINE

FOR MANY YEARS the Baptist and the Free Baptist churches in Oakland have held fine church properties on the same street and within ten rods of each other's doors. Recently under the leadership of Pastor-Evangelist Beatty, these churches have united and the United Baptist Church of Oakland will be one of the strong Baptist churches of the state. It has recently called to its pastorate Rev. H. G. Kennedy who has held important pastorates at Houlton and at Old Town. Recently he has been serving as secretary for Maine of the Lord's Day League. Mr. Kennedy will begin his pastoral duties about Sept. 1.

REV. A. C. BERRIE of the Washington Street Church, Eastport, has been called to the Baptist Church at St. Albans, Vt. Mr. Berrie has had a very significant and successful pastorate at Eastport and has proved himself an able leader in denominational affairs in the section. He has also been president of the Maine Baptist Ministers' Association and at present is the representative of Washington Association on the convention board. Mr. Berrie is an able preacher and an efficient organizer.

EVANGELIST HARRY TAYLOR will be the supply at the United Baptist Church Lewiston for the first four Sundays in July. Pastor Finnie, is enjoying a richly deserved vacation of two months.

REV. GEORGE R. REEVES, Newton 1919, who for the past two years has been the successful pastor at Hadley, Michigan, becomes pastor of the Getchell Street Church, Waterville. He is the successor of Rev. Benjamin Beatty, who closed his very successful pastorate in order to accept appointment as one of the pastor evangelists of the state convention thus carrying his special evangelistic gifts to a broader field. Waterville evidently regards Michigan as a good hunting ground.

MR. W. RUSSELL has taken the pastorate of the federated churches in Edgecomb. He has entered the work energetically and the outlook is promising along some unusual lines.

A Double Ordination

A Council convened by the Baptist church of Charleston on July 12 ordained to the Gospel ministry, Mr. and Mrs. Emmet Russell. Dr. T. J. Ramsdell was elected moderator of the council and Rev. R. M. Trafton, clerk. The statements made by the candidates for ordination were remarkably clear, comprehensive and satisfactory and the vote recommending ordination was unanimous. Ordination services were held in the evening with the following program:

Invocation, Rev. L. A. Farrar; Scripture reading, Mrs. Violet Bagley; prayer, Rev. Perley E. Miller; sermon, Dr. Ramsdell; ordaining prayer, Rev. Nathan Hunt; original poem, Mrs. Mary B. Wingate; welcome to the ministry, Rev. R. M. Trafton; charge to candidates, Rev. D. W. Kimball; solo, Rev. Mrs. Russell; Benediction, Rev. Emmet Russell.

Mr. Russell is a graduate of Harvard University, class of 1914, with a degree of B. A., Harvard Law School, class of '19 with a degree of LL.B. He was admitted to Massachusetts Bar in the same year. He was graduated from Gordon college in the class of 1921 with the degree of B.D. Rev. Mrs. Russell is a graduate of Gordon College, class of 1920, with the degree Th.B. They will soon go to China where they will labor in independent missionary work.

Canton Christian College

BY MAHLON H. DAY

The friends of Canton Christian College, Canton, China, who read THE BAPTIST will be glad to know that the college has closed a very good year. In spite of the financial depression there has been an increase of 50 per cent in the number of new subscribers and a substantial increase in contributions over previous years. The expenses for the year have been met and a deficit of $48,999 carried over from last year has been cut in half. The college will need from American friends to meet operating expenses for the coming year the sum of $125,000.

Three of the teachers who have spent the year studying in America have recently returned to China and six new teachers have been added to the staff. The most prominent of these is Dean

M. M. Skinner of the School of Commerce of the University of Washington who has gone for a limited term to organize the courses in business administration. He is to be known as the Seattle Professor of Economics and Commerce. His going has been made possible through the joint co-operation of the University of Washington, the Seattle Chamber of Commerce, and the China Club of Seattle.

The summer school of the college is now in session with an enrollment of some 4,000. There is every indication that this growing institution will again have difficulty in accommodating all the students who seek admission in the fall.

Miss Vegh's Americanization Work

BY AN OLD AMERICAN

Miss Pauline G. Vegh, director of children's work for New Americans of the American Baptist Publication Society has recently completed a series of sixteen institutes for foreign-speaking peoples in western Pennsylvania and Ohio. She was assisted by Dr. W. J. Sly also of the Publication Society and Rev. Andrew Toth of Trenton, N. J., president of the Hungarian Sunday-school Association of the Hungarian Baptist Convention. Attorney R. O. Carver of Cleveland also gave generously of his time to a number of these institutes in Ohio. Mrs. G. C. Cleveland presented the need of well-made plans for the woman's societies. Additional assistance was given by Mrs. G. H. String of the Reform Board, in demonstration of hand work in the Sunday-school and story telling. Mrs. String is a lecturer at the International Institute of Home Missions at Northfield, Mass. Mr. W. E. Homes director of young people's and Sunday-school work for Ohio also assisted as far as his time allowed.

The receptibility for training and the cordiality of these New Americans has been a great encouragement in this work with New Americans. Yet great tact is needed in approaching these people. Changes desired to be made in their church must be carefully suggested as they are prejudiced in mind against needless organizations. It may interest the readers that these institutes were held among the following groups: Italians, Hungarians, Slovaks, Russians, Czechoslovaks and Roumanians. Special mention should be made of the Roumanian group in Warren, Ohio, where the speakers found themselves upon their arrival in a beautifully decorated church, with a great sign of "Welcome" made of flowers of many colors. The institute here was presided over by Mrs. Elizabeth Whitnum from the First church of Warren.

Upon the completion of the institute work Miss Vegh has given herself over to the interest of summer assemblies. She lectures at Kalamazoo, Mich., July 21-29, at the assembly there on "Teacher Training" and "The Elementary Division of the Sunday School and Its Need." From there she will go directly to the Ohio Assembly at Granville, O. As I was speaking with Miss Vegh I was much impressed with the genuine interest she has in this task of our denomination. She has a vivacious attractive personality, and her message from the platform has inspired many to service, within the past years. She told me that she herself was a foreign-born, and that she is a mixture of all nationalities because of the work she is engaged in. One hardly can detect the foreign extraction in her for she speaks beautiful English with perfect ease. As I left her she said, "Remember, I believe in giving the credit where it is due. What I am and what I have been inspired to do, I owe to my American friends. Their friendship has been sent to me by God." We thank Miss Vegh for such a testimony of us old Americans.

Basement Sunday Schools

first enjoyed them; the organ could not grow less tunable because the sweet voices of children had sang in unison with it. And as for your pews and your cushions—are they then so exceedingly precious?

We who are in the Department of Architecture have before us many and varied tasks. For one thing we want to make churches more beautiful. We want them better planned and more honestly constructed. We want their usefulness widened, their service to the community amplified in a dozen ways. But none of these things, important as they are, seem to us more important than the abolition of the basement Sunday-school. Indeed we cannot insist always upon beauty—or at least upon our idea of beauty—for we know better than to dispute about taste; nor will we always fail to accept some compromise in the plans we advocate or the construction we think proper—for reasonable men may differ upon all these matters. But there is one battle in which we will make no compromise. We will never approve the plans for any church which call for underground school rooms. We intend, if we can, to pry the Sunday-school out of its dismal hole.

For that effort we appeal to every man who has at heart the interests of our children and the future of our church. Lend us your strength; uphold our hands!

Fresh From the Field

Rev. W. D. Harrington, recently of Kilgore, Neb., has accepted a call to the First Church of Kearney and is already on the field at work.

Rev. J. W. Weddell, who has been serving as acting pastor of the First Church, Sioux City, Iowa, finished his work on July 24 and the new pastor, Rev. Lewis Jacobsen, formerly of Manhattan, Kansas, will begin his service with this fine church of 721 members on the first Sunday in August.

Rev. L. D. Lamkin, pastor of the church at Olney, Ill., conducted meetings from July 5 to 17 with the church at Kenova, W. Va., Rev. L. W. Hostetter, pastor. There were many conversions and numerous additions to the church by letter.

After three years of work with the Y. M. C. A., at first with the U. S. Army and later district secretary in Michigan, Rev. J. D. Shorney is desirous of returning to the pastorate. He may be addressed at 504 S. Dean St., Bay City, Mich. Mr. Shorney was for several years a pastor in Michigan.

Charles Forbes Taylor will take his summer vacation in Europe preaching to the second largest church in London. He has recently been conducting the greatest campaign of his life in the South. Together with his father, Rev. Charles Taylor, and his brother, Lawrence Taylor, pianist, he has made engagements for several campaigns in Texas next season.

David P. Ward, after nine years' residence in Upland, Cal., is returning to Pasadena where he is building a bungalow at 1725 Garfield Ave. Mr. Ward was for twenty-eight years Sunday-school missionary of the Publication Society in S. Dakota and California. For twenty years of that time he was identified with Baptist assembly work on the Pacific Coast. He is visiting Sunday schools almost every Sunday.

The Church School

Our order of service is as follows:

Prelude.
Doxology.
Invocation.
Responsive Reading.
Anthem by choir.
Announcements and offering.
Hymn.
Sermon. (twenty minutes)
Hymn.
School assembled. (forty minutes study period)
School reassembled.
Hymn.
School Benediction.
Postlude.

The same order is used at our communion service. The remarks by the pastor are brief and to the point. This is a beautiful service, and our boys and girls feel the solemnity of the hour whereas before they were not there. Last Sunday there were not enough glasses to go around.

The chasm between the Sunday-school and the church must be met. Our boys and girls of today are to be the leaders of to-morrow. They must be trained for this leadership. But how can we train them if they are not there. The great doctrines of the Bible can be presented in such a way that the child can understand them, which will also be acceptable to the adult. Sam Jones used to say, "Bring the fodder down."

The church school plan presents a rare opportunity to the ministry of to-day, and in turn will reap its abundant harvest for the church and the kingdom.

Dear Young Reserves,

This is one of Peggy's favorite stories and we both claim ownership to the picture of Willie in his baby carriage! At present it belongs to her, and she thinks—from Willie's studious appearance—that he is hunting for Hidden Treasures, that is: hunting up the places in the Bible where those novel titles appear, the ones which you doubtless read in our columns two weeks ago. We want you to enter that contest!!! Mrs. Montgomery is the one who suggested it to me, and I want to show her the fattest batch of replies, so begin hunting, hunting, hunting. ## PULPIT AND CHOIR-LOFT

By COL. FRANKLIN P. SELLERS

(Religious Editor of the Brooklyn Daily Eagle).

There is in the opinion of a layman who has long made a study of church conditions too little co-operation between the pastor and organist of a church. All too frequently the organist knows nothing of the pastor's choice of hymns for the services until they meet in the pastor's study seven or eight minutes before the time for the service to begin. Of course, hymns are familiar to most of the worshippers, but how much more effective could they be made if the organist and choir should come together on them at the hour of weekly practice, in order that, no matter how well they are known and how often they are used, they could be given with perfect understanding!

It is frequently noticed, too, that hymns are nearly always half-heartedly sung when the pastor gives them out as if it were a task which he did not greatly enjoy. The pastor often seems satisfied with giving out the number of the selections only, which is perfunctory, when, if he knows how to enunciate well—and most pastors do—he would “get it over” much better were he to read a verse or two. There is no need of such hurry in the service that this cannot be done, for it gives inspiration not only to the organist and quartet, but to the chorus and congregation as well. The names of many prominent pastors of the not far distant past could be given who made this a great feature of the services.

The Rev. Dr. H. M. Lowry, at one time pastor of the Hanson Place Baptist Church, knew the value of music in worship as have few men before or since. He insisted on reading the hymns and joined heartily in their singing. He was a composer of note, and many of his hymns are still being sung by Baptist congregations as well as those of other denominations.

Henry Ward Beecher was a lover of music and was always solicitous that the choir knew the hymns to be used, so that the inspiration of the singers could be taken up by the congregation. He was always in perfect accord with the remarkable organist of Plymouth, Mr. Zundel, in those days, who put Mr. Beecher's favorite hymn, “Love Divine, All Love Excelling,” to a special tune, which is now known around the world as “Beecher.”

The late Rev. Dr. Charles Cuthbert Hall, who was one of the successors to Dr. Robinson, was a lover of good church music and always insisted on having it. He collaborated in the selection of numbers for a hymnal which was published while he was pastor of the First Presbyterian Church on the Heights, and it was used far and wide. Many ministers and many organists could be named who always conferred on the question of the Sunday's program, and wherever this was the case the service was a successful one and the spiritual atmosphere was enhanced. The Church of the Holy Trinity was always famous for its music, which for so many years was under the direction of Dudley Buck, who enriched the religious world by a large number of compositions without which no festival of the church is regarded as complete.

Many other illustrations could be given of the value of a close relationship between the organist and the pastor in the matter of church music. Harmony in this direction makes for spiritual atmosphere, and where the pastor and organist are careless enough to neglect this essential duty, the service is always marked by a lack of interest and a corresponding failure to keep the attention of the hearers. The selection of hymns should always be in keeping with the theme chosen for the sermon.

NEW MUSIC

From The Lorenz Publishing Co., Dayton, Ohio

Lorenz's Selected Anthems, No. 1.

Here is a set of easy, reverent anthems, of a good grade musically considered, practicable and diverse enough in subjects to make the purchase of the volume a commercial economy. Like all the publications of this publishing house, the book is well-bound, and the typography clear and distinct. The table of contents lists anthems by such standard composers as E. L. Ashford, Carrie B. Adams, Wm. J. Kirkpatrick, Chas. H. Gabriel, L. O. Emerson, and Ira B. Wilson. The modest price asked is sixty cents per volume.

FROM THE SCRAP-BOX

We doubt that the present opposition in a certain Anglican musical camp to Barnby's tune to “For all the saints” will seriously damage it in the minds of the majority. The tune is by no means a bad one. At all events it has been popular among church musicians for a sufficient length of time to make it live in the future.

In this country the hymn is hardly ever sung to any other setting; and in England the tune more than holds its own. Adverse criticism of certain tunes is not always easy to understand—especially when the consensus of opinion does not go with it.

Wesley's setting to “The Church's One Foundation” (originally written for “Jerusalem the Golden”) was vigorously condemned by a noted English critic when it first made its appearance. It would now be possible to displace the tune by any other—except perhaps as a temporary experiment. Criticism of anything that has passed the test of approval among the competent may always be regarded with a reasonable amount of suspicion.

Great minds have erred in judgment over things sublime enough to make hymn tunes appear ridiculous by comparison. Voltaire said of Hamlet that it was “a rude and barbarous piece—such a work as one might suppose to be the fruit of the imagination of a drunken savage.” Dr. Johnson used to speak of Lycidas with contempt. Goethe said of Dante that his Purgatorio was “abominable,” his Purgatorio “dubious,” and his Paradiso “tiresome.”

When giants maul giants we must expect pigmies to scratch each other occasionally.

Through Eye Gate

EIGHTY-FIVE per cent of all you know came through your eyes: more than five times as much as through your ears. How much attention are you giving to the eye-gate—especially in the summer months?

A new text book says that every school and every church should have a stereopticon and moving picture equipment to be prepared adequately for its work. We are prepared to assist churches in this important feature of their work.

Free Moving Pictures and Stereopticon Lectures

We have 3 Moving Pictures, 65 Stereopticon Lectures and 9 Easel Lectures—illustrating Baptist Missions at Home and Abroad. They are for the use of Baptist Churches WITHOUT CHARGE. (Churches pay only mail or express.)

The movies would cost from $15 to $25 per night

if rented from a commercial concern. They are both of "standard" and "safety" types.

The educational film is an impressive story of intellectual hunger, ambition, poverty, success and love—just the thing to "stir up the gift of God" in many a young man and woman.

Why Pictures Are Good Teachers of Missions

They are good audience gatherers. More people will lend you their eyes than their ears.

Missions deal with people, places and conditions. These are more easily understood from pictures than from descriptions.

The mind retains a picture longer than a statement.

Men get more accurate impressions from pictures than from descriptions.

Most pastors have never been to the mission fields and cannot give first hand descriptions. Pictures supply this deficiency.

Pictures stimulate the imagination and enlist the emotions.

Attention can be held longer and more knowledge "put across" by pictures.

Pictures create a favorable atmosphere for the message.

Pictures make missions real.

Where Pictures Have Been Used

In South Dakota last spring eight churches united in a circuit, using a lecture every three weeks, until every church had used eight lectures. They are now asking for more. In New York an association made a circuit of its churches and had two lectures each.

Fresh from the Field

Dr. David J. Evans, president of William Jewell College, has accepted a call to the pastorate of the First Church, Kansas City, Mo., made vacant by the going of Dr. Abernethy to Washington, and will begin his work there on Sept. 1. During August he is serving as supply preacher at Dr. Brougher's great church in Los Angeles. Dr. Evans is a great preacher, a splendid administrator and a Christian scholar and the people of the First Church are very happy over his decision.

The interesting article in the last issue of THE BAPTIST, credited to Geo. E. Merrill, was actually written by Joseph Hudnut, consulting architect of the department of architecture, maintained jointly by the Home Mission Society and the Publication Society. This article on "Basement Sunday Schools," is of exceptional value and a careful reading is urged upon all our school officials.

The resignation of Dr. Perry J. Stackhouse as pastor of the Tabernacle Church, Utica, N. Y., was accepted with deep regret at a meeting of the church on July 22. Resolutions passed speak of the splendid service done the church and city by Dr. and Mrs. Stackhouse during their seven years residence there. The new pastorate with the First Church, Chicago, will begin on Sept. 1.

Rev. Tillman R. Braddy, formerly pastor of the Barnesboro, Pa., Church has accepted a call to the Glasgow, Mont., Church and began work on August 1. This church went $400 over the top on the first day of the Now World Movement drive.

Rev. J. Q. A. Henry began on July 24 an evangelistic campaign among the farmers of Pulaski County, Illinois, which will continue until August 15.

Rev. G. W. Kimball has resigned the pastorate of the First Church, Lincoln, Ill., to enter community work. Communications regarding the pastorate may be addressed to D. C. Shepler, chairman pulpit committee.

In the seven years and eight months of the pastorate of D. D. McLauren with the First Church of Madison, Wis., 528 new members were received. The pastor has just resigned.

Good News

The American Baptist Publication Society announced a reduction in periodical costs to the churches of the Northern Baptist Convention for the quarter beginning Oct. 1, 1921.

Falling markets are at last beginning to be reflected in slight measure in our manufacturing costs. It is believed that we can, beginning with Oct. 1, reduce the charges for our Sunday-school lesson helps by 5 per cent. Therefore, with the approval of the executive committee of the board of managers, I am announcing for the Publication Society a reduction of 5 per cent on all periodical orders received from within the territory of the United States for the period beginning October 1, 1921.

Gilbert N. Brink, General Secretary.

Mrs. Peabody Resigns

It is with deep regret that the board of managers of the Woman's American Baptist Foreign Mission Society, at their annual meeting, June 15 to 20, Des Moines, Iowa, were called upon to accept the resignation of their beloved Foreign Vice-President, Mrs. Henry W. Peabody.

The following resolution was passed and placed in the records of the society. "Resolved, that in grateful appreciation of the long, faithful and distinguished service of Mrs. Henry W. Peabody in the Woman's American Baptist Foreign Missionary Society (as a missionary of the foreign field, as a secretary on the home field, and later as the foreign administration vice-president of our national society) we wish to express our love and loyalty to her, feeling that by reason of her forty years of service in this society; and also because of her affiliations with many forms of interdenominational missionary work, in her wide and varied experience, she represents the principles that have given to our society fifty years of phenomenal success.

It is our deep conviction that her withdrawal, as a national officer, at the critical time in the history of our society is an irreparable loss to our interests both at home and abroad.

We, therefore, offer this resolution, as a unanimous testimonial of our love and affection, and we hereby so place ourselves on record."

Social Service Information

The Social Service Commission of the Northern Baptist Convention in co-operation with the departments of the two societies, has published much valuable literature bearing upon Social Education and Service. Among the notable recent publications are the following:

"The Christian Spirit in Industry."

"Social Unrest and the Opportunity of the Churches," by Dr. Rolvix Harlan.

"Social Justice," by Dr. Samuel Z. Batten.

"A Christian Industrial Program," by the Social Service Commission.

"The Social Program of the Local Church."

"Social Service by Young People."

"Social Service by Organized Men."

"Social Service Ideals."

"A Social Service Catechism."

Many brotherhoods and adult classes have secured copies of the first-named pamphlets and have used them as the basis of class study. Copies of all of the publications listed, with a number of earlier leaflets, will be sent free on application to the Department of Christian Social Education; Secretary, Samuel Z. Batten; 1701 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

Short Talks on Investments

BY LEE B. DOTY

Uncle Sam's Loans to the Allies

This column a few weeks ago mentioned the fact that the government is gradually reducing the amount of Liberty Bonds outstanding. Some have been bought in by the treasury; others have been turned in to the government in payment of inheritance taxes, certain issues being receivable at par when held for six months before the death of the owner. The latest figures are that the United States now has outstanding about $19,000,000,000 on which the annual interest is around $830,000,000, or about $8 per capita required for interest each year.

Not all of this vast amount, however, represents war expense. Over half of the amount raised from Liberty Bonds was loaned to the various allied governments. Great Britain, France, Belgium and Italy owe the United States government almost ten billions of dollars, plus three years' interest. When once they begin to repay these advances, it is clear that our own government can more rapidly cut down the amount of its own indebtedness, and, what is of almost equal importance, relieve our own people of a large part of the annual interest burden which we now carry.

How the foreign allied governments are to repay the large advances made to them by our government presents an interesting study. One suggestion has been that Germany issue its bonds to the respective allies in settlement of its reparations, and that France, England, Belgium and Italy in turn pledge these German bonds as security for new bond issues by their respective governments. Presumably these bonds would then be offered for sale to individual investors and the proceeds used to pay the United States government, which would, in turn use them to retire its own bonds. This would amount to a species of international clearing of debts. The extent to which the United States could thus reduce the volume of Liberty Bonds would depend largely upon the amount of foreign bonds the public would buy. It is even conceivable that our government itself might become the holder of such foreign bonds if the public showed lack of interest.

However the matter may be worked out, it is plain that proper refunding of the Allies' obligations to the United States government will relieve the American people of approximately half of the interest burden now carried.

The Sensationalist

"Your komie Kollum yclept Killam's is good. If you want to you may say that the man around the kerner says, 'If a preacher wants to be sensational today, let him preach an old fashioned doctrinal sermon. People sit up and listen to something new.'" The man around the kerner is Dr. J. W. Weddell and he has just been creating a 'sensation' in Sioux City, Iowa. THE BAPTIST is itself a "sensational" journal if preaching of sound doctrine is the sure mark.

Killam's Kollum

Do Not Take the Other Fellow Too Seriously

Our editors were somewhat perturbed by an editorial in the W-E recently. If we are to take the document seriously and at its face value we should be obliged to say the editor prevaricated, which being interpreted means he—well we won't say it. More mature consideration, aided by the counsels of Elbert Hubbard, tends to make us more charitable. Mr. Hubbard used to counsel men not to take themselves too seriously. We have been greatly comforted by his words. We feel that the principle should be extended and applied to our worthy contemporaries. THE BAPTIST is inclined to believe that the article referred to was intended for the joke column and was placed on the editorial page by the printer's devil.

Confessions in Order

THE BAPTIST is the friend of the minister. Its mission is to help him in his great work of leading his church to discharge its full obligation to God and the world. It has an appreciation of the pastor's problems. All of its editors have served churches as pastors. A pastor in a nearby state sends us a recent experience. He was preaching on "Some of the things Jesus Did." He spoke of his being in the wilderness with the wild beasts and added there are two-legged animals worse than any four-footed wild beasts. It was such that drove Jesus to the cross. At the close of the service one of the deacons arose in anger and shaking his forepaw at the minister said, "You do not want to associate with wild animals and so I'm done with you." Other confessions are in order.

Better Weigh or Count Them

THE BAPTIST has always assumed that mathematics is an exact science. Again we are wrong. It now develops that there is what may be styled imaginative or oratorical mathematics which is far from exact. When a speaker becomes enthusiastic over his congregation and says, "This great audience of 800 or a 1000!" when the building will not hold 500, is a case in point. The man does not mean to prevaricate. He is simply using figures in an oratorical sense. He is brother to the fisherman, who may be and probably is a most honest man, except that the size and weight of his catch need verification; or, he may be brother to the editor who speaks in glowing terms of his circulation. A man of wide acquaintance recently said to the writer. "You preachers are pretty good sort of men. I have learned to depend upon you except in the matter of the size of your congregations. It may be that your habit of over-estimating their size is merely nature's attempt to keep your courage up."

Suggestions to the Convention

One Layman's Comments on the Convention Programme

By R. W. SWETLAND

Without attempting a comprehensive analysis of what a denominational convention is or ought to be, a layman may properly expect to get from it both information and inspiration. He should get information as to what the denomination has done, is doing and plans to do. He should get inspiration which will send him home full of faith, courage and hope. All this he undoubtedly can get from such a convention as that recently held at Des Moines. But there are some features of our last two conventions at least by which the average layman does not find himself either informed or inspired. In the first place, he is not much interested in theology and cares mighty little about millennialism, "pre" or "post." He honors the pastors who argue these questions and he respects their zeal and learning, though all the while he entertains doubts as to whether even the wisest of them really know much about the millennium. If he has any interest in that subject at all, it is "pro" rather than "pre" or "post." In the second place, he isn't worried much over creedal statements, because his own creed is too simple and straightforward to be affected by the verbal hair-splitting of "reactionaries" or "radicals." He has a profound faith in God, in Jesus Christ and in his fellow men. He wants more action and less talk. In brief, he is bored by "pre-convention conferences" which result in little but unseemly and un-Christian convention wrangles. He is perfectly willing that brethren who differ in their theological views should meet to discuss their differences, but he is not yet convinced that a delegated convention of the denomination, charged with the transaction of important business, is the proper place for such discussion. He sympathizes with the sentiment of a well-known layman who was heard to say in a hotel lobby, on the evening of a day when such discussion had been hottest: "Say, I was offered tickets to the Dempsey-Carpentier fight, but didn't think a man in my position ought to be seen in such a place,—and now—well, now—I'm here."

In addition to the transaction of the Kingdom business he wants to hear from the leading pulpit orators of his denomination messages of faith and hope and love which will stir his soul and send him home inspired to greater service for the Master. He comes with a longing in his heart for a daily message of that sort. And he is not the only one who needs and longs for inspiration. Hundreds of pastors in small churches, rural and village, come up to the convention hungry and thirsting for such messages.

Those who attended the last two conventions heard some few great messages, like those of Petty and Hanley at Buffalo or those of Francis, Mrs. Montgomery and Hinson at Des Moines, but too often such inspirational addresses are given at the close of a long hot programme of business, when few of the audience are in a condition, physical, mental or spiritual, to be benefited. In addition to all the rest, it seems to him a great waste of time to read from the platform report after report, all of which are printed and distributed to his hand by ushers, especially as the longer and more important reports are always abridged—we almost said "expurgated"—by the reader. Then, too, he wonders at the "endurance test" programme, which sets for the conscientious delegate eight to nine hours a day of sessions. For himself, and in this he finds himself following the lead of many pastors, he gets fagged, worn, and either "cuts" it all to swap stories with his intimates, or goes home with a fit of mental and spiritual indigestion.

Now, this particular layman has no grouse against the convention; he has received much good from it in many ways; he is deeply interested in its work; he believes in its leaders, and has great faith in its future. He has emphasized some of its obvious weaknesses, not in a destructive but a constructive spirit, and he ventures a few suggestions in the hope that among them may be found something of value to future programme committees.

First of all, why not plan a real inspirational service at the beginning of each day's session. Have the devotional service as now, but follow it with an address by some outstanding man who will give a key-note to the programme of the day. Then let the business session follow. Have all reports distributed the day before and announcement made that discussion and action on those reports will come at a stated time the following day. That gives time for delegates to read and digest the reports in advance. As it is now, the voting on reports, some of which contain important recommendations, e. g., changes in the constitution and by-laws, is largely a matter of hasty judgment, or "putting the rubber stamp" of the convention on the recommendations. Another thing: Why not have three or more afternoons given over to sectional conferences, such as rural churches, down-town city churches, suburban churches, seashore or summer-resort churches, and other special topics of vital interest to certain pastors and laymen. Let each conference be addressed by some one man who may be considered an expert on that subject and then give opportunity for informal discussion, with all the give and take which comes among men under such conditions. Let such conferences continue for two hours a day during two or three days and each man will go home full of new and helpful ideas for the solution of his own particular problems. This sort of programme would also offer opportunity for our theologians to meet and consider their problems and thus, perchance, save the time of those uninterested in that topic.

Still further, arrange at least one or two afternoons exclusively for important committee meetings with sight-seeing trips or other recreational features for other delegates. Under the present arrangement many of our denominational leaders are so busy on committee work that they not only have little time to attend convention sessions, but they go home completely exhausted by their labors. Their presence at the sessions of the convention would add strength to our deliberations and be of great value to them personally.

In short, our convention programme seems at once too diffuse and too intense. Too much time is occupied in "vain repetition" of reports, too little in "mountain-top" messages; too many hours are scheduled for sessions, too few for conference and fellowship. After all, it is a great convention facing a great task in a statesmanlike way. It is a privilege to have even a small part in this great work. That the work may be more efficiently done and thus the cause of Christ more effectively advanced is the motive of this layman in his comments.

The Lost Morale of Business

A REPRESENTATIVE of a large business concern who dropped into the office a few days ago was decidedly pessimistic concerning the business situation in the country. His final summing up of the situation was this: "The morale of business is all shot to pieces." Asked if he had in sight or mind any remedy, he made answer that so far as he could see the only real hope is in the cry which Roger Babson has raised, "Back to religion."

Now we do not pretend to be business experts. There are a great many things in the business world of which we have only a partial understanding. We are not sure that anybody understands some of the factors which are involved. But we are greatly interested in this practical business man's summing up of the situation and in the remedy he proposes. Preachers have suggested such a cure for all the ills of business and been laughed at; a prophet must smile a little inwardly when he observes business men proposing, as if they had struck an entirely new fact, the very thing he has been saying.

To us the present situation seems logical enough. Following the war there was a wild orgy of business methods. Men could see nothing but money and they gave themselves to what they thought the pleasant task of grabbing all the money they could. And that went on until the people began to strike. These same profiteers saw also that, as they themselves were grasping for everything in sight, the government was in turn reaching out after their profits. And suspicion grew in the whole business world until at length confidence was destroyed. Whatever else may ail business, this is one of the elements in its present grievous sickness—confidence is prostrated.

All business experts are agreed that the country is sound. The banks and the various financial institutions are sound. But there is no confidence. Banking men will tell you that we have been passing through one of the most violent periods of liquidation they have known, and in the background of it there is this same lack of confidence.

The process of building up is certain to be slow. Only gradually can confidence be restored. Every agency which can help should get busy and keep busy. Both a sense of self-preservation and also brotherly love urge this. But how can help be given?

The answer of the business man as he sat in our office should afford pastors and churches some ground for thought. Every agency which has for its purpose the teaching of Christian principles, every agency which sets before it the winning of men to Jesus Christ and the Christ life can make a direct contribution. No agency in the community comes closer to the real springs of life than the church. Just what it can do to help restore confidence we may not say now. But when business men say that religion is what the world needs, the church should not be slow to take the hint and to dedicate itself with renewed devotion and energy to its mighty task of giving Christ to the world and bringing the world to Christ.

Faith Did Not Fail in the Churches

ONLY the historian of the future will be able to tell what great service to the world was rendered by the Christian churches during and after the World War.

Since the armistice came reaction. Not only were the leading peoples of the world torn, heartbroken and bankrupt, but they lost faith in the high ideals which had been awakened in the war. They turned back to sordid and selfish aims. Intense class struggles and threats of general and violent revolution arose. Old international jealousies revived and new ones were born. Statesmanship and diplomacy were largely marked by incapacity and lack of clear and generous human insight. All of the powers of darkness seemed to have been loosed upon the earth. To millions of people who had previously been riding on the wings of faith, of high enthusiasm and of heroic humanitarianism, the prospect became one of despair.

At that juncture the faith of the churches rose to meet the catastrophe. In the midst of the darkness they seemed to hear their Lord saying again calmly and sadly, "I have prayed for thee that thy faith fail not";

and God be thanked that their faith did not fail. They felt a new call of Christ to the role of the Good Samaritan on a scale as great as the world. They sensed a new need and an opportunity for human service big enough to show at last to all nations what real religion means in terms of brotherhood. All of the greater denominations sounded out a call to a fearless faith and to a new mobilization of Christian forces to heal the world's hurt. They organized for more extensive and effective work. They started new movements for world evangelization, education, missionary expansion and social reconstruction.

Among the constituency of the Northern Baptist Convention the new adventure of Christian faith took the form of the New World Movement. It was approached with humility and prayer by a people awed under a sense of overwhelming responsibility. It laid its foundations in a general effort to seek a deeper spiritual quickening and a closer fellowship with the risen and reigning Jesus. It followed in spirit and method the Great Commission given by the risen Lord himself to his first missionaries. It launched a program of pentecostal prayer for the fullness of the Spirit of God, of a new personal enlistment under Christ for all saving and serving self-sacrifice, of intensified evangelism, of more general and thorough religious education, of a great missionary advance, of a new social leadership and helpfulness, of a stewardship that places all in the hands of God and dedicates an adequate portion to the specific propagation of the gospel—in short, of a sublime adventure to make the Kingdom of God a new reality on earth.

One of the most inspiring features of the movement was the way in which the plain common people of the Baptist churches responded to this new call. Churches, after a sheer agony of prayer, accepted and raised financial allotments that seemed impossible. After all deductions are made for local and partial drawbacks and hesitations, the glory of what they actually did will ever remain a standard and an inspiration for the future.

And note what has followed. Revivals broke forth. Students began to volunteer in increasing numbers for specific lines of Christian service. Congregations, Sunday schools, prayer meetings and financial budgets gladly provided, grew everywhere, and in many cases to double proportions. Students began to crowd our colleges, and our missionary personnel is being reinforced by a growing host of new appointees.

When all of our people enlist in this movement as many have done and as the rest of them will do, only God can tell the glory that will follow. This enlistment is the immediate evidence of our worth as a people, and in it lies the world's hope of a better day.

A Parade that Foozled

THE world was duly notified that July 4 was to witness in New York City a parade which would be a monster protest against prohibition. It was to make one man a formidable contender for the mayoralty; it was to let all men see that the greatest city in the country was against constitutional prohibition; it was to be the beginning of a nation-wide movement for the repeal of the amendment. In order to get marchers the city and neighboring cities were combed. There were borough captains and lesser captains and aids, male and female, for every sort of purpose. It was announced, in time, that 202,670 men and women had signed cards pledging themselves to march.

But the parade foozled. It was less satisfactory to its promoters than one-half of one per cent beer is to those who marched in the procession. There could not be found 200,000 people who would parade in favor of nullification and the saloon and debauchery.

By an actual count, made by an audit company, there were just 14,922 persons in line, or less than the number of former bartenders in New York City. From 80 to 90 per cent of the marchers were foreigners and about the same percentage was middle-aged. Less than 200 women could be found who would lend their presence to the show. There was no enthusiasm but were on the contrary some hisses for men who would prostitute Bible verses and religious pictures to the uses to which marching men put them. Even the papers which were friendly to booze announced that the parade was an utter failure. Its net result was to bring ridicule upon the men who promoted it and the cause they were backing.

After the parade, a sergeant of police, on dismissing his squad of men said: "Well, they have had their parade. There wasn't an American citizen in the whole bunch. A big chance that outfit has to change the Constitution and the laws of the United States. The booze traffic is gone. That is one of the best things that ever happened; and there will be no come-back."

We believe that he rightly interpreted the situation. There will be law-breakers for some time to come. And Christian people must be on the alert for those who will try to catch them napping while they take measures to rehabilitate an accursed traffic. But the saloon is gone for good and everybody knows it; respectable people will no longer lend themselves to efforts to bring it back. It is for respectable people, then, to line up for thorough enforcement of the law.

Publication Society Reduces Prices

IN AN important announcement which appears on page 842, the Publication Society gives notice that on all periodicals for the quarter beginning October 1 there will be a reduction in price of 5 per cent over the price that has hitherto prevailed. This action is taken despite the fact that manufacturing costs are yet unsettled and fluctuating and that there is consequently some hazard in it for the society. The desire however to give the churches every possible advantage of gradually lowering prices prompts to this action.

Our Canadian brethren will notice that this reduction does not apply to their orders, the reason being that the present unfavorable exchange prevailing between the two countries results in 10 per cent extra cost on all business done there. As soon as this situation can be remedied they may expect the same price reduction which at present is made applicable to the United States.

There should be no need of saying that our Baptist schools should use Baptist Sunday-school literature. A great many, in order to save a few cents, have been using literature which misses the distinctive Baptist note. Unless this lack is somewhere made up in such schools, the churches face suicide as Baptist churches. There should be a quick recognition of this effort of our Publication Society to serve the churches through lowered costs of periodicals.

Cut the Cost of Living

THE high cost of living is made inevitable by the high cost of war.

A people cannot spend hundreds of millions of dollars every year for war purposes without having to pay more for every article of commerce which is purchased.

A government cannot spend nine out of every ten dollars of its income for wars and war preparation without being hard put to it to find money enough to do the things which every progressive government should wish done.

Disarmament has profound moral aspects which alone would warrant its support by Christian people. But it has also the very practical meaning that its application by the nations would end in part a fatal drain upon the people's pocket-books. Financially the nations have already been bled white by Mars. Common sense says that the time has come for the people to act in their own defense.

The present moment is one of vast importance. The great powers, sick of war, are to discuss disarmament. Already the jingoes and the militarists are howling against it. Christian people will not fail to see their opportunity of bringing pressure to bear on Congress. Here is a hint as to how to do it. A telegram with four signatures can be sent for the price of one. Such a telegram, sent to the House of Representatives, to such and such a representative, or to the Senate, to such and such a senator, becomes a part of the proceedings. The telegrams belong to the House and to the Senate and not to the individual. This is a much more effective method than the sending of individual telegrams.

We have been talking about the application of Christianity to world problems. Why not apply it practically, now, at the moment when the nation wishes to be rid of this military and naval burden, to our own governmental affairs?

Not to Be Purchased

IF BIG business has at any time imagined that by threats or the withholding of money, the pulpit could be muzzled, it should now be disillusioned.

A Pittsburgh association attacked the Federal Council of Churches and the Y. W. C. A. because of utterances on social subjects and discovered that neither of them could be bought.

More recently the Protestant Episcopal Church has acted on the matter and refused to seal the lips of its clergymen when they are making, as they believe, the application of the teaching of Jesus to social conditions.

The action was precipitated by the resignation of Bishop Charles D. Williams of the diocese of Detroit, one of the best known and most fearless liberal churchmen in the country, when he was facing criticism of a solemn statement of his beliefs concerning the obligations of the church toward social and industrial problems.

"The challenge is plain," he said. "Either the church must abandon the well-considered, fair and sane message which she has formulated on social and economic questions and suppress her proclamation of it, a thing unthinkable for anyone who has a conscience and convictions, or she must enlarge and democratize the basis of her support so as not to be dependent on or subservient to any class, high or low; or she must be content with more meager support and restricted operations."

"Her Master was poor and persecuted, but free, and it may be that he is now calling his church to follow in his footsteps."

Later, at an executive session behind closed doors, after he had offered his resignation, Bishop Williams said:

"My own choice is made. I must abide by it. I cannot promise to refrain in the future from speaking as I have spoken in the past. But I am not willing to embarrass the diocese or hinder its work."

The resolution refusing to permit Bishop Williams to retire concluded with the statement that "this convention desires to go on record as standing unqualifiedly for the American right of free speech on the part of the bishop and clergy, regardless of our respective individual points of view, believing with confidence in the ultimate power of the Gospel of Christ and desiring only that that shall prevail in all the phases of our modern life."

The ministry of our churches cannot be bought. The social applications of the teachings of Jesus cannot be suppressed. The man who has felt the touch of God's spirit must, like the prophets of old, cry out against social and industrial sin. Despite occasional extreme utterances, a great part of what is said is likely to prove true. Instead of kicking against its prodders, big business would do better to be energetic in putting its own house in order.

It Is Life That Teaches

A FINE hint is that of Dr. Alvah S. Hobart concerning the opportunity to teach religion in the schools without any formal use of the Bible. The young, he says, "may be influenced to practice truthfulness, forgiveness, promptness, industry, fairness in judgment, kindness of speech. A teacher may educate himself by the study of the Bible experimentally, and then take the results alive and virile in his own spirit into the school. Religious purpose is caught rather than taught. A teacher may be educating scholars in all the practical things of the Christian faith and never mention the Bible. If the spirit of it is in the teacher it will impart itself to the school."

The conclusion is obvious enough. In the school, the church or anywhere else, the gospel in terms of life is more potent than in terms of language; and we have yet to learn what results can be wrought in the world by a living exhibition of faith in Christ.

Romanists in Office

FROM a reader in Ohio comes this query:

"You say: 'We can hardly deny the right of Catholics to hold political appointments.' Do you mean that you favor the election or appointment to positions in the United States Government of those who owe allegiance to a foreign government?"

Certainly not. But if Catholics are meant by "those who owe allegiance to a foreign government," their right to hold office in the United States does not depend on our favor. It is a constitutional right. They have the same right to political preferment that anybody else has. This nation is built on the principle that political rights shall not depend on church connection. A Baptist should be the last to call that principle in question.

* * *

THE BAPTIST wishes to publish in the issue of Sept. 10 a number of the best Rally Day programs which have been worked out in our churches. It therefore invites churches and schools to send us short stories concerning these programs. What were the best features about it? What were the things which made it your best? Try to keep the article within 300 words. The plan you have worked out may prove to be exactly what some other church and school is looking for.

Out of the Bondage of the Dead Centuries

He stoned the Baptist church building at Noto, Sicily. He wanted to be a priest. He became a pastor of the Italian Baptist Church of the Transfiguration, Brooklyn. This authentic interview tells the story

BY COE HAYNE

WHEN the Baptists established a church in Noto, Province of Syracuse, Sicily, Vincenzo Coletta, a seven-year-old lad living close to the church was the first one to obey adult counsel in the matter of stoning the building. It had been suggested to the boys that they destroy everything within reach. That was thirty years ago. But the Baptist church in Noto is still flourishing.

Vincenzo found a religious satisfaction in breaking the windows of the Baptist Church of Noto. Even at that early period in his life he felt drawn to the priesthood. When he was eight years old he showed his faith in the future by buying cloth to make a black robe like a priest's. He erected a crude altar in his home where he summoned his playmates to worship. When the Lenten season came he climbed to the flat roof of his one-story home where he stood in his home-made priestly robe and preached to the other children standing in the street.

Peace by Scourging

The boy lived his life in the churches. When he graduated from the elementary school he welcomed the chance to go into one of the colleges of his own city to study for the priesthood. It was a private college directed by a priest. After four years he was allowed to wear the priestly robe, the black gown. His zeal for the church was proverbial. At night he slept with a huge crucifix by his side and before retiring he underwent self-inflicted punishment by means of a scourge of his own manufacture. He thought that he could conquer temptations by doing penance in this way. It was a cruel process. Five cords formed a lash at the end of a stick, and at the ends of the cords were knots by which were held triangular pieces of metal. Upon his naked back he beat himself for fifteen minutes while he repeated portions of the ritual of his church. But he did not succeed in conquering his temptations. Therefore more penance. He took a wide belt and filled it with sharp-pointed tacks and put it diagonally across his chest and back, wearing it thus during the daytime. And while at his studies he could neither lean against the edge of his desk nor against the back of his chair without inflicting great bodily pain. He wore it while the blood ran down his body.

In the meantime Vincenzo made a discovery. It had to do with the ordained priesthood. He felt his world tumbling in upon him. Among the priests were some of his former schoolmates and in their hearing he did not hesitate to protest against some of the things which came to his notice.

"You are scandalizing the people," he said to one of his closest friends who forthwith reported him to the bishop.

Vincenzo determined to abandon public life and enter a monastery. He made application to the Franciscan monks but the bishop's veto prevented his being accepted as a member of that order. In vain he tried to find a place where he could give himself up wholly to prayer and not be contaminated with the moral corruption that was about him. But on account of the veto of the bishop he could make no further progress toward churchly honors. In despair he went to an ex-Jesuit, the priest at the head of the parish in which he resided. This priest was in the habit of quoting the Scriptures when in some discussion with other priests. The Biblical sayings, though strange to the young man, held an undeniable power over him.

Those Beautiful Words

"Father," he inquired, "how is it that you know those beautiful words?"

"That's the Scripture," said the priest.

"I would like to learn some of that Scripture."

Receiving encouragement that young man bought six volumes of the Holy Scriptures in Latin with the idea that this friend of his, who was one of the canons of the city, would teach him the Word of God.

They began at the first of Genesis but after reading the first few lines the teacher jumped to the deluge.

"But what about sin?" asked

Vincenzo who knew some of the stories of the Bible. "What was the sin Adam and Eve committed?"

"That's not up to you," said the canon. "We will leave that out."

Vincenzo lost interest after a few lessons for he realized that he was making no real progress in religious knowledge.

While trying to find his way out of the wilderness of his fallen hopes and shattered ideals, a man from Lawrence, Mass., U. S. A. came to his native city and told of the opportunities offered in the Lawrence mills for lucrative employment. Within fifteen days Vincenzo put away his priestly garments, and got ready to go to America. Often had he longed to go to the Southern States as a missionary. Perhaps his opportunity now was not far distant.

A Career via Lawrence

At Lawrence the young Sicilian found himself in a strange land with no friends. Among the hordes of the foreign-born who went to one of the mills looking for work he attracted the attention of an overseer. Perhaps it was his habit of removing his hat whenever he was spoken to that made a favorable impression upon the American. He was asked if he could speak English. The boy could not say "Yes" or "No" in English. An interpreter was called and he was given a job. Upon the information sheet he put down his occupation as that of a student. The overseer, a Methodist, took a personal interest in the newly-installed operative, taught him about the machines and gradually advanced him to a responsible position.

Walking on the common one Sunday afternoon Vincenzo heard people singing, with cornet accompaniment.

"They are the Protestants," answered a loiterer to his inquiry.

While in college in Italy, Vincenzo had heard of the Protestants. They had been pictured to him in darkest colors. He had been told that they believed neither in God nor in the deity of Christ.

Before a large crowd two Italian students were holding a service in their native tongue in front of the First Baptist church of which Rev. E. M. Lake was then pastor. Later Vincenzo learned that they were students from the Italian Branch of Colgate Seminary over which Professor Antonio Mangano, presided and that this school was housed in Dietz Memorial Church, Brooklyn.

Never had Vincenzo heard a Protestant minister preach. As he approached the group he did not know what was in store for him. He was not long a listener before his ears began to tingle from hearing statements which to him were new and revolutionary. One of the students, a brilliant speaker, had begun a talk on Luther and the pope. Vincenzo soon heard quite enough. Stirred to a high degree of indignation he did not continue his usual Sunday afternoon stroll but hurried to a Catholic church.

"Now help me!" he implored a priest excitedly.

"What has happened?"

"There are some Protestants in front of the Baptist Church preaching against the pope and the church. We ought to stop them. You ought to write a letter to the mayor of this city and tell him to forbid them to preach outdoors."

"I don't write in English," said the priest.

"Ask one of the teachers in your parochial school to write a letter."

"No, you can write a letter in Italian and I will have someone translate it into English and we will send it to the mayor."

"No Translation Yet"

Vincenzo went home and wrote a letter to the mayor of the city, saying that it was a sacrilege for anyone to have a word to say in denial of the pope's authority. He took this to the priest the following morning. At the close of the day's work he went to his adviser and asked him if he had sent the letter.

"It is not translated yet," said the priest.

The following morning he went again. No translation. The following evening he called once more. No translation.

When Sunday morning arrived he was drawn by his curiosity to the crowd that had once more gathered about the students from Brooklyn. He remained a passive member of the group until he saw an opportunity to ask questions. "Do you believe in the cross?" was his first inquiry. Others followed rapidly. He began a red-hot debate with Mr. Antonio Perrotta, now the Italian Baptist minister at Utica, N. Y. The intellectual duel between the Evangelical and the Ritualist held the people outside the church until dark. Then someone in the crowd begged the men to quit the discussion so that they could go home.

"All right, you go!" flung back Vincenzo, who would have been willing to defend his faith until midnight.

Get a Bible

"If you do not want to believe what we are telling you," said Mr. Perrotta, "go to a book-store and buy a Bible and read for yourself."

The Sicilian youth, eager to disprove the statements he had heard that afternoon, went to an Italian bookstore he found open and priced a Bible on one of the shelves.

"I will take it but will not pay for it until I show it to the priest and find out if it is the right Bible," he said.

He was allowed to go with the Bible to the priest who looked through the book from the first page to the last only to confess that he was unable to tell whether or not it was the Roman Catholic Bible. Vincenzo then asked for some books that would aid him in holding his own in a debate with the Baptist students. A book called "Three Blows on the Head of the Protestants" was shown to him. He shook his head sadly and went home perplexed. Twice he had asked for help from this man and twice had this man failed him. What should he do? The two students had told him where they were living and he thought it would be best to send them a request to stop preaching to the people as they had been doing. Somehow they had won his respect although they had greatly sinned, as he believed, by publicly disowning a faith in the infallibility of the pope.

A Strike Which Brought Salvation

For one year this young Sicilian was in despair. While his machine droned its monotonous song of industry he marched to and fro in front of it, brooding like a prisoner within walls. Then came the big strike in Lawrence and he was without work for six months. In his boarding house there was a friend who owned a Bible similar to the one which he had taken back to the bookseller. He asked permission to read it. And this period of study and meditation marked the turning point in the life of a youth whose enthusiasm for religion was an outstanding characteristic. Always had he been carried along by his yearning for truth. Like a true compass this burning desire to know God at last had guided him to a safe harbor. Upon his couch, day after day, from morning to night, he read the Bible. He made the word his companion. Feeding upon it, he nourished his soul, strengthened the fibres of his religious consciousness and in due time furnished his mind with a background of Biblical knowledge that in after years served as the S. O. S. in a prolonged warfare against error. During this year of spiritual struggle he made one important decision. He came to the conclusion that he should go ahead and discover, if possible, the source of the joy of the two students who had challenged his fighting soul by their ringing gospel messages. He wanted to see and hear them in action once more.

"But how can I go to them?" his pride demanded of his desire. "Those people know that I have been fighting them. What will they think and say should they see me coming to them again? To go back and fight them would be logical. But, what can be my avenue of approach if I do not wish to fight them? If only someone from that church would come to me some day and take me there. How glad I would be to go!"

"Go and Speak"

Can the soul pray unconsciously? In time two members of the church of which Mr. Lake was pastor and where Mr. Bellondi labored for the Italians, came to Vincenzo and invited him to attend the special meetings then in progress. These messengers of God had worked in the same mill with the young Italian. But he refused their invitation, not because he wanted to but because half a dozen young men who knew him well were present when this invitation was given. His pride and a remembrance of the many things he had said against the Protestants in the hearing of these young men, induced him to hold out against an almost overpowering desire to hurry away to the Baptist Church.

He asked his companions to sit down and when they complied he managed somehow to turn the drift of the conversation into a discussion of religion. And it was not long before he suggested the feasibility of investigating the kind of religion professed by the Italians who gathered for worship in the First Baptist Church of Lawrence.

"The time is ripe now," urged Vincenzo. "Let us go!"

He carried the crowd with him. When the "investigators" entered the church the congregation was singing. Vincenzo was amazed at the words of those hymns. Mr. Bellondi read the Scripture lesson and then invited all to bow their heads and pray. In referring to this occasion in after years Vincenzo Coletta declared that when he raised his head it seemed that the room was whirling about him like a windmill. He had never heard a prayer like that. The spiritual atmosphere that pervaded the room was altogether new to him. The sermon on faith—real faith versus dead faith—was a revelation to him. He accepted the message as heaven-sent and acknowledged to himself that this minister was right and that he had been wrong in his opposition.

From that moment he felt a burden of guilt weighing upon him because of the fight he had waged against the young students who had been sent from Brooklyn to hold the street meetings. He remembered that he had kept the people outside after the time scheduled to begin services within the church. When summer came he asked Mr. Bellondi to give him the opportunity to make reparations. Accordingly on the same spot where he had opposed the students he began his active ministry for Christ. On the day of his baptism, thirty-two others entered the water with him.

The Republic of China

A "republic" which is a militaristic feudalism. Victories purchased by the bickerings of generals. Armies which are a dead weight on the country. Why the students are powerless against the system. The remedy

BY HENRY B. ROBINS

THERE is grave risk in generalizations about China. The country is so vast and so diverse that most generalizations are false because they apply to only a part of the country. Some globe trotter or other visits Shanghai and writes a report upon conditions in China, another visits Canton, and yet another Peking; they do not agree in what they say for the reason they have too limited an opportunity for observation. You are informed that the common mode of travel across country in China is by the ordinary two-wheeled cart drawn by water buffalo. So it is, in and around Peking. You are told that opium is no longer used in China, that it is under the ban of the government. And this is true of certain sections of China—quite as nearly true as that America has prohibition; but it is not true of West China. You learn that it is no longer the custom to bind women's feet in China, although of course one sees many women in middle age who have bound feet, the result of the once universal custom of binding the feet of girls; but further inquiry enlightens you to the fact that foot-binding is not extinct throughout China. The principal of our largest girls' school in West China informed me that practically all the pupils who come to that school have feet in one stage or other of the binding process. There are, it is true, many things which can be truly said of China as a whole; but the reporter needs continually to exercise care in what he says about that remarkable country.

I have no intention of attempting an exact statement of conditions in China today. The situation is in continual flux; the politics of the country are kaleidoscopic. All that I shall endeavor to do is to indicate by actual concrete experiences some of the conditions which prevail quite widely in the "Republic of China." I want you to see how I gained the impression that the Republic of China is today a militaristic feudalism. I am not quite sure about that term, but it seems to say what I felt.

China that Is not China

I touched China first at Shanghai, and was duly impressed, as I suppose everyone is, by the red-turbaned Sikhs who share with the Chinese the honor of policing the International Settlement. The Sikh stood for British stability, and for that I have always had great respect. But one did not have to be long in East China to discover that Shanghai is not all of it. I had been told, and found my first impression confirmed by observation, that here and there around the fringe China had made more or less important "concessions" to the western powers and that within these concessions the principle of "extra-territoriality" obtained. So, of course, I could not discover the Republic of China in these concessions; I must go beyond them. However, before I got so far as that, I fell into the good graces of the Customs, and paid my duty to, no, not a Chinese, but to an Englishman. And thus I learned that I had been correctly told that China does not administer her foreign customs: the Powers administer it for her.

So I went beyond Shanghai, down across the plain of Kiangsu and its continuation, the Chekiang plain—a fertile garden spot. And at every station I was attracted by the martial aspect of the police, who always carried guns, rifles, usually bayoneted, and never the night-sticks of our police at home. I was also impressed by the numbers of the military, passing to and fro over the railway, and actively parading upon the various drill-grounds. The remarkable and persistent bugling, which I found recurring daily at dawn and monotonously continuing, conveyed the impression that every city in which I stopped was more or less an armed camp. However, Kiangsu and Chekiang, if an armed camp, were not a battle-ground during the period of my stay. Business and farming went on very much as usual.

It was not until I reached Canton that I encountered the grim aspect of civil war. To be sure, rumors of the situation reached Hongkong, but when we endeavored to find out the actual condition of things, we could learn but little. The telegraph wires were down, the railway from Kowloon (just opposite Hongkong) to Canton had been torn up and traffic interrupted, the Chinese were fleeing from Canton to Hongkong for the greater security of the British flag. But steamer service, under the British flag, continued; the foreigner who went about his business was little likely to be interfered with. So Dr. Groesbeck and I went to Canton. We had no difficulty worth mentioning, although the river, which flows right through the heart of the city, was barricaded on both sides with sand-bag parapets, behind which patrols were constantly on the alert; two armies faced each other across the river, one the Kwangtung army representing Canton and South China, the other the Kwangsi army, supporting Tuchun Mu, the military governor of the province (himself a Kwangsi man), and representing the Northern or Peking government. While there had been some fighting in various parts of Kwangtung Province, there was no fighting in the city; instead they were dickering. I was told that General Mu asked $7,000,000 Mex. to retire to Kwangsi and that the local committee had succeeded in reducing his demand to $2,000,000, which sum they were likely to raise.

Demoralized by Militarism

There was no fighting, but business was paralyzed, leading citizens had fled taking with them such portable property as they could, the great Kung Yee Hospital was filled with refugees, the Chinese vice-president of Canton Christian College had about forty refugees in his house, and so on. I saw perhaps 1,000 abandoned rickshas, parked in a field inside of city limits, disused because the ricksha coolies found no demand for their services; nobody dared travel unless he must.

The situation has changed very greatly since last October, when this visit was made. General Mu took his ill-won millions and retired to Kwangsi. Members of the old Parliament met in Canton and elected Dr. Sun Yat Sen president of "the Republic of China," but the powers have not recognized him, nor are they likely to do so. Dr. Sun had not, at the time of my latest information, the support of all the southern provinces. Yunnan and Kweichow could not be counted upon and the Tuchun of Hunan held the theory of "state's rights"; that China should form a confederation of quasi-independent states.

In early November I reached the borders of Szechuan, the westernmost province of China. Travel is quite undisturbed, so long as one keeps to the steamers. But the Yangtze River steamers ply the river for only a portion of the year, for the simple reason that the stream is too shallow at extreme low water and too treacherous at extreme high water. Consequently, even although excellent steamer facilities are now provided clear to Suifu, travel for a good portion of the year is by small Chinese row-boat (or tow-boat, as the case may be). Under the conduct of Dr. C. E. Tompkins of Suifu our party traveled without incident to Ichang. At that point we heard many a weird tale of West China militarism broken from its restraints. We did not discount these, but they were not confirmed at that point in our experience. Our steamer from Ichang to Chungking, through the Gorges, was most excel-

PEACE OVER EARTH

*Blow, bugles, blow!
The battle years have ended, and we go
Onward to meet the future with a song,
Knowing our might is greater than all wrong—
Knowing we have a key for every gate
And that the heart has dare for every fate—
Knowing that God is in the years ahead,
As he was with us when the roads were red.*

*Blow, bugles, blow!
The shames and tyrannies begin to go,
Sing, bugles, sing into the ears of time
The end of the ancient crime—
Sing with a silver tongue,
Let all old faces gladden and grow young,
And let the hearts of youth
Sing with the glory of the world's New Truth—
The high glad brother hail;
For nevermore must Love's great purpose fail—
Never again the hopes depart
Out of the world's joy-stilled, grief-greathened heart.*

* * * * *

*O, let us gather as friends and say,
"Come, let us try the Master's way.
Ages we tried the way of swords,
And earth is weary of hostile hordes.
Comrades, read out his words again:
They are the only hope for men!
Love and not hate must come to birth;
Christ and not Cain must rule the Earth."*

lent in appointments and service, and we set out for Chungking.

Nor was our happiness seriously marred by the advent of an army. We had become somewhat inured to Chinese armies. And yet the novelty of an army in retreat added interest to our journey, for, flung through the full length of the Wind-box Gorge, and looking like a succession of pygmies threading the trail along the precipitous cliff-side, was the Kweichow army, fleeing from Szechuan. Only as the night settled down across the mountains and our vessel came to anchor did the last of the retreating column leave the little city of Kwei-fu, speedily to be replaced, however, by the advance guard of the Szechuanese. Next morning, as we steamed up-river, a fleet of some 150 junks, bearing Szechuanese soldiers and equipment, passed us in pursuit of the retreating army. We were not challenged, so little attention does the army pay to the foreigner.

Perhaps a few guns were fired that night at Kwei-fu; I am not certain. But there was no real fighting. However, one must not think that there is never any fighting in this civil strife, never any killing. Dr. Tompkins told me that he treated above 1,000 wounded at Luchow in the civil strife of 1917-18. At the same time, Chinese armies are likely to be relieved of the actual business of fighting by the negotiations, the dickering of their generals.

Do Business with Nearest General

The Yunnanese and the Szechuanese are old-time enemies and many a foray across the border has been recorded in provincial annals. Yet in a general situation, involving all China, the southwestern provinces—Szechuan, Yunnan and Kweichow—are likely to be found on the same side. Yunnan and Kweichow have been regarded as belonging to the South, Szechuan has been a battle-ground of North and South. Last autumn, just before our party reached Szechuan, the two chief military leaders of the province, who had been at outs, were sufficiently reconciled to unite their forces against the invader, with the result that the Yunnan and Kweichow troops were driven from the province. Then it became a question who should be military governor of Szechuan. That question had not been settled when I left Szechuan. One general settled down in Chungking, the other in the capital city, Chengtu, 350 miles away. You did business with the general nearest you.

These militarists are always insolvent, and sometimes armies get so far in arrears of pay that soldiers become highwaymen. Whether they become so or not, they are a dead-weight upon the life and activities of all China. On my way out of Szechuan, I spent a week in the little city of Chungchow, a city of some 12,000. Two thousand troops were quartered upon that city. There had been six overturnings of local administration (military) within the twelvemonth preceding, and each time a new military administrator took charge, he levied a fresh assessment upon the business men and citizens of means. It was even said that when he wished money he sent for some man of means and strung him up by the thumbs until he was ready to pay over the sum required. My friend, Mr. M. P. Smith, of the Canadian Methodist Mission, showed me the spot on the city wall where he stood, by requirement of the defending military officer, as mediator between the army within the city and that on the outside, when this incumbent took possession of the city.

The Vulnerable Invulnerable

When the Smith family and I reached the city of Wanhhsien, on our way down river, we found the city in an uproar. There had been a fanatical peasant uprising against the soldiers and the grasping officials. Farmers from the border of Kweichow, Szechuanese all of them, had armed themselves with bamboo pikes and knives, and under the leadership of a priest of the neighborhood had marched, to the number of several thousand, against the fortified city of Wanhhsien. It was said that there were 15,000 soldiers stationed there, but when these few thousand fanatics arrived and announced that they were "holy" and therefore invulnerable, the soldiers took to their heels, after a few score had lost their heads. Later, and only a couple of days before our arrival, the soldiers were paid their back wages in part, with the promise of more if they would drive the farmers from the city. They rallied and drove them, with great slaughter, across the river. As we reached the city, the British gunboat had dropped down from her regular anchorage to be out of range of the general's guns when he opened fire upon these rebels at daylight next morning. But when daylight came, they had gone; we neither saw nor heard anything more of them. All that was in the "pacified" province of Szechuan.

I was not under fire nor was I robbed on my West China trip, but I traveled with missionaries who had been frequently under fire and who had had first hand dealings with the robbers. I saw the heads of ex-robbers hanging on the Yachow city wall. The day I reached Kiungchow, on my way from Yachow to Chengtu, a head was taken down from the wall for which the authorities had paid $8,000 Mex.—the head of a robber chief. The day I left Chungchow, a young Methodist doctor and his wife arrived who had been twice under fire from the robbers, the second time for some two hours. But their escort, strange to say, instead of running away, fought the robbers off and brought them safely through. I am told that many of the robbers are ex-soldiers, who have deserted or have been discharged from the army, and whose military career had made hard work with their hands distasteful.

I traveled to Changsha from Wuchang one night with a Chinese gentleman who in the course of our journey discovered himself to me as "the military bandmaster of the Southern army at Changsha." The train was overrun with soldiers. On the southern border of Hupeh Province we crossed from Northern to Southern territory and my companion became more confident. He had been on a journey incognito to Hankow. Once in his own territory, we were safe in the undisputed possession of our railway compartment. He offered me the courtesy of transportation, saying that his relative was in high official position in connection with the railway. I appreciated the proffered courtesy but deplored the system.

The Squeeze System

When I speak of the system, I refer to what is popularly known as the practice of squeeze. That system would enable a railway official, where the system actually obtained, to salary a considerable portion of his family and to give his relatives free transportation over the lines under his control. That system obtains to a surprising extent all over China. I once asked a British consul why the returned students, who carry back to China no small degree of idealism, do not reform the system. His answer was that they have no chance. The system is so organized that the only way one can get into public life is to buy his way in, and he is himself corrupted by the process. He is so impoverished that he must recoup his fortunes by the same process of graft. In the Republic of China appointments are seldom upon the basis of merit, hence in administration, except in certain branches of government where the overhead is foreign, a high level of efficiency is not often attained. This is the reason, or a chief element therein, why the Peking Government is bankrupt. It has mortgaged the financial future of the country to serve its private ends and to placate the militaristic overlords of the country, who, though nominally subordinate to the central government are in reality the rulers of China. There is no more powerful figure in China today than Chang Tso-lin, Tuchun of Manchuria.

Is China, then, justified in retaining the forms, or part of them, of a republic, when she is a militaristic oligarchy? Would it not help to have substituted for the forms of a republic the rule of the Manchus? It was a British subject of wide experience who answered my question. "No," said he, "to revert to the monarchy would not solve China's problem. The root of the evil would remain; the monarchy would have the same evils to face. It is better to retain the form of a republic, in the hope that China's dream of democracy may one day become an actuality." The solution of China's problem does not lie in mechanical changes in governmental forms; it lies in a change of heart.

Hope for the Nation

The hope of China is in the multitudes of young men and women who are coming under the influence of Christian ideals and who are responding to them with a will. They can create new centers of influence in China. They can set up new standards in government and business. They can make "the Republic of China" a great reality. Meanwhile, let us remember these young people; they are for the present in a most difficult situation, they need patience, vision, devotion beyond the ordinary human measure. And let us remember the missionaries. They have to work amidst all these changes and fluctuations which paralyze business and upset the life of communities. As I traveled among them and became aware of the handicaps under which they must labor; as I saw how courageously they return to their tasks after the interruptions incident to the region of their labors, I paid them silent tribute in my heart of hearts. If I were free to go anywhere as a missionary, and I say this with all regard to the opportunities in other fields, I would go to China. Only as the City of God is established in China, with its ministries of regeneration, education and sanitation, can the Republic of China come to her own.

"As Big as We Grow"

Translated from the Karen by E. N. Harris and retold by Bessie E. H. Harris

CHILDREN and grandchildren: In the olden days, before the white brother came to us from across the sea with the Golden Book, even before our fathers journeyed to these hills to burn them over and raise their upland rice, there lived in this very jungle Kayu, the lion, king of the beasts. His subjects feared him more than they loved him, for his temper was never the same, nor could they please him two days in succession.

One sultry day, just before the rains, when all the animals were lying under the trees trying to forget the heat, Kayu summoned them with a great roar and said,

"I have called you together for the purpose of smelling my august breath." At these words his subjects bowed themselves before him; but even this homage did not seem to please him. Shaking his mane fiercely, and fixing his eye on a deer, he roared in a terrible voice,

"Oh Sambar, come here!" The timid deer crept near, not daring to raise his eyes in the presence of his king. "You smell my breath," commanded the lion. The deer lifted his nose, took one whiff, and fell to the ground; for the lion had feasted royally that day on long-neglected buffalo meat.

"Stand up," growled Kayu, "tell me what it smells like." The frightened deer, trembling, replied:

"Your Majesty, it is very, very bad! It is vile! In fact it is the worst breath I ever smelt." The lion's eyes burned like fire, as with one stroke of his great paw he knocked the deer to the ground, and thundered,

"What! Do you talk that way to your king? Do you insult me?"

All the other animals shrank back into the jungle as far as they dared, and each hoped that he would be spared the fatal question. Tweehawko, the fox, thought he was well hidden behind a pinkadoo tree, but the lion spied his bushy tail.

"Come out of there, you rascal," he called, "and tell me what my breath is like." Now the fox was cunning, and imagined that he knew a way to escape Sambar's fate. He carefully sniffed the breath of the lion, and, bad as it was, he struggled, with his usual deceit, to assume a pleased expression.

"Your Excellency," he said, his words flowing as smoothly as oil, "your breath is like the perfume of the jessamine when it is covered with the morning dew." Out came that heavy paw again, and Tweehawko lay where Sambar had fallen a moment before, as the chief roared,

"What! You know my breath is never fragrant! Will you lie to your king?"

By this time, all the beasts were very much afraid, for they did not care to feel the weight of Kayu's paw, nor were they wise enough to answer him according to his strange humor. The heart of poor little Pudeh, the rabbit, went pit-a-pat as he sat under a small clump of bamboo and thoughtfully waved one ear up and down. This motion irritated the king, for he cried in a more terrible voice than before,

"You long-eared one, come here, and let me see if you are as clever with your nose and tongue as you are with your ears." The rabbit hopped across the space that separated him from the lion, and finally stopped at his feet. Kayu glowered at him,

"How small you are! You would make just about one mouthful for such as I." This speech made poor little Pudeh's heart beat faster than before, but he replied simply,

"This is as big as we grow." Then the great beast leaned down his shaggy head and opened his fearful jaws until the rabbit thought that he would surely be swallowed alive. He raised his little nose and gravely sniffed once—twice—then, without answering the king, he turned away and flopped his ear. The frightened company held their breath at the fate which they felt was about to overtake the impudent rabbit. Before, however, the lion could put his evident rage into action, Pudeh had gravely lifted his nose again. "Sniff, sniff." The king awaited his verdict, but again the rabbit turned away, and seemed to meditate. Curiosity now filled Kayu's heart in place of his former anger, but when Pudeh had sniffed for a fourth time looking more and more perplexed at each attempt, the lion grew impatient, and roared,

"Come now, this is enough. Tell me what my breath smells like, and tell me quick, or—"

"Your Majesty," murmured the rabbit, "I am one of your most distant subjects; but I came at once on sound of your call. I live in the deep jungle; to get my food I go out in the early morning to graze in the meadows; the dew falls on my head and I have such a terrible cold that your breath does not smell of anything."

Greatly amused at this clever answer, Kayu, changeable fellow that he was, forgot his anger, laughed loudly, and turned the conference into a feast.

"Three Great Utterances"

BY FRANK W. STANTON

A SHORT time ago President Harding, standing in the presence of 5,000 draped caskets containing the remains of our boys who died overseas, at a memorial service held in their honor at Hoboken, N. Y., made this significant statement, "It must not be again. God grant that it shall not be again. And every parent and loyal citizen said, Amen. We have had enough of war.

A little later on the same day the President, addressing a large group of business men in the city of New York, made this significant statement, "Full speed ahead." Probably there is no other utterance more needed at this time, when business interests abroad and in this country seems to be at a standstill.

At the Northern Baptist Convention held at Des Moines, Iowa, Mrs. Helen Barrett Montgomery, the first woman in this country to be elected as president of a great religious body, when being introduced as the new president made this significant remark, "Can't we get together and do the greatest task ever done?" Everyone present felt like saying, Amen.

In these three utterances we have three challenges to which we can well afford to give heed today.

The first challenge, by our President is a challenge to us in relation to our brethren in other lands. It is a challenge concerning our international problem, to get together on some platform so that war shall be forever abolished.

The second challenge, of our President is a challenge to the great business interests. Why all of this business depression? Why cannot the business men get together and say we will "go ahead"? If these men are big enough to promote big business interests they certainly are able to get together and say "This shall not be; we must go ahead." Let these men meet this challenge at once.

A Challenge to Our Religion

The third challenge by Mrs. Montgomery is a challenge to our religion. We are to get together not simply as a denomination but all religious forces and give a practical demonstration of the power of God and Jesus Christ. During the war they said that Christianity had failed. As a matter of fact, it had not been tried. And now prominent men in Europe and prominent leaders in our own country are saying that the present hope of the world for all its problems is to be found in religion. If this is so—and it is so because, after all, the religious forces lead in every real movement for advancement—it is then, not only our privilege but our obligation as Christians to assume our position of leadership and show that Christianity is a real force for righteousness. Shall we not then heed the words of our president, Mrs. Montgomery, and as a denomination "get together" and lead in this great undertaking of giving a practical demonstration of the power of our religion?

There is no time for us to delay, if we are to meet this great challenge. Let us get our forces together as soon as possible this fall and plan for a great advance movement for Christ and his church. All at it, and together, will accomplish the task.

Orthodoxy of Spirit

BY THOMAS J. HOPKINS

Christianity is a word and a spirit; a doctrine and a frame of mind. It is far easier to master its word than its spirit. One may be orthodox in word and heterodox in spirit. A man may go around with his Bible under his arm and have the spirit of Jesus under his feet. He may quote Scripture by the yard and merit the criticism of Christ when he said, "They love to make long prayers, standing on the corner of the street, to be seen of men."

While so much is being said about doctrinal standards, it ought to be profitable to think of the standard Christian spirit. For it is altogether possible that, in the present agitation about faith as a body of doctrine, men may fail to maintain the temper of mind which is like unto the mind of Christ. If failure there is anywhere, it had better be in doctrine than in spirit.

Doctrine Important

This is not said because sight is lost of the importance of correct belief. Doctrine is important for the reason that it cannot be separated from life; the one will issue in the other. It is John, the apostle of love, who says, "Whosoever abideth not in the doctrine of Christ hath not God. He that abideth in the doctrine of Christ, he hath both the Father and the Son. If there come any unto you and have not this doctrine, receive him not into your house, neither bid him God-speed." But nothing is so sure to lead to the right doctrine as the right temper of mind. While Jesus was on earth his disciples had a poor theology, especially as regards the kingdom, but a true spirit corrected all that in time. They were sometimes wrong in spirit also, as for example when they wished to call down fire from heaven and consume certain Samaritans who would not receive the Master; but they were not over-sensitive to rebuke and hence imbibed more and more of the mind of Jesus and grew in sweet reasonableness and love.

Some of the brethren of our denomination are anxious that we declare ourselves once more in a confession of faith. To do this would not be out of harmony with what the denomination has done in the past; the new thing about it is that the orthodoxy of the many is questioned by the few, who have said they were unwilling to continue in fellowship unless all subscribe to their confession. If the Northern Baptist Convention should decide to issue a declaration of faith, that would be one thing; but if a confession be made by a dissatisfied group that insists upon the signatures of all the rest before being willing to continue in fellowship, that is quite another matter. Since the whole thing is chiefly a preachers' contest, for many of our professors are also preachers, two or three considerations ought to cause the ministers to have more confidence in one another: first, that once upon a time we were all received into membership of Baptist churches; secondly, that there came a day when Baptist churches set us apart to the Baptist ministry; and thirdly, that we are all in good standing with the churches of which we are now members. All of which should create a presumption in favor of the assumption that we are Baptists. Let us really believe in the autonomy of the local church and make just a little more of the orthodoxy of a man who is still a member and it may be a pastor of a local church. I make a motion that we express our confidence in one another as Baptists and turn our attention to fighting the common enemy. A confession of faith is good, but an overflowing spirit of good will is better. It is easier to write a confession of faith than to recite it with a Christian spirit. A Christian minister is not one who preaches certain doctrines, but one who preaches them with a certain spirit. Joseph Parker says: "Let me invite the charge of heterodoxy rather than sit down and pluck the flesh from the bones of better men than myself." He says also, "If we have escaped criticism, it may be we have escaped Christianity."

Baptists have long and justly prided themselves upon the fact that they have burned no heretics at the stake. But can we say we have never scorched men with words? Can we say we have never hurled hot ink at those who differed from us, even those of our own household? Which inflicts more pain, a few minutes in the fire; or a whole life under sharp criticism, suspicion and calumny?

Intolerant Dogmatism Bad

At the conference at Marburg in 1529, Luther said to Zwingli, as he refused to shake hands with him, "You do not belong to the communion of the Christian Church . . . one or the other of us must be a minister of Satan." This caused the gentle Zwingli to burst into tears. The writer overheard a Baptist minister, who is a staunch defender of what he conceives to be orthodoxy, say that he would not sit on the same platform with certain of his ministerial brethren, if he knew they were there. All men of strong convictions need to guard themselves against an intolerant dogmatism. The great Spurgeon erred there: he felt obliged to withdraw from close fellowship with John Clifford, Shakespeare and Alexander MacLaren, because he thought them guilty of "downgrade tendencies." He was honest but his action is in serious question today. Their names with his are inscribed high on the Christian honor roll in letters of gold, and it would have been more to the credit of the great Spurgeon if he had found some way to tolerate them and fellowship them also.

But if some one cite the fact that Jesus was in the habit of using strong words in uttering his appraisal of some men calling them children of the devil and hypocrites, declaring some to be in and some to be out of his kingdom, it should not be forgotten that Christ knew the exact facts in each case and we may not. If it be claimed that Paul used similar language and said of certain teachers "If any man preach any other gospel than that ye received, let him be accursed," it ought to be remembered that he was inspired to define the gospel and we are not. What may strike us as heresy today, may be received as the soul of orthodoxy tomorrow; and some who oppose it today will possibly accept it at length and perhaps defend it against the next advance. Such men may perform a needed service, but very few envy them their task. The revelation of the truth was progressive, but not only so; its interpretation is progressive also.

Men Complement Each Other

One of the best things in the world is that not all men see alike; thus it is that they are able to complement and round out the intelligence of one another. There is another thing which stands next to that: the willingness to remain with the crowd and hear all sides and think one's way through. This is the wise course in the great majority of cases. Lincoln was never surprised in debate by his great opponent Douglas, because he had looked at his side of the argument. This is a good thing to do, if for no other reason than to become more firmly entrenched in one's own view.

A mind hospitable to new truth is to be coveted. Barnabas was a good man for at least three reasons: he was open-handed, for he had a piece of land and sold it, laying the proceeds at the apostles' feet; he was open-hearted, being willing to give John Mark another chance, even after the generous Paul "turned him down;" and he was open-minded, for he was willing to give Paul the hand of fellowship, and introduced him to the rest of the brethren, when all but himself were afraid to trust him. He was orthodox in spirit. It seems to this writer that this is the place to put the emphasis. There may be false teaching among us; all right, let's weed it out, whether a gangrenous radicalism, or a deadening conservatism. If Peter is wrong in doctrine, let Paul resist him to the face; but let it be done in love. "For though one speak with the tongues of men and of angels and have not love, he becomes sounding brass or clanging cymbal." Free speech is needed and always will be, for it is only after a speaker gets his idea out and views it objectively, that he sometimes discovers it was not worth dying for after all; and it is only by free speech that one sometimes utters the thought that his brethren need, that the best comes to the top and the truth prevails. Adrian, Michigan.

Educational Emphasis

The outstanding emphasis of the Council was on things educational. This does not mean that the life of the spirit in the individual and in the church was not mightily quickened through the fellowship of prayer, through the sermon and through many an address, particularly those of a missionary character. But one of the most noteworthy things done in the seven days was the establishment of a Congregational Foundation for Education. It is designed in a dignified, definite and thoroughly Congregational way to express the continuing interest of our churches in the collegiate institutions which are the product of Congregational initiative and direction and which greatly need today, not merely financial assistance, but a constant and definite embodiment of the good will of the denomination toward them, which may in turn challenge them to reciprocate in practical ways, as they have opportunity, the interest taken in them. Delegates differed in their thought of the way in which the Council should express its desire and purpose but they were practically unanimous in their conviction that a new and more effective relationship should be consummated between the colleges and the churches.

This establishment of a Congregational Foundation for Education was the chief but not the only embodiment of the Council's interest in uniting the trained mind with the consecrated heart. The definite steps taken with a view to recruiting the ministry, the eagerness which characterized audience and speakers wherever and whenever subjects were raised relating to the religious education of children and young people, indicate an increasing determination to offset irreligion and perversions of the true religion of Jesus Christ with the right type of instruction and influence.

Evangelism Wanted

Along with this valuation of a trained ministry ample in numbers, and of religious education in the church school and home went keen appreciation of the church's obligation to sow the gospel seed in fields remote and near that are under the particular care of the missionary societies and to impregnate the ministrations of the local church with the evangelistic spirit. Nor have Congregationalists grown any less zealous in their desire to improve external conditions and abate the outward woes of mankind. In the all too brief time available for such discussions it was clear that the sympathies of the Council were with the upward urge on the part of those who through the long years have been handicapped and disadvantaged.

All in all it was a Council of power and wisdom. It remedied whatever maladjustments had come to exist in the relations of the Congregational World Movement to other agencies by incorporating it into the Commission on Missions. It

Congregationalists Meet in Council

(The following estimate of the biennial council of Congregational churches, which met in Los Angeles the first week in July, is from the pen of Dr. Bridgman, for many years editor of the Congregationalist and appeared as the leading editorial of that paper in its issue of July 21. Baptists cannot fail to be interested in this summary of a great meeting of their Congregationalist brethren.)

Beginning with the Worcester Council of 1889, I have missed only one or two of these national assemblages of Congregationalists of the United States. Up to 1913 the Council met triennially, since then, biennially. From those earlier gatherings I usually went home with a sense of disappointment over so much said and so little done. The societies, the colleges, the seminaries were practically outside the circle of the Council's interests. It could resolve about them, but it had no official relation to them. Triennium after triennium, it and they went their respective ways, their orbits seldom intersecting.

A Mobilization of Brains

In 1913 the desire of the denomination for an integration of its various agencies found expression in the new constitution adopted at Kansas City, the work of nineteen able and loyal men. It brought the societies within the jurisdiction of the Council and made its voting membership the predominant voting membership of all the societies.

The four Councils which have met since 1913—at Columbus, New Haven, Grand Rapids and just now at Los Angeles—have revealed the wisdom and value of the new regime. The Council has become self-conscious without becoming conceited, strong but not domineering, compact but still elastic, forward-looking but not radical. Many of the best and the most useful men of the denomination come and stay through. The Council, wherever it meets, mobilizes a creditable representation of the brains, the energy, the culture and Christian consecration of American Congregationalism. Of all this we had abundant evidence at Los Angeles.

The prognostication that the holding of the Council at a point so distant from the Atlantic Coast would be a mistake was not justified by the event. Indeed, though the delegations from the states between the Hudson and the Mississippi were comparatively small and from the states east of the Hudson still smaller, these delegations included a notable number of capable men. The Council was not stampeded by any one section of the country or in the interests of any one candidate or cause. Moreover, ample proof was had, as the days went on, of what the coming of the Council meant to the California brethren, and their appreciation of its long overdue visit was only exceeded by their devotion to the comfort and welfare of their guests.

The Council had a splendid moderator in the person of Dr. William E. Barton. He deserved the high honor because of his valuable and unremitting service to our common interests over a long period of years. Absolutely fair and courteous, remarkably felicitous in his introductions, equal to every parliamentary situation, witty and tender by turns, he held the Council steadily to its work and infused into its deliberations and atmosphere the right spirit.

The New Secretary

The election of Charles E. Burton to the secretaryship of the Council, its highest gift, its most important office, revealed quite as much the guiding of God as the hand of man. Not a vestige of ecclesiastical politics entered into the friendly contest between his supporters and the equally ardent supporters of Dr. Carl S. Patton, pastor of the church which was entertaining the Council. In a third group of considerable size were many who, up to the moment when the nominating speeches were made were undecided, some of them preferring still another candidate. When, however, the first ballot showed a two-thirds vote for Dr. Burton and when, a moment later, Dr. Patton, in a speech set new goals in various fields of endeavor. It fused into one happy comradeship representatives of different sections and different ways of thinking. It was gloriously free from some of the contentious issues which have vexed recent assemblages of sister bodies, for which immunity we should be profoundly grateful.

As the man on the look-out, even though he can see only the nearer waters through which the good ship is about to plough its way, calls back to his captain, "all's well," so we who have been at this outpost and have watched the charting of the course, the character of the officers and crew and the meaning and purpose of the voyage can confidently call back to the great body of our churches the country over, "All's well with Congregationalism."

Literalism

(Reprinted from The Herald of Gospel Liberty)

IT would wonderfully help to clarify the present theological atmosphere and do much to stop the tendency towards strife and division in the church if there were not so much confusion over the use of terms. Bible students too often get into the pernicious habit of attaching a sort of sanctity to certain words and set phrases until in their own minds and in the minds of many other of their hearers, these expressions come to stand for more than the truth admits. Thus they deceive themselves and deceive others—a thing which is none the less injurious and confusing simply because it is done in such unintentional and sincere way. The word "literalist," for instance, is just now being made a sort of touchstone of faith; and its implicates are being used in such a way that the church is likely to be riven asunder if Christian people do not come to their senses and stop forcing issues which simply do not exist. It sounds mighty orthodox to say: "I am a literalist; I believe every word which the Bible says, and just as it says it." And every now and then one hears some one make just such a statement. Certain speakers pride themselves in declaring that they believe the Bible "from cover to cover, every word and syllable of it;" and then they assert that not to believe what it says in plain English is to dispute God and destroy His Word. Such sentiment has really become the battle cry of a certain group, and is the crux of the whole "fundamentalist" movement which is forcing a more threatening division upon the church than any other it has known in a century. Those kind of expressions about the Bible tickle the ears, and they are easily made; but they are doing a vast amount of harm and creating a great deal of needless friction. For such statements simply are not true—and half of the present controversy would be settled at once if it were recognized by all that they are not true.

Who Takes All Literally?

We have never known any man who believed every word and every sentence of the Bible just as it is written, literally. We have known a great many who thought they did; but we never talked to one who did not tell us why certain passages were "figurative," and certain others metaphorical, illustrating some great principle. For instance, we love and have the finest fellowship with a dear old brother, as good as the day is long, who throws every fundamental of astronomy and geography to the wind because he "believes every word in the Bible" (said with pious emphasis). He claims the Bible teaches that the earth is flat, for it speaks about the "four corners of the earth." But that man would fight at the drop of a hat, and coolly explain away the literal meaning of Christ's own words,

"Whosoever smiteth thee on thy right cheek, turn to him the other also." We have heard of but one man who insisted that when Cain slew Abel the blood which cried from the ground actually uttered articulate sounds; but even he hesitates to assume that God is clothed in feathers simply because the old psalmist sings so beautifully: "He shall cover thee with His feathers, and under His wings shalt thou trust." But turn from instances like these to passages which imply deeper and more practical truths, and we find "literalists" all doing exactly the same thing. Even such leaders among them as James M. Gray, Torrey, Halderman, Scofield, and others, do not "wash feet," but explain away the literal application of John 13: 14; and they do not require the women in their churches to wear "a covering for their heads" as the Bible teaches in I Cor. 11, if taken literally. There are only a very few minor churches which do follow these injunctions literally; and we do not know any church on earth which requires that the women "keep silence," as the Bible literally teaches in I Cor. 14—that is, not very silent! There are some which still make a pretense of following that passage literally, and do not allow their women to preach; but they permit them to teach in Sunday-school, testify in prayer-meeting, and become missionaries. But it is an absurd travesty on language to pretend that that is "keeping silence!"

Or take another group of Bible passages. The most violent literalists on the subject of premillennialism will tell you why the Bible's command to take no usury is not to be obeyed literally in this day and age; and why Christ's injunction that if any man will "take away thy coat, let him have thy cloak also" does not mean just that. Most of these "literalists" save up a bit for a rainy day in spite of Christ's command to "take no thought for the morrow"; for they know that it is the right and wise thing for them personally to do—and what an injustice and offense against human society are those who do not practice thrift for tomorrow's needs. Civilization would be stagnated and most of mankind would perish from the earth in a single year if those words of Christ were to be taken absolutely literally. The people of every great nation would starve in a single winter did we stop our canneries, burn our granaries and storehouses, and live as the lilies of the field or the birds of the air. We all know that that is not what Christ meant. But says the "literalist," the word "thought" there means undue anxiety and concern—an interpretation which not only evades the strictly literal meaning, but also appeals to a translation of the original text other than the translation given in the King James version, by which they stand or fall!

Our Personal Reservations

The literal fact is that there is no such thing as pure literalism. Every one who claims to be a literalist, reserves to himself the right to exclude certain passages of the Bible from their Simon-pure literal English implications and give to them some figurative or other significance. Every honest man must admit that this is true. But even more important than this is the fact that "literalists" never agree among themselves on just which particular passages are to be and which are not to be taken literally, nor on what the actual meaning is of those which are to be taken figuratively. Every Bible student, after all, asserts his right, before God, to decide by his own reason and heart which passages of the Bible speak literally and which speak figuratively and by parable. In the last analysis, every Protestant Christian stands on his inalienable right, given of God and revealed by Christ, to interpret God's Word according to his own reasoning and judgment; and however much he may deny the right of such judgment to others, he demands it for himself as a mark of his own sanity.

These facts can be proven by a simple test among any rational lovers of the Bible anywhere. And because these facts are true, it is absolutely wrong and tragically misleading to use the word "literalist" in the way in which now is being done—as though it differentiated Bible interpretation in kind rather than in degree. The "literalists" are not literalists any more than any of the rest of us except in degree. The principle is exactly the same. They use their intelligence and judgment in deciding whether a passage is literal, or figurative. This undeniable fact conceded, much of the ground for the controversy that is threatening the church with schism disappears. For the "literalists" and the non-literalists will then have to recognize each other as not differing in principle and in kind, but only in degree. Neither is any more sincere or devout in appreciation of the Bible as the Word of God than is the other; and, however much they may differ in their interpretation of it, each will know that the other is seeking, in all of the earnestness of his passion for Christ, to learn what God really means for that Bible to say to the minds and souls of men. And believing thus towards each other, they will differ as Christian brethren, lovingly and helpfully; and not as orthodox and heretic, bitterly, resentfully, to the curse of the church.

*"Our Fathers in a wondrous age,
Ere yet the Earth was small,
Ensured to us an heritage,
And doubted not at all
That we, the children of their heart,
Which then did beat so high,
In later time should play like part
For our posterity.*

* * *

*Then, fretful, murmur not they gave
So great a charge to keep.
Nor dream that awe-struck Time shall save
Their labor while we sleep.
Dear-bought and clear, a thousand year
Our Fathers' title runs.
Make we likewise their sacrifice,
Defrauding not our sons."*

Children of Japan

A delegate to the World's Sunday School Convention takes note of Japanese babies and school children. Dress, manners, education

BY NELLIE HOLMES

A FEW years ago Mr. Heinz was visiting Japan, and observed the art shops, the business life and the genius of a dominant race. He was a lover of beautiful scenery, but he was more interested in the people, who were bringing things to pass by leaps and bounds. With his superior judgment, he discovered in the mental and physical alertness of the Japanese people the material for splendid nation-building. He was very much impressed with the bright, progressive children of Japan in public schools and Sunday-schools, and as a dreamer of dreams had a vision of the nation to be, if but the Christ touch through religious education should be felt in the construction of character.

Returning to America his vision grew upon him. As a result, a tour party of twenty-nine, with Mr. Heinz as chairman, made a trip to Japan in 1913, which was a forerunner of the recent world's Eighth S. S. Convention, held in Tokyo, October 5-14, 1920.

The Great Convention

The inspiration of this marvellous convention will live long in the memory of our Japanese friends, and we as returning delegates feel at a loss to find words to express ourselves. In fact, I could give ten lectures on my trip to the Orient. In this article I take for my topic, "Children of Japan."

To the Japanese baby the beginning of life is not very different from its beginning to babies in the western world. Its birth, whether it be girl or boy, is the cause of much rejoicing. As boys alone can carry on the family name and inherit titles and estates, they are considered of more importance, but many parents' hearts are made glad by the addition of a daughter to the family circle. As soon as the event takes place a special messenger is dispatched to notify relatives and intimate friends while formal letters of announcement are sent to those less closely related.

All persons thus notified must make an early visit to the new comer, in order to welcome it into the world, and must take with them some present. Toys, pieces of cotton, silk or crepe for the baby's dress are regarded as suitable, and everything must be accompanied by fish or eggs for good luck. The baby, especially if it be the first one in the family, receives many presents in the first few weeks of its life, and at a certain time proper acknowledgment must be made, and return presents sent. This is done when the baby is about thirty days old. Before the seventh day the baby receives its name. A certain kind of rice, cooked with red beans, a festival dish denoting good fortune, is usually partaken of by the family on the seventh day.

Dressed for Church

On the thirteenth day after birth, the baby is taken for its first visit to the temple. For this visit great preparations are made, and the baby is dressed in finest silk or crepe, gayly figured-garments made specially for the occasion. Upon the dress appears in various places the crest of the family. Thus arrayed, and accompanied by members of the family, the young baby is carried to one of the Shinto temples, and there placed under the protection of the patron deity of the temple. This god is supposed to become the special guardian of the child through life. Offerings are made to the god and to the priest, and a blessing is obtained. It is usually on this day that the family send to their friends some acknowledgment of the presents received. A letter of thanks usually accompanies the return presents.

The Women Will Understand

The Japanese baby's dress consists of as many wide-sleeved, straight silk, cotton or flannel garments as the season of the year may require—all cut after the same pattern, and that pattern the same in shape as the grown-up kimono. The garments are fitted, one inside of the other, before they are put on; and then they are laid down on the floor and the baby is laid into them; a soft belt, attached to the outer garment or dress, is tied around the waist, and the baby is dressed without a shriek or a wail, as simply and easily as possible.

The younger the child, the more brilliant is the dress. You will see a mite, a little baby girl that cannot walk or talk, clothed in silk crepe of the most brilliant color possible—rainbow color, almost prismatic in its brilliancy. As the child grows older, the colors fade and become duller, until by the time she is a full grown woman they have sobered down almost to Quaker hues—except here and there where a tiny edging of color shows itself.

Babies are seen carried on the back of brother or sister within a few weeks after birth. Children often only five or six years old are the baby's nurses.

Advantages of Living in Public

Living in public, as the Japanese babies do, they soon acquire an intelligent, interested look, and seem to enjoy the games of the older children, upon whose backs they are carried, as much as the players themselves.

The kindergarten age is very interesting to me, and I have visited several kindergartens in Japan. The children wear a little apron over a bright kimono, if a girl; a dark kimono, if a boy. At one kindergarten they sang, "Good Morning to you" in English and Japanese. In Japanese it runs thus: "Ohayo sensei, ohayo sensei, Ohayo minasan, ohayo sensei." Translated: "Good morning, dear teacher; good morning, dear teacher; Good morning all; good morning, dear teacher."

Out of their big soulful eyes they often looked at the stranger with great wonder, especially if she had blue eyes and hair of blonde hue. Their wonder grew when she pointed to different parts of her body and gave the Japanese: ha (tooth); hana (nose); mi (eye); mimi (ear); udi (arm); ubi (finger); ubiwa (finger-ring); kubi (neck); kubiwa (necklace); kuchi (mouth); kao (face); ashi (leg); kutsu (foot). So I made them forget my personality and we soon became friends, and some of the children motioned for me to join them in their games.

The dress of a school girl consists of the kimono dress, not quite as bright as little sister's, but over which she wears a plaited skirt. The boys wear a kimono, polka dot or striped, and over that a dark skirt called the "hakana."

I spent four days at Miyanoshta (the famous mountain resort, a perfect dream land amidst towny peaks and rushing waterfalls). One day I visited the "Gakko" (school) on the mountain side. I will never forget my first impressions as I entered the school room, where a tiny boy with a pointer could scarcely reach the Japanese characters on the board, and rattled them off like lightning.

In another room we were shown specimens of the writing of Japanese characters, good and otherwise.

In still another room we saw specimens of lacquer work and other work of decorative nature.

The manual and art departments were intensely interesting.

Bowing to Teacher

But recess has come—a low bow to teacher, and the pupils round about face and march in fine order to the playground. Athletics form an important part in the school life of boys and girls.

We returned to the class room to hear the boys and girls read English. They wrestle hard with our language as they are anxious to master English. At the age of twelve years they take up the study.

Boys and girls are required to spend eight years in the "elementary school"; next they go to "middle school" for five years; then the "higher school" for three years; finally to the Imperial University at Tokyo or Kyoto, where the exams are more severe than at Harvard. And the student need not stop with the university. There are still the normal schools "middle" and "higher," technical schools of all sorts, and professional schools. Foreign languages are required—French, English, Greek (six years of latter language). Out of 1,200 students finishing high school, 300 only having the highest standard can enter the university on account of lack of room.

150,000 S. S. Children

Almost 2,000 delegates, representing fifteen countries and five continents, marched in a body with appropriate banners and flags representing their respective countries, from Imperial Theatre to Hibya Park, where 15,000 Japanese Sunday-school children were gathered, who greeted us with the waving of flags, and "banzais" i. e., ten thousand years of health, wealth, and prosperity. This was a memorable Sunday when this group of Sunday-school children and delegates from many lands marched through the capital of Japan, the children singing as they marched, "Jesus Loves Me This I Know," in their native tongue, and shouting too, as they marched along "Banzai, banzai, banzai." There are 150,000 Sunday-school children in Japan.

Significance of the Death of Jesus

By H. O. ROWLANDS

But God commendeth his love toward us in that while we were yet sinners Christ died for us, (R. V.) Romans 5:8.

MEN have always praised the life and character of Jesus Christ. His blameless conduct, wise teachings, the deeds of benevolence and mercy he wrought, have combined to exalt him to be the greatest of the sons of men, "the chiefest among ten thousand," the superman of the race, the ideal man, the son of humanity. However, the New Testament, the only written record of his life, places the accent of importance on his death. Nearly one-third of the record is given to the events of the last week of his life as if the supreme value of his wonderful career congested around the cross. He himself more than once referred to his death as the vitalizing factor of his mission on earth. To Nicodemus he declared that as "Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness so must the Son of man be lifted up." To the inquiring Greeks he sent the message, "Except the grain of wheat fall down and die it abideth alone; but if it die it bringeth forth much fruit." In the shadow of the cross he said, "And I if I be lifted up from the earth will draw all men to myself." After his resurrection he said, "Ought not the Christ to have suffered these things and enter his glory?" The first preaching of his Apostles placed the emphasis on his death and resurrection. The "cross of Jesus," that is, his shameful death, was Paul's constant theme while his birth, miracles and sermons are scantily discussed. His death was held as an unique, sublime, overshadowing fact in the moral universe in the New Testament writings. But coin much handled loses the superscription, or becomes indistinct; so also great truths sometimes become so familiar by much discussion that they lose the impressiveness of their original meaning. So the significance and importance of the death of our Lord has by familiarity with them in our day been blurred and overlooked. Let us refresh our memories and clarify our vision of the significance of this great act of Jesus, his death.

Victim of a Mob

1. His death was the result of the deathless conflict between the good man and the evil world in which he lives and which he condemns and endeavors to reform. So did Socrates in Athens, Savonarola in Florence, Lovejoy and Brown in the United States. The hatred they had inspired in men slew them.

Jesus had bitterly condemned the selfishness and sins of his times; he had denounced the hypocrisies of the people's leaders and the hollowness of their pretensions until they bitterly hated him. Pilate knew it was "out of malice" he was brought before his court and accused. He was the victim of the wrath of his enemies. The turbulent mob, the mocking tormentors, the cruel gibbet, the agonies of the nail-piercing, and the tortures on the tree were the incidents and results of the endless war between a holy man consumed with zeal and a world in bondage to sin. The crimson story of this war from the days of Abel to the present hour is familiar. 'Tis a story that will be continued until unto him "every knee shall bow and every tongue confess" and he shall be crowned Lord of all—king glorious and eternal. Jesus was crucified by "wicked hands" as a result of hatred and malice.

A Martyr for Great Truths

II. The death of Jesus was a holy martyrdom for the truths he had revealed and the principles he preached and advocated. Paul declared he "witnessed before Pilate." John calls him the "faithful witness (martyr)," that is truthful and persistent, as a martyr he died as Stephen, the first Christian martyr died, and then all the apostles who shed their blood to verify their testimony. The name of Jesus is the first on the radiant roll of Christianity's martyrs, missionaries and heroic saints. He had revealed great truths and taught principles that revolutionized the politics, morals and religion of the world, turning it upside down because the wrong side was up. He revealed God to men and men to themselves. He brought life and immortality to such a light that made the traditions and superstitions of his age appear in their ragged worthlessness. He claimed to speak with the authority of God and bring a message of deliverance to men. The age which he condemned disbelieved him and summoned him to retract or be slain. He died for the verity of his message, died as the modern missionary dies for the cause he loves, with this difference—the missionary dies for his faith and convictions; Jesus died knowing the truths and facts he preached were the granite verities that would abide. The ordinary martyr dies for his faith; Jesus died for his knowledge.

A Revealer of God

III. Jesus died to reveal to men the disposition of God toward them. Not long ago our government sent a special envoy to a suspicious nation to impress on its people that the United States was kindly disposed toward them, and would gladly help them in their troubles. Men had lost sight of the nature and disposition of God toward them. They fancied he hated them and must be conciliated. They feared and fled from his presence, guilt-driven and condemned. But God always loved the world and "sent His only begotten Son" to reveal the Father's love and to convince men that the great Father loved them with a love eternal and quenchless. Jesus did not come to persuade God to pity and have mercy on men; but by revealing the love of God for them to persuade them to be reconciled to God and love Him. Someone has said that "Calvary is God's eternal heart-ache for men." As a mother longs and aches for her wayward, erring child does God love men. This revelation of divine love creates an influence to induce men to love and return to God. Listen: "Herein is love, not that we loved God, but that He loved us and sent His Son to be a propitiation for our sins." (1 John 5). Again: "We love God because he first loved us."

Love is the greatest conqueror of all the forces of the universe to subdue the spirit of rebellious man. Fear may claim a lawless spirit; reward may bribe it by appealing to perverted motives; but the love of God conquers and then reigns supremely over those it subdued. This is the essence of the gospel message, and the way by which God means to win the soul of man into obedience to Himself. Love is the breath of Christianity in the world. If this fails all things fail. The supreme manifestation of that love of God for men was sending his Son to reveal it and the supreme expression of it in Jesus Christ was to give his life in the accursed death of the cross. "Greater love hath no man than this that he should give his life for his friends"—aye, for his "enemies!"

"Since from his bounty I receive
Such proofs of love divine,
"Had I a thousand hearts to give,
"Lord, they should all be thine."

An Atoning Sacrifice

IV. Those purposes and results of the death of Jesus Christ are comparatively incidental to the supreme purpose: He died for men an atoning sacrifice for their sins. 'Twas this purpose that gave him the name—"the lamb of God that taketh away the sins of the world." He was led as a lamb to the slaughter, the innocent for the guilty, because the "chastisement of our peace was upon him." "He bore our sins in his own body on the tree." Paul declares the gospel he delivered to the Corinthians was that "Christ died for our sins." Again: "Christ redeemed us from the curse of the law by becoming (or was made) a curse for us." Jesus himself declared that as a good shepherd he "gave his life for that sheep." Prophet

The Bulletin Board

No Representative at Vatican

A statement from the White House says:

"Many inquiries have come to the President relative to a contemplated nomination of a diplomatic representative to the Vatican, and the President has thought it best to answer all of them by the public statement that no consideration has been given to such a step, and there will be no occasion to consider it unless Congress by the enactment of law provides for such representation. The President does not understand that any such proposal has been made to Congress."

The Japanese Census

The Japanese government experienced a great many difficulties in taking its first census not long since. Many of the people were terrified, thinking that it was some scheme for police purposes; and much propaganda was necessary to overcome this distrust, the schools, public meetings, and other methods being used to win the co-operation of the people. As is usually the case, the population of the great cities fell far below what has been claimed for them. It was supposed that Tokyo had a population of nearly 3,000,000, but the number proved to be only 2,173,162. The next largest city is Osaka, with 1,252,972, followed in lessening order by Kobe, Kyoto, Negoya, and Yokohama, the latter city having a population of only 422,942. The census showed the population of Japan proper to be 55,961,140; Korea, 17,284,207; Formosa, 3,654,000; and Saghalien, 105,765; a total of 77,005,112.

Catholics Get Relief Funds

Now we are told that the China famine relief funds have to a large extent fallen into the hands of Catholic organizations and have been distributed in the fashion for which Romanism is noted. Speaking of the sore needs in her district, and the scanty funds that have been available from the relief sums sent from America, a missionary says:

"The sad part is, the Catholics are getting practically all the funds. Fifty thousand dollars was voted for our district, and $10,000 was handed over to the Catholics several weeks ago, before anything was given out to Protestants. We are now informed that they will get most of the balance. A representative of the relief committee tells us that the Catholics have the organization. We have just learned that twenty-seven Catholic missionaries have appeared on the ground, and are taking in lots of children as the result of the money granted them.

"This is the old game of Romanism, and will net them thousands of children that they may bring up in the Catholic teaching. Let Protestants, in sending money for famine relief, send it direct through Protestant missionary boards or the faith missions—then they will know that the money will not be used for Catholic propaganda."—Record of Christian Work.

The Majesty of the Law

We shall not see the full majesty of the law until all of our people respect the law. The nation that reaches the highest degree of development will be that nation which has established righteous laws and whose every citizen not only observes and respects these laws but gives his best service in seeing that they are properly enforced.

We have come upon a time when all of our people must recognize that ours is a government that stands for the application of law to all conditions. The public detriment arising from violation of law, followed by immunity from prosecution and punishment, can hardly be overstated. It is foolish to enact a law which, because of conditions that cannot be changed, is incapable of enforcement. Our legislatures make our laws, but the people are responsible for their enforcement. The constant violation or neglect of any law leads to a demoralized view of all laws and such disrespect for law rapidly spreads in a community where the sacredness of law does not exist. It is distressing to me that mob violence in the form of lynching can continue in our nation. I deplore it because it often results in the death of innocent persons and because it makes chaos of our government by law.

I do not for a moment agree in the view that everything is corruption and that our people are growing worse. I believe in our constituted law, both state and federal. I am greatly encouraged with the response which is coming from our people in all sections of the country for the enforcement of our laws. I believe better days are ahead.

And when our already good laws are supported by a united and enlightened public opinion, based on the fundamental doctrines of democracy and the fear of Almighty God, we shall realize, what we must all now desire to see—the law in its majesty.—W. H. Taft.

Free Churchmen and George Washington

An interesting historical reference is to be noted in this month's issue of the Banbury District Baptist magazine, under the heading of "Sulgrave group; minister, the Rev. D. Kinvig." From it we note the following:

Not directly, but indirectly as free Churchmen in general and Baptists in particular, do we claim some connection with the name of George Washington. Tuesday, June 21, was an epoch-making day in the village of Sulgrave, when the ancestral home of that famous man was dedicated and reopened after extensive alterations and renovations. Sulgrave Manor will ever stand, we trust, as a symbol of peace and goodwill between the two powerful English-speaking peoples.

There was a fitness, therefore, in the presence of Free Church ministers at the historic function of June 21, and in the participation by a Baptist minister in the ceremony of the dedication to God of Sulgrave Manor House.—Baptist Times and Freeman.

A Preacher as Referee in a Labor Dispute

(The following is a paid advertisement which appeared in Baltimore newspapers.)

A preacher today is called on for a variety of services, but few have had an experience similar to that of Dean Howard C. Robbins of the Cathedral of St. John the Divine, New York, who was called upon to referee a serious wage controversy between the stone carvers of New York and their employers.

An experienced arbitrator could scarcely have analyzed the issues more skillfully or effectively.

"We are sure your decision is impartial," wrote the president of the employers' association, adding that it would be "carried out in letter and spirit." For the men, the president of their association expressed thanks for "your fair and equitable endeavors to reach a just decision," which, he added, he was confident would "meet the satisfaction of all concerned."

All of which gives food for thought. The greatest asset the church has in its ministry to the industrial world is the reputation of its ministry and its leadership for unbiased moral judgment and courageous action. The striking employees of the Denver Tramway Company paid a rare tribute last summer to the local ministry when they agreed to accept any resident pastor as an arbiter of their controversy. Might not preparation for this kind of service properly be regarded as a part of every city minister's equipment?

High Standards for Girls

The following high standards for a Y. W. C. A. girl were adopted by the Stevens College girls:

1. She does not gossip.
2. She stands for purity of speech.
3. She has a high sense of honor in regard to school work and school regulations.
4. She stands for modest dress.
5. She stands against all "questionable" social conduct.
6. She puts her relationship with young men on the basis of comradeship rather than familiarity.
7. She has a Quiet Hour or time of devotion each day.

New Light from the Papyri

Professor George Milligan, of Glasgow University, one of the most distinguished living authorities on the papyri and on the vocabulary of the Greek New Testament, preached to a very large congregation at Dr. Fleming's church on Sunday evening.

Dr. Milligan mentioned, inter alia, that the rubbish heaps of Egypt have yielded fragments of gospels and epistles much older than the earliest documents we have hitherto possessed. He reminded us that the New Testament books were mostly written from dictation. We have to think of St. Paul walking up and down his room, dictating to his amanuensis and signing his name at the end. His epistles are speeches rather than writing. He used the ordinary phraseology of his time. Here the Professor gave examples from ancient letters found among the papyri from which new light has been thrown on Holy Scripture. For instance, the word "disorderly," applied to the Thessalonians, is discovered, from its use in a letter written by a father about his son's apprenticeship, to bear the meaning "play truant." The Thessalonians expected the early coming of Our Lord, and were neglecting the ordinary business of life. Paul says "Don't play truant; don't neglect your ordinary work. The Christian who is most faithful to his daily duty is best prepared for Christ's coming."

Another example was taken from Galatians, the words "Jesus Christ hath been evidently set forth crucified among you." A parallel is found in the letter of a father whose son has fallen into debt, and who warns his neighbours that he will not be responsible for the sums expended by the young prodigal. He asks that this notice may be placarded up in a public place. The word is that used by the Apostle. He means that "Jesus Christ is placarded up so that none can fail to see and understand."—British Weekly.

Brewery Converted Into Baptist Church

A building formerly used as a part of a large brewing establishment in Seattle, put out of business by prohibition, has been converted into a Baptist church and was recently dedicated to its new mission.

Lloyd-George the Greatest of Bishop-Makers

No premier in modern times has created so many bishops of the Established Church as has David Lloyd-George, premier of the British Empire. This is the more astonishing in view of the fact that Mr. Lloyd-George is a free-churchman and belongs to a denomination which believes that church and state should be separate. The Church of England has forty-two bishops in England and Wales, and sixteen of these have been appointed by the present premier. The influence of these appointments on the church of England is important. While the premier cannot altogether override ecclesiastical sentiment, nevertheless his appointments have tended to weaken the high-church party and to give the broad churchmen a better standing in the nation. The present anomalous situation has led many Episcopalians of England to come over to the idea of disestablishment. The idea of a free churchman appointing the bishops is very distasteful to those who hold to the high church view of the church of England.

Another Cut in Steel Wages

It was announced in the press on July 7 that the U. S. Steel Corporation would abrogate on July 16 the "basic" eight-hour day which was put into effect during the war and which is considered to have been an emergency measure. Since the majority of the day workers in the plants of the Steel corporation are working ten or twelve hours a day and receiving pay at the rate of time-and-a-half for all the time worked in excess of eight hours, this means that the ten and twelve hour men will lose, respectively, one and two full hours' pay a day. The average wage decrease will be approximately 10 per cent but it will range from 8 per cent to 13 or 14 per cent in the various labor groups. This decrease follows a reduction of approximately 20 per cent made last May.

Birthday Illusions of Mortal Mind

According to our mundane reckoning, July 16 was the one hundredth anniversary of the birth of Mary Baker Eddy, the founder of Christian Science. But our Christian Science friends will not have it so, because, they say, birthdays are a delusion of mortal mind, which will be good news to many who would like to forget their birthdays. For the same reason protest is made against pilgrimages to the grave of Mrs. Eddy, on the ground that it is a tacit recognition of the fact of death. Whatever we may think of a faith, or philosophy, which dissolves all our mortal life into an illusion, in the oriental manner, the date is occasion for thought about an interesting movement. When Mrs. Eddy passed away in 1910, the number of her followers in this country was estimated to be 125,000; no figures of its membership today are available, except that it has 1800 churches. The driving force behind this remarkable development, since the publication of "Science and Health," in 1875, may be said to be the quest of physical well-being by spiritual means, in a civilization of increasing complexity and of exacting demands upon body and spirit. In a day of nerves such a cult finds vogue, especially in an age which in so many ways emphasizes the power of mind over matter, and for much good it has done in inducing health, serenity, and optimism we may be grateful—though the kind of optimism it evokes may be open to query. Much of its success is due to an able and energetic propaganda employed from the first, and to a most efficient proselytism. Also, its ecclesiasticism—iron-bound and self-perpetuating—is no small part of its strength. Lately it has been much in the courts, and there are tokens of disunion in its ranks; but it promises to persist among the religious forces of the modern world.—Christian Century.

Tulsa Preachers Speak Up

Immediately after the race riots in Tulsa, Okla., the ministers of the city met and adopted some resolutions and started some committees that lead one to think that the churches are far from inactive in the matter of creating a community conscience. These preachers put the blame squarely up to the whites, though they admit the guilt of a few provocative blacks. Taking the Bible out of the public schools and putting the dance in, seeing automobiles wrongly parked and overlooking blind pigs, fight and lust portrayed by the movies, the winking officials at previous lynchings—all these are assigned as contributing causes. A fearless and stirring call is issued to the Christian people of the city, urging them to show no remission in the observance of a worshipful Sabbath and further urging Christian people to show the truly Christian attitude toward the Negro in social and business relationships. One of the important suggestions made is a plan for a series of conferences between the white and the black leaders, in which the common problems shall be frankly faced. —Northwestern Christian Advocate.

Preventives of Divorce

Judge Joseph Sabath of Chicago, who, in the capacity of judge of the Superior Court has disposed of 2000 divorce cases in the last ten months, recently advocated the publishing thirty days before a license is issued of the names of those desiring to marry. The following are his suggestions to those desiring happiness:

"Every man should see that his wife has plenty of entertainment. Take her to the movies, on auto rides, and to the theaters as often as you can afford. Go swimming with her if she likes it.

"A husband should confide his business affairs with his wife and she should take an interest in them.

"Have children.

"Know each other well before marriage.

"Realize the responsibility of the marriage relation; bear and forbear.

"Move away from each other's families; don't live with them."

In the cases disposed of before Judge Sabath 1,456 were filed by women and 544 by men.

The National Wealth

Figures compiled by the U. S. Chamber of Commerce and quoted by the National Industrial Conference Board place the national wealth of the United States at $290,464,000,000, or $2,747 per capita. The amount is divided as follows:

	Millions	Per cent
Real Property .....	$169,070	58.2
Farm implements and machinery .....	2,030	0.7
Livestock .....	9,570	3.3
Gold and silver coins and bullion .....	3,550	1.2
Manufacturing, machines, tools, etc. ....	9,280	3.2
Railroads and equipment .....	20,000	6.9
Street railways .....	6,960	2.4
Telegraph and telephone systems .....	1,972	0.7
Shipping and canals .....	2,059	0.7
Irrigation enterprise ...	406	0.1
Public utilities, privately owned .....	3,567	1.2
All other property (a) ..	62,000	21.4

Contrast this with India where the per capita wealth is about $100.

International Uniform Lesson for August 21

PAUL PREPARES FOR WORLD CONQUEST
Acts 15:1-16:5. Golden Text, Acts 15:11.

By JOHN A. EARL

The Lesson Text

The printed portion of the lesson text is only a small part of the lesson. All of chapter fifteen and five verses of chapter sixteen are involved in the lesson. Paul had settled the question of circumcision for himself; but there were many Jewish Christians who thought the laws of Moses and circumcision as the seal of the covenant should be continued as a vital part of the new Christian faith. The test came in Antioch when the Judaizing Christians sought to make circumcision essential to salvation. When Paul and Barnabas could not prevail against the Judaizers they were appointed by the church to go to Jerusalem and have the vexed question settled once for all. The first thirty-five verses of chapter fifteen is the record of the conference at Jerusalem and its results. The remainder of the lesson text recites the parting of Paul and Barnabas and the cause of it and the new partnership formed between Paul and Silas.

The Lesson Taught

In preparing for world conquest Paul had a vital problem to solve, a delicate question to settle, and new companions to select.

Solving a Vital Problem

The problem to be solved was more than a personal one. It affected the character and future of the kingdom of God and therefore must be solved by the church as an organization. This was the reason for the conference at Jerusalem. Circumcision was the occasion of the problem, but not the problem itself. The problem was deeper and broader and more vital than circumcision. It was the problem of spiritual religion as against legal religion, of Christian liberty as against ceremonial bondage. Paul discusses the question directly in his letter to the Galatians. The problem is age-long, appearing in every generation in different forms, but always the same problem. In the Old Testament we find the problem met by the prophets in their inspired protest against the blood of bulls and goats and in their insistent demand for justice, righteousness and spirituality. In the days of the Protestant reformation the same problem appears when the reformers demanded justification by faith as sufficient for man's standing before God without the penances of the church and its accumulated ecclesiastical ceremonies. The Pilgrims landed on the inhospitable shores of New England in order to solve the problem which Paul and Barnabas faced at Jerusalem. The church is again facing the same problem. There are not lacking in the church men who insist that the letter of the law shall be followed both in inspiration and interpretation; that the great doctrines of the Christian faith must be maintained in the very form which Calvin gave them; and that personal salvation rests upon the acceptance of the doctrines thus interpreted. It is needless to say that the fight over circumcision is on again in principle. But the principle of Paul must ultimately win because it is the principle of Christ. This is the only religion worthy of world conquest. Paul began his great missionary work among the Gentiles with spiritual religion incarnated in Christ, with grace not law, with freedom not bondage, with the Spirit of Truth operating in the hearts of Christian people, with the living Christ at the center; and he won. This must be the principle of all Christian missionary work.

Settling a Delicate Question

Having solved the problem of spiritual freedom for the Gentile world, Paul now faces the delicate question of the personnel of the missionary. Barnabas thought that Mark, his nephew, would make a good missionary if given a second chance; but Paul was of the opposite opinion. In fact it was a conviction with Paul that a "quitter" would never make a good missionary. Barnabas, however, seemed to know his nephew better than Paul knew him in spite of the unfortunate incident at Perga in Pamphylia, for years later Paul speaks of Mark with tenderness. At any rate at this time Paul could not trust Mark, and standing by his conviction in the matter, he was willing to lose Barnabas as his companion rather than be burdened with Mark. Without going into the matter which has been thoroughly discussed by the commentators as to the merits of the question that alienated Paul and Barnabas, we may learn this much at least from the deplorable occurrence, that the personnel of the missionary is no less important than the gospel he is sent to teach and to preach. One quality a missionary must have and that is the quality of seeing it through to the end. Despite the hardships, the isolation, the meagre stipend, the separation from children and friends, the obscurity of his position, and all the other limitations involved in the life of a missionary among the heathen, he must never turn back. Having put his hand to the plow, he must never even look back. He may be offered flattering positions in the home land; but he must not leave Paul and Barnabas in Perga or Pamphylia. That is the real justification for Paul's stand in the matter of Mark. We honor the true missionary for his work's sake, but above all we honor him for that quality which was so conspicuous in the Master that he went all the way to Calvary and saw it through to the bitter end.

Selecting New Associates

Silas took the place of Barnabas and proved himself a worthy successor. We shall hear more about him later. But who will be found to take the place of Mark discarded? There must be one young man in the party? Did Paul have this young man in mind when he quarreled with Barnabas about taking Mark along?

Paul had been stoned at Lystra, and his work there seemed to end in failure. There is no record that any church was planted in that town. And yet that town yielded one of the richest fruits of Paul's whole ministry. Timothy came out of Lystra. So then while the unseemly quarrel between Paul and Barnabas can never be justified it was at least overruled for good. Timothy, because of his Greek father, his Jewish mother, and his Gentile environment made much better material for a real foreign missionary than Mark with his Jerusalem atmosphere and his wholly Jewish connections would have made. It was better for Paul to train one of his own converts for the work than to be burdened with Mark who evidently had more in common with Peter than he had with Paul. Silas gave Paul the touch with Jerusalem which he needed because Silas was one of the chief men in the church at Jerusalem, but a liberal. Timothy gave Paul a direct point of contact with the Gentile world. Thus Paul was well coupled up with Silas of Jerusalem on one side and Timothy of Lystra on the other. In addition to the principles of the gospel and the personnel of the missionary, missionaries who work together should be well-mated.

Leakage in Leadership Ability

By MILTON M. MCGORRILL

As I go about the country in the interests of our young people's work I am becoming more and more convinced of the tremendous waste in potential leadership ability—a waste that may be stopped in a measure by care and attention. Our method of discovering and training leadership in the past has been more of a "laissez-faire" than a controlled one. When a young person by natural growth has shown leadership ability we have felt that here was the person to be trained, to be sent to the summer assembly or "summer camp. We have let leadership demonstrate itself before we took cognizance of it and trained it. There are, numerous individuals, however, who by reason of poor early training, unfortunate environmental influences or hereditary weaknesses, have had inhibiting factors set up in their personalities which when confronted by a social situation their normal self-assertive tendencies would not be sufficient to enable them to break through. Many of these individuals, however, have abilities which when cultivated and appealed to, would train the personality to assert itself in social situations confident of its own power in a given field, limited though that field may be. In this twentieth century we are breaking the adage that "leaders are born—not made" and asserting its contrary. Leaders are made in this day! Potential leadership stares us in the face begging to be recognized.

The Career of the Fateful Pillow

DURING the second week of Andrew's illness, they made up a certain little game, he and his brother Martin, that whatever Andrew's eyes lighted on first in the morning when he awoke Martin was to use as the topic of an adventure tale in the evening after supper; and unless it was a true exploit, the penalty was to be two stories! This had gone on merrily for several days until a certain morning when Andrew sang out delightedly: "I've got you! I've got you! For honest Injun, I don't know exactly what I did see first this morning. I just sort of squinted out and two things seemed to flash into my eyes both at once—the pillow and just beyond it a Bible on the table. Can you beat that combination? So, old man, I guess I've caught you this time for sure! You simply can't find a true adventure story about the two things. Ha! Ha!"

"Oh, can't I?" cried Martin mysteriously, and calmly walked off to college.

"Well, he can't, can he?" said Andrew to his mother indignantly.

"Oh, it's perfectly amazing what a junior in college knows!" she exclaimed smiling.

Whereupon Andrew fumed and fretted all day, waiting for the hour after supper to arrive, when some sort of a pillow story was due him.

"Well," Martin began, when the appointed time had arrived, the career of the fateful pillow opens with a wedding."

"Aw skip it!" groaned ten-year-old Andrew, exceedingly bored, "who cares about weddings anyhow?"

"Adoniram cared," Martin remarked briefly, and if you don't want to hear this story the way it really happened then roll over and go to sleep, you ungrateful little rascal."

Andrew winked obligingly, "Go ahead, bring on the bride," he ordered gaily, "all beaut-chus and shining in a white alabaster gown . . ."

Martin scowled. "Stop that!" he thundered, "I'm telling this; and I'd have you know that that bride was about the pluckiest girl that ever lived on this earth."

"Did she have a name, perhaps," Andrew inquired meekly.

"Indeed, she did! Miss Ann Hasseltine! But when she married she became Mrs. Adoniram Judson. All this was in the year 1813, one hundred and eight years ago. She was a regular beauty, too. I've seen a picture of her, sort of a scoop bonnet affair over her curls, and a series of quaint little capes over her shoulders. Well, Andy, on the most bleak and frigid day in February she and Mr. Judson set sail from Salem, Massachusetts, for Burma in a crazy wooden schooner, only three times bigger than the Mayflower."

This department is conducted by Miss Margaret T. Applegarth. Communications to her may be addressed in care of THE BAPTIST.

"Burma?" Andrew broke in, "whatever made him go there? Isn't that way over near India somewhere?"

"Yes, you poor little ignoramus! I supposed, of course, you knew that Adoniram Judson was the first foreign missionary to sail from America; a Baptist, too, so he's a grand person for us to boast about! Well, it took him a year and a half to reach the other side of the world,—some trip, in that miserable stuffy tub! As for the Burmans, they weren't waiting around, open-armed, to be converted. Not a bit of it! The Judsons had a very frosty reception in that exceedingly hot country, for those Burmans were riotously heathen, and were ruled by the most barbaric kind of governors known as 'Eaters'!"

"Um-m-m!" grunted Andrew, "I begin to smell that adventure already. Guess I wouldn't care much about being governed by 'Eaters'."

"Well, you may be sure the Judsons didn't like it, either. Wish I could take time to tell you how heroic they were in those first hard months and years. There were all sorts of queer things to get broken into—a perfect jaw-breaker of a new language to learn, and a whole 'fifty-seven varieties' of idiotic customs to get used to. It's no joke to live among heathen, little pal, and hear the tom-toms beating all night long somewhere near by when anyone's sick, or to see discouraged people plastering kisses on some heathen idol's foot. As for the dirt and the vermin and the queer new food and the uncomfortable house they lived in, the less said the better."

Andrew interrupted. "Look here! Aren't you forgetting that this was to be a true story about a Bible and a pillow?"

"Just wait a while, Andy. I'm getting there, for haven't I left Mr. Judson learning a new language? And doesn't that sound like the beginning of a Burman Bible? Of course it does! For it didn't take him long to make up his mind that talking was all very well, but rather slow, since he was only one man among millions of idol-worshippers, so the quicker he could put a Bible in Burmese into the hands of those heathen, the sooner he could scatter news of the one true God all up and down that great country. He worked and worked, but there's something so crooked and dazling about the curious black hooks and curves of Burmese print that once for over four months at a stretch he could not use his eyes for any kind of reading. Yet instead of moping lazily, he spent those four months in compiling a grammar of the Burmese language. When it was printed, great scholars said it was a perfect masterpiece in its brevity and completeness. That was his type—scholarly, painstaking, courageous, a real pioneer, blazing the way through heathenism. Well, six slow disappointing years went by before a single one of those Burmans accepted the new religion. Then one came, then several more. After which there was war between England and Burma."

"War?" echoed Andrew joyfully. "Say, this is getting to be some story! Was this Mr. Adoniram Judson in the war? I bet he would have been glad to get a whack at those 'Eaters'?"

"Here's where you get a jolt," sighed Martin, "for Mr. Judson spent the entire period of the war in prison."

"What? In prison?" Andrew repeated incredulously. "A missionary in prison? What had he done?"

"Nothing! Nothing but have a white face and talk English which made every one of those heathen Burmese decide he must be English, and since England was making war on Burma every single white-faced man was clapped in prison and treated as viciously as they knew how. Here is where Mrs. Judson was so plucky. Did she sit back and cry about it? No sir! She tried to call on the cruel old heathen King himself, to protest against having her husband unjustly imprisoned, but the old fellow had the palace gates closed to everybody whom he did not summon himself. So then she began tackling the governor."

"What? The—the-kind they call an 'Eater'?" stammered Andrew. "Mercy! catch me prowling round his premises!"

"Haven't I said she was a heroine? She besieged that fellow's doors day and night, one by one she brought him handsome presents, things she had brought from America. And with every present she tried to persuade him that since her husband was an American and not an Englishman, it was unfair to chain him in that vile unspeakable prison. But nothing made even a dent in the old fellow's mind; he would suavely accept her present, promise to do all in his power to free her husband. But nothing much ever came of it. As for that prison, it was simply purgatory. About a hundred prisoners were herded into a stifling room with no windows, and a blistering tin roof on which the tropical sun beat all day long. Mr. Judson had three sets of heavy iron fetters on his feet, and every evening these fetters were cruelly fastened to a pole near the roof, that so all night long his feet were suspended in mid-air. He would certainly have died, if plucky Mrs. Judson had not brought him food, and bribed the crafty jailor to let him live in a lion's cage, left empty by the lion's death. This was during an attack of fever, when only her careful nursing saved Mr. Judson's life. When he recovered he was put back in that filthy prison. Meanwhile she was absolutely the only white person in that excited heathen whirl of war and suspicion and treachery. So to make herself less conspicuous she dressed as the Burman women dressed, winding yards of silk around her and putting flowers in her hair. And every day she took a new present to the governor, and then walked two miles further on in the sweltering heat to give a present to the greedy jailor.

"She must have nearly emptied her house," Andrew sighed.

"She did. But what did things matter when Mr. Judson was in such desperate danger? Every day the spotted executioner stalked in, with hideous grimaces, and led some one away to be killed, so Mr. Judson never knew when his turn would come. Then one evening she received a warning that the next day her house would be ransacked in search of evidence of her husband's guilt. There was absolutely nothing incriminating among their possessions, of course, yet she was exceedingly glad to have the warning in time, for she knew that the most innocent letter from America might look suspicious to the ignorant, excitable Burmese authorities, so she spent the evening destroying every letter and all papers. But there was one roll of paper she simply could not burn, and that was Mr. Judson's translation of the New Testament. She remembered his years of tedious toil over it, yet she did not dare keep it in the house. Poor woman, what strange devices she was daily forced to plan in her lonely, perilous position—I tell you what, Andy! missionaries like her couldn't be so heroically brave if it weren't that they felt God near by to help them."

"I guess that's so," said Andrew solemnly, very much impressed. "I—I suppose all her little presents kept those heathen in a better humor, even if they didn't actually help."

"That's the idea," said Martin. "And now, going back to that Bible, I'll prove how Bibles and pillow can get mixed up in one true story of adventure, for Mrs. Judson sewed the manuscript Bible inside a pillow, and carried it to the prison for Mr. Judson to use."

"Three cheers for her!" shouted Andrew.

"Yes, but fancy her dismay when the envious jailor coveted the luxury of that pillow for his own sweet self, and snatched it away from Mrs. Judson."

"Oh, say," groaned Andrew, "the old thief! Then it was all up with her little plan, wasn't it?"

"Not at all," laughed Martin triumphantly, "what's the matter with her taking a fancier, nicer pillow to prison so that Mr. Judson could swap with the jailor. Naturally the covetous fellow was glad enough to give back the shabby one."

Andrew gave a sigh of relief. "She thought of everything, didn't she? And I suppose that's how there happens to be a Burman Bible to-day."

"Look here," Martin said seriously, "I wouldn't use that little word 'happened' too carelessly if I were you. For that pillow had a few more adventures ahead of it, but I rather guess there was some one even more interested in its secret contents than the Judsons themselves. Someone who wanted to save it, and helped—you know who I mean?"

Andrew nodded gravely.

"Yes," Martin continued, "it was certainly God who protected that manuscript. For, of course, He could see across the years how that translation would be printed and lead thousands of Burman people to himself. So on a certain day when, without any warning, Mr. Judson was suddenly moved from his old prison to a new one, miles and miles away, the pillow was left behind. A guard, admiring the matting cover, ripped it off and tossed the old cotton padding among the bushes. But did it lie there? Not at all. Along comes a devoted old servant of the Judsons, a faithful brown-skinned fellow who hadn't had a cent of pay in months, but who loved the family devotedly through thick and thin. His name was Moung Ing. Well, he saw the cotton padding, knew it must be from Mr. Judson's pillow, and for sentiment's sake carried it home as a souvenir of the kind white master he never expected to see again. There he kept it hidden, never dreaming what was inside until months and months later when England won the war and Mr. Judson's imprisonment was over. It must have been a wonderful ending when Mr. Judson ripped the pillow apart and showed that precious writing to the old man. My, I wish I could tell it properly! I haven't even begun to tell how heroic they were in the midst of all that heathenish torture. About the grandest thing of all was what Mr. Judson said to a fellow-prisoner in that unspeakable jail: 'I have been in Burma ten years preaching the gospel to timid listeners who wished to embrace the truth, but dared not; beseeching the King to grant liberty of conscience to the people, but without success; and now when all human means seemed at an end, God opens the way by leading a Christian nation to subdue the country. It is possible that my life will be spared; if so, with what ardor and gratitude shall I pursue my work! And if not, His will be done; the door will be opened for others who will do the work better.'

Andrew lay silent for several minutes, thinking things over, then he rolled over and stared at the Bible in a perplexed and almost conscience-stricken way. "My! and I always thought it was just a black book that ministers read out of on Sunday mornings! I didn't dream people had been having adventures over it. . . ."

"Ever since Daniel's day, Andy," Martin said, "See what he wrote about it in his book."

Martin turned to the eleventh chapter and read aloud: "the people who do know their God shall be strong, and do exploits."

"That's true!" he nodded eagerly.

A Poem A Day Drives The Blues Away.

BY PEGGY

Bill went out on the farm in July to help Uncle Jim "do crops," but the two of them nearly dried up with the terrific heat and a swarm of curious little insects that hovered in the air before their noses all day long. So to cheer him up I mailed Bill an appropriate poem every day for over a week, with original drawings of my own. For instance the first one showed him wearing an enormous hat:

*"There once was a gnatty young Gnat
Who crept 'neath the brim of my hat,
But I suddenly sneezed
And the poor Gnat was squeezed
Un-GNATural, lifeless and flat."*

The next picture showed him milking Uncle Jim's nice bossy:

*"There once was a peaceable cow
Who cuddled down under a bough,
But a boy came in view
And she fled with a 'moo'!
That cow turned coward, I vow."*

Uncle Jim's peach trees are a disappointment this year, so I was glad to find this very appropriate verse:

*"There once was a Peach on a tree,
The fairest you ever did see.
But it ripened too fast
Till it fell down at last—
And turned into a SQUASH, dearie me!"*

Then I loved the one that showed Bill chopping kindling wood to cook breakfast with:

*"The tramp stood by the wood-pile,
The housewife was a wit;
She told him a joke without a smile—
And the tramp laughed till he split!"*

Another poem showed Bill's canary which he wanted to take to the farm with him, only he spent so much money buying it that he was half afraid it might die of loneliness!

*"We have a little singing-bird
That loves to hop and peep.
When mother tells him he is dear,
He always answers 'Cheap!'"*

But Uncle Jim has rabbits on the farm so this was one Bill enjoyed the most, I think:

*"There was a pretty brown Hare
Who had such a terrible scare
That in one single night
The Hare became white
'I shall dye!' she was hear to declare."*

LESSONS FROM THE BOOK OF RUTH

Ruth 1:14-22

By MORGAN WILLIAMS

The author of this book dips his pen into the very heart of every-day human experience. The story is full of rich instruction.

1. Universal Fork in the Road. Which way shall I take? Orpha, Ruth and Naomi stood at the fork and chose their destiny. Orpha chose to go back to the old, circumscribed and provincial life. As she passes out of sight she passes out of history. Ruth chose the path leading toward service and God. You, my young friend, stand at the fork in the road consciously or unconsciously choosing your destiny. Will you, Orpha, pass into oblivion; or will you choose Christ and his service?

2. The Dignity of Toil. Ruth, the Moabite said, "Let me go into the field and glean." Naomi answered, "Go my daughter." She was not afraid to work. She was not ashamed to be known as a working woman. She felt no mock modesty in acknowledging the necessity of toil. What a significant commentary upon the character of Ruth! She was too proud to be idle. We need her slogan today, "Too Proud to Loaf." Chance and luck are seldom on the side of the loafer. Honor and life are ever on the side of the worker. However, you must feel the dignity of toil if toil is to bring you dignity.

3. Unselfish Service. Ruth forgot herself in her eagerness to help Naomi. The question in her mind was not, how much can I get out of it, but rather, how much can I put into it? We have been trying to build a social, industrial, and economic order on the principle of GRAB. It dragged us into a welter of blood. Will we ostrich-like stick our heads into the sand and refuse to see? Jesus said, "He that loathes his life for my sake shall find it." This day demands that the lesson of UNSELFISH SERVICE be not only learned but applied. The controlling question must be, how, when, and where can I give the most? Ruth forsook all. Jesus gave all. Dare we continue the policy of GRAB ALL?

4. Living up to the Ideal will always increase Our capacity for Service. Ruth had caught an ideal. She felt the tugging of a new spirit in her soul. She had seen God in the life of Naomi and she cried out, "Thy God shall be my God." She lived up to her ideal, thereby building her life into a race and making her influence universal. Have you caught the ideal? Have you seen the Nazarene at work at his bench, teaching beside the lake, or denouncing the sins of his day? Have you followed him to the hill of supreme sacrifice? Your capacity for service will grow in proportion to your faithfulness in living up to the ideal Christ.

Baptist Young People's Objectives for 1921-1922

The following recommendations were enthusiastically passed by the Baptist Young People's Convention held in Cincinnati, Ohio, June 30 to July 3:

1. That we push with all vigor the campaign for securing one million tithing signatures by July 1, 1922.

Leaders among Southern Baptist forces are planning to secure 500,000 signatures to tithing pledges. Canada's allotment will be twenty-five thousand. In the campaigns of Northern Baptists for the coming year large place will be given to stewardship with emphasis upon tithing. In the tithing propaganda our Baptist young people have led the way and are now in position to give large co-operation to the General Board of Promotion of the Northern Baptist Convention. Plans are now perfected for intensive effort beginning with the early fall. A pamphlet outlining the campaign as well as a package containing a large number of tithing leaflets may be secured on request to B. Y. P. U. of America, 125 North Wabash Avenue, Chicago, Illinois.

2. That every effort be made to create interest in Bible reading on the part of our young people and to secure pledges for the Quiet-Half-Hour-League Campaign.

During 1921-22 great emphasis is to be placed upon Bible reading and study on the part of our young people. The Baptist Young People's Union of America is vitally interested in the culture of the devotional life of the young people of the denomination. The Bible is the one great book for Baptists. Societies everywhere are requested to urge upon their membership daily Bible reading and study. Further information on the proposed plan of campaign may be secured by writing to headquarters mentioned above.

3. That the Baptist Trained Leaders' Course be brought to the attention of the young people's societies in an earnest endeavor to enroll a large number of individuals and societies in this course.

This Baptist Trained Leaders' Course is especially outlined for Baptist young people and is jointly promoted by the Baptist Young People's Union of America, the American Baptist Publication Society, and is heartily endorsed by the Baptist Young People's Union of Ontario and Quebec.

The object of this course is to do for the young people in our various societies what the Standard Teachers' Training Course has done and is doing for the Sunday-school teachers. In many instances our young people have had no larger vision than service in and for the young people's society. This course will prepare them for larger and more effective service in the various departments of church life. Circular outlining the course will be mailed upon application to headquarters.

4. That great emphasis be placed upon life service activities during the coming years. The goal as adopted by the St. Louis Convention is 5,000 decisions for the ministry and missionary work at home and abroad by July 1, 1922.

There were over 200 decisions for Christian work at the Cincinnati Convention. This now makes a total of something like 800 young people who are enrolled in the Life Service League of the B. Y. P. U. of America. Plans are being worked out for the closest possible co-operation with the General Board of Promotion within the area of the Northern Baptist Convention. The need of life service activities is apparent on every hand. The Baptist Young People's Union of America, therefore, offers its heartiest support and co-operation with all agencies at work within the denomination, looking forward to the development of a trained leadership for our great Baptist work at home and abroad. Co-operation of all pastors is urgently needed to discover young people in local churches who have either made the decision for Christian service or are considering doing so. The report of such names to headquarters office, 125 North Wabash Avenue, Chicago, Ill., will be very much appreciated.

5. That we urge our Baptist young people everywhere to interest themselves in the attendance of our boys and girls, young men and young women in the various high schools and the denominational educational institutions.

A speaker recently stated that the average education of our American people was not beyond the sixth grade. Baptists have not always interested themselves in education. The denomination is not now wholly awake to the educational needs of the boys and girls, the young men and the young women of our Baptist homes. There is a rising tide of interest and the appeal of a speaker in a recent meeting "to let our colleges and universities go their way for a while" will fall on deaf ears. The Baptist denomination is interested and will support its educational in-

Boston Letter

By CHARLES H. WATSON
"Old Brimstone Corner"

You could safely call it the chief "corner" in Boston: a perfect site for a church and a perfect meeting-house on the site. How nobly it caps the rising level of Tremont street, and from the old "Common" has shown its stately facade for over 110 years! It looks almost like a sturdy break-water against certain storms. It was a child of storms and had to be born a giant. It had to have a stern theology, such as had prompted its facetious nick-name, "Brimstone Corner." Just as now, over a century later, there were then political storms, theological, and storms social. The French Revolution had just swept through the world like a cyclone, and many a leering infidel hoped that Christianity also would go down in the deluge, and boldly prophesied it. But, as Lowell says—

"Don't prophesy unless ye know!"

Park Street Church has helped to confront the prophets of evil, and today as ever stands like a bulwark for spiritual and civic purity.

A Fine Colonial Type

It is a pure type of the old colonial meeting-house, and the conscientious care of every detail of it makes you feel that the traditions and devotions of the years have gotten into the spirit of the present care-takers. Everywhere it looks like a shrine of many lovers.

The Inevitable Struggle

There are few ecclesiastical survivals in the down town districts of great cities. Tides of advancing business sweep up to the old churches from every side. Only great vitality can survive. The conditions and the constituency entirely change. The membership and the attendants are non-resident, and a newer and broader ministry begins. All the coziness of the old "family church" departs before the awakened energy of a conscious world service. Gradually has this change come to Park Street Church, and many streams have borne blessings into "Brimstone Corner" that have endured.

The Men of the "Corner"

Illustrious men have sounded the gospel trumpet in that pulpit: Edward Griffin, who was almost "in at the birth" of the young giant, and who was gigantic himself; Edward Beecher, with the genius for preaching that the name suggests; A. L. Stone, that master of assemblies; W. H. H. Murray, the powerful and the unaccountable, with his erratic courses and his startling tangent to Music Hall. Then Dr. Gregg, Lansing, and Withrow, swinging back the church into the old lines. And now Dr. Conrad abundantly keeping up the traditions of the "corner" for positive evangelicalism and conservative theology, as well as for pungent and courageous preaching.

As you sit in the old church you feel the rich past and the vital present. The people are full of devout and earnest interest. How they sing! It seems their nature to sing. And they listen as if accustomed to be held and lifted. Dr. Conrad of course has to "feature" his ministry in such a pulpit; and he does. But he never throws out the bait of a sensationalism that draws the sort of a crowd that comes only to stare, to sing and to snigger. He keeps practical religion closely articulated to urgent current questions, and sounds the gospel note with solidity and winsomeness.

The Church of the Ministers

It has become a rule to make the old church a settled ministers' forum. Their big "Alliance" gathers there bi-monthly all the year. Great men and great inspirations for ministers center in Park Street Church. This is befitting; for the church has no secular odors.

When great throngs pour out from Tremont Temple and Park Street on Sunday, you scent the flavor of old-time Boston, when all the adjacent streets were embowered in hedge, tree and vine, and their quiet ways were lined with the homes of the intellectual and the prosperous. What a Boston that must have been to see, when all Beacon Hill was solidly residential, and "Boston culture" had become a world tradition! But what have we now? We still have "Park Street." And if there is an "Irish Republic" anywhere, perhaps we have that also.

Creedal Strategy

Unanimity of sentiment here in the East against the proposed creed adoption is remarkable. Even with differing doctrinal emphasis, the sentiment is the same. It proves that always to a Baptist a creed is a strange device and is taken as in infringement upon a Baptist principle that underlies everything. Thus all express the same supposition: "Suppose they should succeed in putting it over, what will it amount to?" That is, how would you force the individual Baptist church to adopt it? In the vast majority of churches it would be ignored even if they agree with its terms. Most of us have no disagreement except with its fundamental omissions, and its flavor of an un-Baptistic impertinence. To us, any creed is like a papish red rag, when it is foisted upon us for a banner.

But that banner never will wave over us. Those who would divide us or override us, must try some other trick. True, money when there is enough of it, makes an alluring trap. Yet even that fails to entice when it is baited with divisive conditions. A creed seems a peculiarly innocent, even pious device. But our Baptist fathers fought it too successfully, and too long. Their children will not get infatuated with it, not even if it be framed so as to sound like their "Holy Faith."

The Summer School for Rural Pastors, held at Ohio State University, Columbus, July 11-22, was attended by sixty-six pastors, of whom eighteen were Baptists. The picture above was taken in front of the parish house of the Tenth Avenue

Church, where these Baptist pastors were royally housed during their stay. The men go back to their fields with a new vision of their tasks and a finer appreciation of the relationship of the church to all community institutions and interests.

Gorham Easterbrook

The sudden death of Dr. Easterbrook in his 70th year, will touch many hearts in the churches he has served at Southbridge, Fall River, Hyde Park, Ann Arbor, and West Acton. In his retirement he was often sought as a supply preacher. His note of genuineness, conviction, power to illuminate a truth, warmth of feeling and glow of soul, were all fused into an unction that was much enjoyed. He was an ideal conservative—sweet, sane, strong, unsuspecting—a brother beloved. He was trained at Colgate and Brown, and was a member of the Old Cambridge Church. Pastor Kenneth C. MacArthur and Dr. W. H. Spencer officiated at the funeral, at the residence of his sister in Waverly, Mass., where he had lived for two years. His death was beautiful. He had been working in the garden in the early morning, had come in to rest; and when one entered the room to speak to him, lo "he was not, for God had taken him!"

Rest and Change

Or should it be rest and efficiency? We get a wholesome combination of both in our great Christian summer camps. What is more delightful than earnest religion in negligence; in the glorious setting of the ocean and the hills, studying the Kingdom interests, and mastering the efficiencies of Christian teaching and living! It used to be "Northfield": that name alone standing in solitary summer preeminence surrounded with the glories both of nature and of grace.

But now we Baptists have coupled with it another name, "Ocean Park," where our workers go every summer to rest and relax the more completely as they fling themselves into the "rivers of God" as well as into the tides of the sea. Is not our state dynamo, F. F. Peterson, there leading the hosts, all athrill with a sort of infallible guidance in Kingdom efficiencies? And that major wire of ours, William Reid, is he not telling of the great Baptist tides arising with the steady rhythm of old ocean itself? Anyhow, our hosts are there, mixing wholesome hilarity with the King's business. Brethren, are we actually learning what the summer is for?

Foreign Missions at Northfield

The summer school for women's foreign missionary societies recently closed, was most enthusiastic and beneficial. A spirit of hard work characterized it throughout, and made the success of the various classes an easy possibility.

The 9 o'clock hour under the leadership of Dr. Jefferson offered an exceptional opportunity to study the Book of Acts. About 600 people gathered daily to listen to the exposition thus made available. The 11 o'clock hour was led by Mrs. Helen Barrett Montgomery, who taught the textbook, "The Kingdom and the Nations." Mrs. Montgomery was able to present the claims of the nations most effectively to the sympathy of her hearers, and made a deep and lasting impression on all who have heard her.

Two pageants were given; one directed by Miss Margaret Strong of New York, representing the mission of Christianity to the nations, in which about 600 girls took part. The other, under the supervision of Mrs. Henry W. Peabody, portrayed the need of and the effort being made to raise $3,000,000 for women's colleges in the Orient. This was entitled, "Lighting the Christmas Candle," and is available for any organization desiring to help in this great task. Mrs. Peabody is chairman of the committee to attempt "the impossible," and already the pledges and gifts have passed beyond the sum of $750,000.

The registration of this gathering is officially reported as over 1,200.

Mono Indians Meet

By MARY STRANGE

The Mono Indians held their annual church meeting and fourth of July celebration at Sycamore Mission from July 2 to 4, with nearly 200 Indians in attendance. Five mission stations, Anberry, Dunlop, Coarse Gold, Table Mountain and Sycamore were represented.

All went into camp on Saturday and religious meetings were held on Saturday evening and Sunday, and reports from the different stations were given by the Indian men and women. The visitors were well entertained by the Sycamore Indians, and there was a fine spirit of co-operation and Christian fellowship. Three came forward during the meetings, one for baptism and two for renewal of their vows to follow more closely in the "Jesus Road."

On Monday an hour was spent in the chapel for patriotic songs and a talk by Rev. J. G. Brendel, and the remainder of the day was given to outdoor sports. The meetings closed Monday evening with a patriotic program given and prepared by the Indians themselves.

Young People's Assembly, Minot, North Dakota

The Young People's Convention held at Minot, July 18 and 19, was distinctive in that it was the first of its kind ever conducted in the state. Whatever doubts were entertained as to the possibility of its success were completely removed for it proved to be a period of inspiration, marking the way for a greater service to the Master.

Among the splendid addresses were those given by Dr. Frank Peterson of Minneapolis; Dr. J. T. Latta of Burma; Miss Isabel Crawford, our Indian missionary, and Dr. R. W. Hobbs, pastor of the First Church of Fargo. Of practical value, also, were the conferences led by Rev. J. G. York of Grand Forks.

One of the finest things of the convention was the response to the call for life service, twenty-six pledging themselves for Christian work, either at home or abroad.

To the Minot young people, as hosts, we owe much of the success of the gathering. Thoughtful and considerate for their guests, they did everything possible for our enjoyment. Periods of supervised recreation, a weiner roast and a closing banquet provided an opportunity for getting acquainted, and demonstrated the fact that our young people are certainly possessed of enthusiasm and "pep."

In summarizing my impressions of the convention, I would include two things, (1) The interest manifested as indicative of greater assemblies in the future; (2) a renewed confidence in the power of North Dakota young people to contribute to Christian service.—Catherine Tuttle.

MICHIGAN

FORTY NEW MEMBERS have recently been received into the Parr Memorial Church, Petoskey, most of them by baptism. The church is adjusting itself to meet the needs of the resort season. Pastor Parsons preaches three times on Sunday and is arranging for a week-night appointment also for the benefit of resorters.

Carbondale Expresses Appreciation

The church at Carbondale has recently adopted resolutions on the resignation of Rev. J. W. Merrill, who is taking up state work. A portion of these resolutions follows:

"We would express our appreciation of the great help Brother Merrill has been to this church in matters of business, order, and spirituality. He found our property badly needing repair: the floor of the church basement was rotting from dampness; a corner of the annex wall was cracked, and the fine old mansion was used mainly as a dumping place for broken furniture; the grounds were overgrown by weeds. He leaves both buildings in good repair, with smooth, grassy lawn, a credit to our town and our denomination; two departments of our Sunday-school now meet in the annex; the CHURCH AND PARSONAGE, MINOT, N. D.

Ladies' Aid and Missionary Society meet there; and it is also used as a community house by boy scouts, Woman's Club and Public Library.

"He found us poorly organized. Boards of trustees and of deacons held office in definitely and they rarely met, so the business of the church lacked the benefit of deliberation and counsel. We now have ten deacons who attend the meetings and give their best thought to the spiritual interests of the church; six trustees look after the use and upkeep of the property.

"We cannot compute the spiritual aid Brother and Sister Merrill have been to this church. We had one B. Y. P. U. holding meetings only while the Normal was in session and depending largely on students as workers. We now have two additional societies working all the year and led by home boys and girls; one is composed of members from twelve to seventeen years old, the other is for children under twelve. From our High School B. Y. P. U. a group was called two years ago to illustrate the work before the Baptist B. Y. P. U. convention; this year they went to Cincinnati to illustrate the lessons for 1922, which are prepared by our pastor. In Brother Merrill's pastorate, we have had steady accessions to our membership. 109 have been added by baptism and seventy-two by letter. Of the latter, Brother and Sister Fishman are now missionaries on the foreign field, stationed at Kavali in British India. Our interest in missions has been deepened, and our offerings have grown from $356 a year to $2711.61 this past year. Our S. S. has increased in attendance from an average of 236 to one of 350.

"Beside the great help our pastor has been to our church, he has been ever awake to community needs. As chairman of the Board of Health he has done much to stop contagion, to relieve need, and to cheer the suffering. Our town will miss his public spirit and aid."

The Summer Assembly

Under the direction of the department of religious education of the state convention, the second annual assembly was held on the campus of Shurtleff College, July 16-23. The assembly this year exceeded the expectations even of the most sanguine. The attendance of last year was more than doubled. Practically all students and teachers remained to the last minute of the session. One hundred eighteen people received certificates for work done in the various classes.

There were four things which made the assembly outstanding in the life of all who were present.

1. The physical nature was amply provided for. The weather-man gave us exhilarating days and nights. Meals were par excellence. The athletics—volley, tennis, base ball, quilts, races, moonlight excursions contributed to make the physical nature abound with joy. The dormitories, and the swimming too, the green campus and the trees all had their share in making Shurtleff a place of delight.

2. The intellectual life was likewise stimulated. The morning hours were filled with classes which covered all the subjects of religious education. A working Christian was shown how to apply the modern pedagogical and psychological principles to his spirit's life and thus be a more efficient church member. The teachers who led in the discussion of these subjects are among the best in our denomination. They came from the professional chairs and pastorates, from among the laymen and from the women. The spirit of learning among the students was prominent. All these people were serious minded. Classes were overcrowded. Note books have been taken home full of rich suggestions. There were no loiterers on the ground.

3. The social life was not forgotten. The sense of fellowship was evident. People had come for new contacts. A wonderful sense of democracy was present. While the attendants had come from Chicago to Cairo, and from the Wabash river to the Mississippi at Burlington, yet there was no east and there was no west and there was no south nor north. Sixty-one different cities and sixty-five different churches were represented. Sixteen associations partook of this fellowship.

4. The deepening of the devotional life was realized. The family prayers in the morning, the singing of devotional hymns, the exposition of significant Scripture, quickened the spiritual life of all. Then those vesper services when we sang in the twilight "Day is dying in the west."

These were the contributing elements and we trust that the Committee will soon meet to plan another one. The leadership of Illinois Baptists must come from gatherings like these, and it will be a trained leadership—D. O. Hopkins.

WISCONSIN

Mrs. G. W. WATERBURY died on June 9 at the age of eighty-three in Prairie du Sac, Wis. Jane Blodgett Frissell with her parents left Northfield, Vt., in 1845 when in her ninth year and settled at Fort Atkinson, Wis. While teaching at Stone's Pocket, she met George Willis Waterbury, then superintendent of schools and was married to him in 1860. To this union, seven children were born, of whom six grew to manhood and womanhood. She was baptized by E. B. Edmunds in his home missionary work in Wisconsin. Her faith was shared by her children. The death of her husband ten years ago, together with that of the son Judson, shortened her stay and made her anxious for the rest which remaineth for the people of God.

Church Forces Invade the Wall Street of Chicago

Dr. Howard Agnew Johnston, president of the Chicago Church Federation, speaking at an open air meeting held on La Salle Street, announced preliminary plans for a great evangelistic movement to occupy the coming church year. Leaders of the fourteen denominations identified with the Church Federation, and allied organizations such as the Chicago Sunday School Association, the Y. M. C. A. and the Y. W. C. A., have given earnest consideration to the details of the movement which all recognize to be potential with untold possibilities for good in the life of our churches.

Dr. Charles L. Goodell, secretary of evangelism of the Federal Council of Churches and national evangelistic chairman of the leading denominations, will be in Chicago on October 2 and 3 to speak to the ministers and denominational groups which will give the initial impulse to the movement in a general way. Personal workers training classes and church community or personal group canvasses to secure lists of prospects will occur during October and November. From January to Easter an aggressive, intensive program of evangelism in and through the local churches, culminating in a jubilee meeting to be held on the second Monday following Easter, at which it is hoped that announcement can be made that the goal of 50,000 additions to membership in the churches in the Chicago area will have been reached. Special outstanding features which will signalize the evangelistic movement at proper intervals, are as follows:

1. A fitting celebration of the fiftieth anniversary of the Chicago fire on Sunday, Oct. 9, in the churches, stressing the outstanding importance of religion in the life of the city and nation, with community meetings and vesper services in the evening, where the requirements of good citizenship will be emphasized.

2. A great mass meeting attended by delegates from all the churches to be held in the Auditorium on Friday evening, Nov. 11, Armistice Day, with the themes to be considered "God and the Nation," and "Making the Modern City a City of God."

3. A Sunday-school parade worthy of Chicago to take place on the afternoon of Nov. 11, if proper arrangements can be made.

4. Community Thanksgiving services

The Commission on Evangelism of the Chicago Church Federation, of which Dr. Charles K. Carpenter is the chairman, supported by a committee of one hundred, including outstanding ministers and lay members from the fourteen denominations that are to unite in this effort with the assistance of representatives from allied organizations, will have charge of carrying through the simultaneous evangelistic movement through the churches in the Chicago area during the fall and winter 1921-1922.

Bishop Samuel Fallows who spoke with Dr. Johnston at the open-air meeting, stressed the advantages of open-air evangelism where the city pavement is the floor of the sanctuary, the stars the roof, and the audience the passing throng. The bishop announced that reports at hand indicate that over 5000 open-air services will be held in Chicago during the summer months.

TWENTY-THIRD AVENUE, OAKLAND, CAL., J. N. Garst, minister; Mrs. N. F. Turner, principal. 256 enrolled—140 girls, 117 boys. Twenty races as follows: Negro, Finlanders, Irish, Swedish, Danish, English, American, Jewish, Scotch, Italian, Servian, German, Spanish, Portuguese, Japanese, Welch, French, Philippino, Indian, Mexican. Eleven denominations as follows: Congregational, Catholic, Christian Science, Episcopal, Presbyterian, Methodist, Christian, Nazarene, Mormon, Lutheran, Baptist. As many Catholics as Baptists, one-fifth each; one-fifth nine other denominations; and two-fifths no denomination. Nearly two-fifths of the enrollment did not attend any Sunday-school. About half of these have already been enrolled in our Sunday-school by special effort during and since the vacation school. This was accomplished by a careful conservation program which was worked out by the pastor, and adopted and put into effect by the Sunday-school cabinet. This school, free to the patrons, and wonderfully manned by four paid and eleven voluntary workers, was the largest and doubtless the most polygot single vacation school in the San Francisco Bay region.

THE BETHANY CHURCH, of Wilmington, continues to advance under the leadership of Dr. Charles C. Earle. Even in the midst of the summer the congregations are strikingly large, and equally made up of men and women, the men sometimes being in larger number than the women. The Bible school is also vigorous, and by class organization is solving perplexing problems.

WESTERN PENNSYLVANIA

JULY FIRST closed the associational year of the East Side Church, Sharon, and the eighteenth month of the pastorate of Rev. D. E. Lewis. During the year the church lost from its working forces twenty-one good members, including three trustees, two deacons, financial secretary, church treasurer, five Bible-school teachers and the leader of the children's work, but it only congratulated the cities to which they moved and proceeded to make the year the best in its history. During the present pastorate sixty-three new members have been added, forty-three by baptism, and a parsonage has been purchased. During the associational year the last half of a $13,000 mortgage was cancelled, the previous half having been paid the year before. The average giving of the members through straight giving methods amounted to over $80 each. Up to May the prayer-meeting attendance averaged 50 per cent of the resident membership, while a children's meeting on Friday evenings in charge of the pastor averaged 150. During the spring months the Young People's Society conducted a school of missions for an hour and a half preceding the Sunday-evening services. The S. S. superintendent, C. E. Brockway, is director of the community training class in which a large percentage of the teachers are interested. The church has a live Boy Scout organization and the baseball nine is at present third from the top in a league of eight schools, with the superintendent for catcher. This church is only seven years old and claims to be one of the healthiest infants of the N. B. C.

EASTERN PENNSYLVANIA

IT WAS WITH DEEP REGRET that the Gethsemane Church, of Philadelphia, accepted the resignation of the Rev. Will C. Gates, as its pastor, effective Sept. 15. Dr. Gates accepted a call to the Baptist church of Warren, Pa.

WITH THE DISCONTINUANCE of the life-work department of the General Board of Promotion, of which Dr. Raymond M. West has been executive secretary, he becomes free to undertake other work. The many friends of Bucknell University are rejoicing because he has accepted the call of the Lewisburg Church and begins his service there September 1. He will also be student-pastor at the university.

THE WORK AT THE NORTH FRANKFORD CHURCH, Philadelphia, is prospering under the leadership of Pastor Horace H. Hunt. Since January, twenty-six have been baptized, among them, a woman sixty-eight years of age. In spite of the industrial depression steady payments have been made on the large indebtedness of the church until it has been reduced to $1000. Last October the church year was changed to begin May 1. The reports in May showed that during the six months over $13,000 had been raised, $5000 going to the New World Movement. The twenty-fifth anniversary of the founding of the Sunday school was observed June 19. A special honor was paid to those who were present twenty-five years ago, when thirty-one members met in a shed to organize the school. The school steadily grew and within three months a church organization was affected. The church anniversary will be appropriately observed in October.

THE UPLAND CHURCH suffered a second serious loss in the death of Garnett

Pendleton, which occurred just a week after the death of Mr. George K. Crozer. Baptized by his father in the Upland Church, when twelve years of age, Mr. Pendleton was a member fifty-four years, serving many years on the board of deacons, and as treasurer of the church. He was president of the Cambridge Trust Company of Chester and a trustee of Crozer Seminary. He had a high place in the esteem of all who knew him.

Obituary

MRS. SARAH C. DAY BASSETT

The writer has known her for thirty-four years and has been closely associated with her. She spent November to May just past, in our home, and we have letters from her recently dated July 5 and 13th.

On July 14 she was drowned by a cloud-burst which destroyed her home at Andrews, Neb.

Her body was recovered about half a mile from her home and was buried, in accordance with her wishes, in the family lot at Sturgis, Mich.

For years Mrs. Bassett was a representative of the Woodward Avenue Church, doing home missionary work in northwestern Nebraska.

Only eternity will reveal the results of her work, which for the past thirty-four years has been done more especially in the northwestern Association of Nebraska.

The undersigned never knew a person who sacrificed more continuously and unreservedly for the cause of her Master whom she has loved and served all these long years. "She being dead, yet speaketh."

Leakage in Leadership

Not only has there been a general oversight in bringing out leadership ability but there has been a lack of emphasis in the age when leaders should commence training. Heretofore the senior young people have had the main benefit of leadership training and inspiration. The intermediate age (13-14-15) should be enlisted in training work as well. Natural outbreak in leadership is not so readily recognized in this period as in following adolescent years. Retirement, bashfulness, embarrassment in the presence of others, make leadership evidences difficult to challenge and develop. In this period single dominant interests develop. Electricity for example in its mechanistic use may become the all absorbing interest of a boy. Imagination is given stimulus by reason of development of new powers and emotional upheavals which are little understood. Such natural characteristics may be enlisted for definite training. A girl, for example, who has the gift of a ready imagination may be enlisted as a storyteller. A boy who has an interest in manual training may be trained in handwork for vocation schools. Such interests enlisted, trained, and utilized would keep the presence of these boys and girls in the activities of the church where no other effort perhaps would insure their relationship with the church. Such possibilities are present in every church if there is someone who is looking for future leadership. The intermediate age furnishes material which can be used in later adolescence for service of conspicuous value. Why waste human ability for want of a little care and attention in seeking dominant interests and abilities and guiding them in religious service? Stop wastage in leadership!

What can be done? (1) Provide in your church budget a sum for training future leaders; (2) Send intermediate boys and girls to camps and assemblies; (3) Provide opportunities for the persons with single capabilities to use them in some way; (4) Encourage trained leadership.

The Death of Jesus

and apostle burden their inspired messages with the vicariousness of the death of Jesus Christ. A few hours before he died he declared the "cup" symbolized his blood "shed for them."

This prime significance of the death of Jesus has for eighteen centuries been the throbbing consciousness of the church, the heart of the gospel that impelled its redeeming life through the ages over the world. Without this truth in its message Christianity is a harmless cult, a blind and sheared Samson, making sport for the Philistines.

The doctrine of vicarious suffering is not an arbitrary principle peculiar to the religion of the cross. 'Tis an universal law of the natural and moral government of God. The grain of wheat must die so that the harvest may appear. The mother suffers and at last surrenders her life for her offspring. The soldier dies for his country. The roll of heroes, patriots, missionaries, reformers and saviors of their race is filled with the names of men and women who placed themselves on the altar of suffering, counting not their own lives worthy so that others might live. Life issues not out of life, but out of sacrificial death. This great principle of a life-surrender for another was glorified and crowned by the supreme fact murmured during the crucifixion hour: "Others he saved, himself he cannot save."

The substitutionary death of Jesus has elements in it wanting in human illustrations of the principle. Pythias offered his life for his friend. The mother suffers for her offspring. The soldier dies for his country. But "even when we were enemies Christ died for us." No such type of love was ever discovered among men! It is a divine original born out of the heart of God, a revelation of the nature of the great Father of all.

Again: The vicarious death of a man does not necessarily change the nature of him who profited by the sacrifice. But the death of Jesus bears not only the penalty of sin, but also its guilt when the life of Christ is partaken of by faith. "By his stripes we are healed." "The Lord laid on him the iniquity of us all."

The ancient sin-offering left the offerer morally unchanged; symbolically he escaped the penalty for that occasion, or year. The offered sacrifice must be repeated continually, for sin abides in the offerer and issues forth in sinful deeds and words. The love of sin remains. But the death of Jesus Christ removes from the believer not only the penalty and the guilt of sin by forgiveness, but the love of sin is eradicated, and the soul becomes a new man in Christ Jesus redeemed and sanctified to the glory of God.

"Since from his bounties I receive
Such proofs of love divine
Had I a thousand hearts to give
Lord they should all be thine."

Young People's Objectives

stitutions. With the report of the Board of Education we agree, "that the safest place for our Baptist boys and girls is in a Baptist school." We must, therefore, begin back in the local society and urge our young people to complete high school and go on with their educational preparation in one of our Baptist educational institutions. The crying need of the denomination is an intelligent, trained, consecrated leadership. Perhaps the greatest danger of the denomination in the next twenty-five years is not a theological danger but the danger of "short-cut-ism." The products of our Christian colleges and seminaries now on the field at home and abroad are ample evidences of the abilities of our schools to furnish the type of leadership to guide the destinies of our Baptist forces and to preserve our priceless heritages.

THE PRINTING OF MUSIC

To many of us, what happens between the time that a composer hands his music-manuscript over to the publisher and it appears as printed copy is a deep and profound mystery. Perhaps the attached short article sent out by the Willis Publishing Co. may help to clear up the puzzle, and create a little more respect for an intricate art:

The manuscript of a musical composition is given to the master-engraver, who carefully examines it to see that all notations and marks are correctly registered. It is then handed to the engraver's preparer, who estimates the number of plates, and spaces off the number of bars that should go on each page, paying particular attention to the layout so that the turning points will appear at the most convenient places. The manuscript is then returned to the master-engraver, who lays out the work on a blank plate. With a special tool he draws the lines of the staves and with a compass dots in each note with mathematical accuracy according to its respective value and position in the scale. To the dots are added, with the help of a steel ruler, the perpendicular tails, and if a vocal or choral work the text of words are marked in with a stylus. The plate has now the appearance of an artist's sketch. Following this sketch other engravers punch in the heads of the notes, the brackets, clefs and text. This stamping warps the plate and it must be flattened with a polished hammer as the work progresses. The slurs, ties, bars, ledger lines, marks of expression, crescendos or diminuendos are then engraved with a hand graver and the chips and other abrasions removed with a triangular scraper.

The finished plate is finally polished and the engraved parts filled with a prepared ink so as to take the "author's proof."

When corrections are necessary the point is indicated on the reverse side of the finished plate and the incorrect note punched back to the surface. The corrected note is then stamped and engraved and the plate is ready for final proof.
